The site originally included a leaky silo filled with highly radioactive uranium sludge. At the time it was the largest concentration of poisonous radon gas in the world, Mr. Reising said. Officials at the Fernald center dumped radioactive waste into pits just 20 yards from a creek that sits directly atop the Great Miami Aquifer, one of the biggest and cleanest aquifers east of the Mississippi, Mr. Mitchell said.

Rainwater carried uranium into the creek, where it sank and contaminated 225 acres, or about 0.062 percent of the aquifer, according to figures on the Web site of the Fernald Citizens Advisory Board, which represented the center's neighbors through the cleanup process.

When the Department of Energy ran out of room to bury waste at the 1,050-acre Fernald site, officials ordered it packed into 100,000 metal drums, which were left outside, exposed to the elements. Accidental releases covered 11 square miles of surrounding farmland in radioactive dust.

"When we first visited the site, I saw workers walking around in short-sleeve shirts, and their arms were covered with radioactive yellowcake," said Lisa Crawford, president of Fresh, a citizen's group that fought for cleanup at Fernald.

The original plan called for moving all the radioactive waste from Fernald to Nevada. Citizens and regulators gradually decided the plan was so expensive that it might never happen. "It took us years to realize how much dirt we were actually talking about," said Jim Bierer, chairman of the citizens board.

In the final compromise, the federal government agreed to move 1.3 million tons of the most contaminated waste to storage sites in Texas, Nevada and Arizona. Citizens agreed to place the rest — 4.7 million tons — in a landfill at Fernald.

Today, the waste site resembles a long, fat worm. Filled with uranium-laced soil, building parts and shreds of clothing, the landfill is 30 feet deep, with another 65 feet above ground, and is three-quarters of a mile long.

The landfill's outer wall of rock, plastic and clay is nine feet thick and sits 30 feet above the aquifer. It is designed to last at least 1,000 years.

At its peak, the cleanup effort employed 2,000 workers, as many people as worked at the center during the height of uranium production, Mr. Reising said.

The Department of Energy spent $216 million on buildings just to clean the site. When the buildings were no longer needed, each one had to be demolished, decontaminated and placed in the landfill. The department also built a pumping system to suck contaminated water out of the aquifer and purify it. That process will continue until the entire aquifer is clean, in about 2023, Mr. Reising said.

When the site opens as a park, the landfill will be off-limits to the public. The remaining 930 acres will include hardwood forest, prairie and wetlands intended to recreate the area's natural environment before European settlers arrived in the early 1800's, Mr. Reising said.

Native bird species not seen in the area for decades, including bobolinks and dickcissels, have been spotted at Fernald, as have endangered species including the Indiana brown bat and Sloan's crayfish. Deer wander the roads, and great blue herons stand motionless in ponds.

Humans have started to return, too. For decades, home values around Fernald stagnated because no one wanted to live near a nuclear waste dump, Mr. Bierer said.

Now two subdivisions are under construction within a mile of Fernald.

"It seemed to take forever," Mr. Bierer said. "Basically we started with a huge environmental disaster and ended up with an environmental asset."

Derailed Train Spills Hazardous Chemical, Hundreds Evacuated In Crawford, Texas (AP)

AP, September 20, 2006

CRAWFORD, Texas — A train derailed and spilled a hazardous liquid Tuesday night, prompting about half the population of Crawford to temporarily evacuate, officials said.

President Bush's ranch is several miles away from the town and was not near the area evacuated. Bush was not at the ranch at the time of the spill.

More than 300 people were told to stay away from their homes for about four hours before they were allowed to return at 10 p.m., said Crawford Police Chief Donnie Tidmore.

No injuries were reported after the train spilled ethanolamine, said Joe Faust, spokesman for BNSF Railway.

The chemical is a colorless flammable liquid that can irritate the eyes, skin and respiratory system, according to a report on the Occupational Safety and Health Administration Web site.

"We're monitoring the air and the air is clear right now, so we're OK on that front," Tidmore said by phone from the scene.

The cause of the derailment was under investigation.

"One of the train engineers said he saw one of the cars starting to wobble and everything went from there," Tidmore said.

About 700 people live in Crawford, a central Texas city about 15 miles west of Waco.

Dumb As We Wanna Be (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

São Paulo, Brazil

I asked Dr. José Goldemberg, secretary for the environment for São Paulo State and a pioneer of Brazil's ethanol industry, the obvious question: Is the fact that the U.S. has imposed a 54-cents-a-gallon tariff to prevent Americans from importing sugar ethanol from Brazil "just stupid or really stupid."

Thanks to pressure from Midwest farmers and agribusinesses, who want to protect the U.S. corn ethanol industry from competition from Brazilian sugar ethanol, we have imposed a stiff tariff to keep it out. We do this even though Brazilian sugar ethanol provides eight times the energy of the fossil fuel used to make it, while American corn ethanol provides only 1.3 times the energy of the fossil fuel used to make it. We do this even though sugar ethanol reduces greenhouses gases more than corn ethanol. And we do this even though sugar cane ethanol can easily be grown in poor tropical countries in Africa or the Caribbean, and could actually help alleviate their poverty.

Yes, you read all this right. We tax imported sugar ethanol, which could finance our poor friends, but we don't tax imported crude oil, which definitely finances our rich enemies. We'd rather power anti-Americans with our energy purchases than promote antipoverty.

"It's really stupid," answered Dr. Goldemberg.

If I seem upset about this, I am. Development and environmental experts have long searched for environmentally sustainable ways to alleviate rural poverty — especially for people who live in places like Brazil, where there is a constant temptation to log the Amazon. Sure, ecotourism and rain forest soap are nice, but they never really scale. As a result, rural people in Brazil are always tempted go back to logging or farming sensitive areas.

Ethanol from sugar cane could be a scalable, sustainable alternative — if we are smart and get rid of silly tariffs, and if Brazil is smart and starts thinking right now about how to expand its sugar cane biofuel industry without harming the environment.

The good news is that sugar cane doesn't require irrigation and can't grow in much of the Amazon, because it is too wet. So if the Brazilian sugar industry does realize its plan to grow from 15 million to 25 million acres over the next few years, it need not threaten the Amazon.

However, sugar cane farms are located mostly in south-central Brazil, around São Paulo, and along the northeast coast, on land that was carved out of drier areas of the Atlantic rain forest, which has more different species of plants and animals per acre than the Amazon. Less than 7 percent of the total Atlantic rain forest remains — thanks to sugar, coffee, orange plantations and cattle grazing.

I flew in a helicopter over the region near São Paulo, and what I saw was not pretty: mansions being carved from forested hillsides near the city, rivers that have silted because of logging right down to the banks, and wide swaths of forest that have been cleared and will never return.

"It makes you weep," said Gustavo Fonseca, my traveling companion, a Brazilian and the executive vice president of Conservation International. "What I see here is a totally human dominated system in which most of the biodiversity is gone."

As demand for sugar ethanol rises — and that is a good thing for Brazil and the developing world, said Fonseca, "we have to make sure that the expansion is done in a planned way."

Over the past five years, the Amazon has lost 7,700 square miles a year, most of it for cattle grazing, soybean farming and palm oil. A similar expansion for sugar ethanol could destroy the cerrado, the Brazilian savannah, another incredibly species-rich area, and the best place in Brazil to grow more sugar.

A proposal is floating around the Brazilian government for a major expansion of the sugar industry, far beyond even the industry's plans. No wonder environmental activists are holding a conference in Germany this fall about the impact of biofuels. I could see some groups one day calling for an ethanol boycott — à la genetically modified foods — if they feel biofuels are raping the environment.

We have the tools to resolve these conflicts. We can map the lands that need protection for their biodiversity or the environmental benefits they provide rural communities. But sugar farmers, governments and environmentalists need to sit down early — like now — to identify those lands and commit the money needed to protect them. Otherwise, we will have a fight over every acre, and sugar ethanol will never realize its potential. That would be really, really stupid.

Federal Regulators Eye Video Bingo (AP-Y)

By Erica Werner, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 20, 2006

At some Indian casinos, they're not playing your grandmother's church basement bingo anymore. Now the game is video bingo, played at blinking, whirring consoles virtually indistinguishable from slot machines.

Slots are subject to state approval and limits. Bingo machines aren't.

Concerned that tribes are blurring the line between the two, federal regulators are trying to clarify the difference.

New rules proposed by the National Indian Gaming Commission would slow play at video bingo terminals, mandate more player participation and require screen space to be devoted to a bingo display, making it more clear to customers that they are playing bingo rather than a slot machine.

But the draft rules face angry opposition from Indian tribes. Some rely on video bingo to supplement their state-allowed quota of slot machines, or they use the devices because they can't get state permission to run slots.

The Lytton Band hasn't won permission from California lawmakers for slot machines. It gets all its revenue from 937 electronic bingo machines. Tribal officials fear such machines would no longer be allowed under the new rules, and the slower machines that would be permitted wouldn't appeal to gamblers.

"It's really termination for my people," Mejia said.

Mejia was one of a series of tribal officials offering emotional testimony against the proposed rules, which come as tribal gambling has exploded into a $22 billion-a-year industry.

Perhaps 20 percent of that revenue comes from video bingo and similar machines, the Indian gaming commission says, the rest from slots and other Nevada-style games. The commission estimates there are some 50,000 video bingo machines at hundreds of Indian casinos around the country.

Video bingo is far less lucrative than slot machines. But since some tribes can't get state permission for slots or are limited to a certain number of such machines, they want to be able to offer the most profitable video bingo they can.

Video bingo games with names like Triple Double Red Hot 7s and Double Diamond Run Bingo are marketed based on their similarity to slot machines.

As with slots, a gambler punches a button to set reels spinning. But tribes say the machines are still fundamentally bingo because they require at least two gamblers to play each other over a linked network.

But National Indian Gaming Commission Chairman Phil Hogen said that if his agency doesn't act to delineate the difference between video bingo and slots, the two will grow so indistinguishable that states might seek to control bingo.

The Justice Department has also tangled with tribes over whether video bingo is allowed, underscoring the need for more certainty, Hogen said.

"To say that the line is already clear, I so wish that were true. I would have spent the last three years a whole lot different than I did if that were true," Hogen told tribal leaders. "Clarity I continue to think is needed."

The commission's draft rules, open for public comment until Sept. 30, require gamblers to press a bingo machine's buttons more than once, as now can happen. There are seconds-long delays built in, instead of play happening nearly instantaneously. Fifty percent of a machine's screen must be displayed as bingo, and the machine must be clearly labeled as bingo.

"The games that would be permitted under the proposed regulations would be extraordinarily expensive to produce and have little commercial viability" said Charlie Lombardo, vice president of gaming operations with the Seminole Tribe of Florida. The proposal is "very unfair to tribes."

Mexico Pledges To Extradite Drug Lords (AP)

By Marjorie Olster, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 20, 2006

President Vicente Fox said Tuesday that Mexico is willing to extradite any drug lord in its custody wanted by the United States.

Fox said Mexico currently has 16 "big leaders" of drug gangs in jail along with 75,000 lower level members of various cartels.

"We are fighting hard and attaining very important results," Fox said of Mexico's fight against drug dealers. He was speaking at a news conference in New York where he was attending the United Nations General Assembly.

The U.S. is believed to have requested the extradition of at least three suspected drug kingpins: Benjamin Arellano Felix of the Arellano Felix smuggling syndicate; Osiel Cardenas, reputed head of the Gulf Cartel; and Hector "El Guero" Palma, a reputed leader of the Sinaloa drug cartel.

"We will extradite all of those who have pending matters with U.S. justice," Fox said.

It was the first time Mexico's president had made such a sweeping commitment to send wanted drug lords to face charges in the U.S.

Mexico extradited its first major drug lord - accused kingpin Francisco Rafael Arellano Felix - to the United States over the weekend. Before that, Mexico had often balked at sending drug kingpins, arguing they should face justice in Mexico and refusing to send anyone to the U.S. who would face the death penalty.

Mexico's extradition of the man who once ran the Arellano Felix drug clan was a victory for U.S. officials who have been pushing Mexico to send them more drug lords.

After serving a 10-year sentence in Mexico, Arellano Felix was loaded into a helicopter to the Mexican border town of Matamoros, then flown across and handed over to Texas officials in Brownsville. He will be taken to California to face trial on charges stemming from a 1980 case in which he allegedly sold cocaine to an undercover police officer in the United States.

U.S. authorities requested Arellano Felix's extradition on June 2, 2003. A federal judge approved that request in 2004, but it took two years for the Foreign Relations Department approve the extradition.

Mexico has fought many extraditions in the past, arguing that suspects must face justice here first. It also has refused to extradite suspects who face the death penalty in other countries.

Capital punishment is illegal here, and a 1978 extradition treaty with the United States allows Mexico to deny extradition if a person faces the death penalty in another country.

In November, Mexico's Supreme Court removed an obstacle that had prevented many of the country's most notorious criminals from facing U.S. justice when it overturned a 4-year ban on the extradition of suspects facing life in prison.

Mexico last year extradited 41 suspected criminals to the United States, up from 34 in 2004; 31 in 2003; 25 in 2002; 17 in 2001; and 12 in 2000, according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

UPI, September 19, 2006

U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency officials said they discovered a tunnel running 400 feet along the U.S.-Mexican border used by traffickers to smuggle drugs.

The tunnel, about 20 feet underground, reportedly was outfitted with lights and had a concrete floor, resembling in sophistication the tunnel authorities discovered last January that led from Mexico into a California border town, El Universal reported Tuesday.

Today's discovery is yet more evidence of the desperation that drug traffickers are feeling as law enforcement efforts continue to impede the flow of drugs into the U.S., said DEA agent John Fernandes.

Man Linked To Cross-border Tunnel Pleads Not Guilty To Marijuana Possession (SDUT)

By By Anna Cearley, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, September 19, 2006

A man linked to the cross-border tunnel that was found Friday in Calexico has pleaded not guilty to possessing about 1,000 pounds of marijuana found in a truck he was driving.

Jesus Bernardo Aguila Agundez made his plea at the El Centro federal courthouse Monday, according to U.S. authorities.

Aguila's arrest Friday paved the way for U.S. investigators to obtain a search warrant that same day to enter a Calexico house from which the truck had reportedly been seen leaving.

Inside, they found a 400-foot-long cross-border tunnel with lighting, ventilation and a water pump system. Mexican authorities, notified of the tunnel, found its opening in a house on the Mexicali side of the border.

Drug Enforcement Administration special agent Dan Simmons wouldn't say how a multiagency task force had grown suspicious about the Calexico house.

U.S. authorities were conducting surveillance for several weeks on cars leaving the house on East Second Street, according to court records.

On Friday, they watched a blue truck back halfway into the house's garage and someone load unidentified items onto it, according to the records.

They followed the truck to a swap meet and afterward.

Calexico police then stopped the truck and found 100 packages of marijuana covered by a tarp, according to the records.

No arrests were reported on the Mexican side, but officials there did find marijuana residue on their side of the tunnel, according to a news release from the Mexican Attorney General's Office.

The Arellano Felix drug cartel has been linked to drug tunnels in the past, but Mexican and U.S. authorities wouldn't say whether this tunnel was used by a particular group.

The Mexicali region's drug network is believed to be mostly controlled by suspected drug traffickers Ismael Zambada and Joaquin Guzman, who are rivals of the Arellanos.

The tunnel's interior dimensions were 3½ feet by 4 feet, and it had been built about 20 feet underground, according to agency spokesman Simmons. There was about 8 inches of standing water in the tunnel, and a pump was found on the Mexican side, he said.

Such pumps are often found in tunnels where underground water tends to seep into the spaces.

The tunnel had been reinforced with wooden beams and planks. U.S. authorities also found four skateboards that may have been used to scoot the drugs through the tunnel, which had a concrete floor.

“I don't see a bunch of kids practicing with their skateboards down there,” Simmons said.

Drug Ring's Bi-state Tactic (PAET)

By Tom Quigley, The Express-times

Easton Express-Times, September 20, 2006

Made deals in Easton, fled to P'burg, officials say. Scheme meant to thwart police, investigators allege.

PHILLIPSBURG | A $17,000-a-week cocaine ring dismantled by federal and local investigators made about half its drug sales in the Easton area, a federal Drug Enforcement Agency spokesman said Tuesday.

A six-month investigation led to the arrests of 30 people facing charges ranging from state drug possession charges to federal charges of conspiracy to distribute cocaine.

DEA spokesman Douglas S. Collier said the cocaine dealers tried to use the state line between New Jersey and Pennsylvania to thwart local investigators.

"The leaders of this crack cocaine distribution network were Keisha Fredericks and Edward Rayshawn Carter, also known as Sugar Ray," Collier said.

He said the investigation was dubbed "Operation Stateline" because investigators saw several members of the distribution ring crossing between the two states.

Collier explained the dealers would sell in Pennsylvania and then retreat to what they considered the safety of Phillipsburg.

Investigators seized about three pounds of cocaine and $17,000 in cash. The cash was seized from Tim "Big Daddy" Hartwell as he tried to elude capture, authorities allege.

The federal charges against the seven carry possible life sentences, authorities said Tuesday. Plea negotiations with the U.S. Attorney's Office are ongoing, court records show.

Defense attorney Scott Alan Krasny represents Edward Rayshawn Carter and is the lead attorney in the federal case. He did not return a phone message left Tuesday at his West Trenton, N.J., office.

Twenty-three area residents face state drug charges linked to the investigation.

"We're not going away," Collier said.

DOJ_NMG_0065905

Phillipsburg Police Chief Robert Mirabelli said his investigators and patrol officers took part in the investigation. The chief thanked the DEA agents involved in the investigation.

"I do believe it's had a significant impact in Phillipsburg," Mirabelli said.

The chief said now the job involves continued work to prevent others from coming into town to replace those arrested.

The Warren County Prosecutor's Office Multi-Jurisdictional Narcotics Task Force also participated in the investigation.

Federal investigators monitored cell phones, employed confidential informants, videotaped drug transactions, and made undercover drug buys as they infiltrated the underbelly of Phillipsburg's drug trade, according to court records.

The undercover investigation began in March.

A confidential informant told DEA agents that Edward Rayshawn Carter, Ray Edward Carter, Armstrong and Groover were selling large quantities of crack in and around Phillipsburg, federal records show.

Fredericks was under surveillance for months after authorities obtained a court order to tap her cell phone, records show.

Those facing criminal charges in Warren County include the son of 40-year-old Phillipsburg resident Donald O'Grady -- one of two men charged with the robbery-murder of an elderly Phillipsburg woman last month.

The ongoing investigation is part of the DEA's Mobile Enforcement Teams program. The program was developed in 1995 as a response to drug-related violence in neighborhoods.

Other agencies involved in the investigation were the Easton Police Department, Belvidere Police Department, FBI, Greenwich Township Police Department, New Jersey State Police, Pohatcong Township Police Department, Washington Borough Police Department and Warren County Sheriff's Office.

Officials Release Details On Drug Ring (MORNCALL)

The Morning Call, September 20, 2006

A crack cocaine ring based in Phillipsburg made sales on both sides of the Delaware River to stymie local police as well as rake in money, state and federal officials said Tuesday.

But any advantage the organization hoped to gain by moving across the Pennsylvania-New Jersey border collapsed this summer, the authorities said. The crack ring, believed to be the largest in rural Warren County, was put out of business six months after federal agents began using wiretaps and making undercover buys.

"They tried to manipulate the system, using the state line as their protector and shield," said Douglas S. Collier, a special agent with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration in Newark, N.J. "They were doing operations in Pennsylvania and going back to New Jersey feeling safe."

Unfortunately for the ring, Collier said, law enforcement officials on both sides of the Delaware began sharing information on what their patrol officers were seeing.

What the local police saw led to Operation Stateline, an investigation that netted 30 people on drug charges, including seven on federal charges carrying potential life prison sentences, Collier said. It also netted three pounds of crack and $17,000 in cash.

At a news conference in the Phillipsburg Municipal Building, police chiefs and other Warren County law enforcement officials lined up near an organizational chart with pictures of the seven suspects in the federal case. All have been in prison since July, when they were arrested and indicted.

About half of the ring's business was in the Easton area, Collier said. Easton Police Chief Larry Palmer had been invited to the news conference but was unable to attend.

Three Northampton County residents were among those arrested, and two who were labeled "distributors" on the organizational chart were named in federal indictments: Tim Hartwell, 33, of 2263 Rogers St., Bethlehem, and Pasqual Colon, 27, of 606 Berwick St., Easton.

Kristi Riegel, 23, of 907 Bushkill St., Easton, was among the 23 people arrested on state drug charges in Warren County, officials said.

The ring bought cocaine from suppliers at wholesale prices, ranging from $28,000 to $35,000 per kilogram, Collier said, and "cooked it up into cocaine base," known as crack. Distributors provided the crack to dealers, who sold it on the street for $5 to $10 per "rock."

Street prices for a kilogram's worth of the drug totaled well over $100,000, Collier said, bringing the ring exponential returns on its investment.

The main targets of the federal investigation were Phillipsburg residents Keisha Fredericks and Edward Rayshawn Carter, whose pictures were at the top of the organizational chart.

A glimpse into the ring's sales and production methods is contained in the federal indictment against Fredericks in a section detailing an April 26 drug deal being made over a cell phone.

When the caller asked if there was crack for sale, the indictment states, Fredericks said she had it but that "we's just chefin' it," meaning cooking the cocaine into crack.

Fredericks told the caller she needed about 20 minutes to finish cooking before heading over to a convenience store parking lot, where she later sold an ounce of crack for $1,500, the indictment states.

Collier declined to say where the ring bought cocaine wholesale, saying it came from "different sources." He said the investigation is pending.

"We're not going away," he said. "We have a lot of work to do."

Drug Ring Defendant Is Sentenced To Prison (SFC)

By Henry K. Lee, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, September 20, 2006

22 had been accused of conspiring to deal cocaine and heroin

One of the last of 22 defendants named in a 2004 federal grand jury indictment accusing them of conspiring to distribute cocaine and heroin from West Oakland was sentenced Monday to more than five years in prison.

At a hearing in Oakland, U.S. District Judge Claudia Wilken ordered Joel Diaz, 35, of Oakland to serve 63 months in prison. In April, Diaz pleaded guilty to possession with intent to distribute and distribution of cocaine while aiding and abetting.

The group was based in an area known as the Lower Bottom near 15th and Center streets in West Oakland, where drug disputes led to 10 homicides in the vicinity from 1996 until a federal complaint led to arrests in 2004, FBI Special Agent Sandra Maier wrote in an affidavit.

The charges, based largely on wiretapped phone conversations and undercover surveillance, were the result of an investigation that included Oakland police, the FBI, the Drug Enforcement Administration and state narcotics agents.

Of 22 defendants named in the complaint, most of them were indicted by a federal grand jury in Oakland. Federal prosecutors ultimately dropped charges against three defendants, court records show.

Over the past two years, the majority of those indicted have been sent to federal prison with sentences ranging from nine days to 14 years, records show.

Among those now in prison are James Edward Morrison Jr., 37, of Richmond, a convicted rapist and drug dealer known as "Chewy" who received a 10-year sentence, and Irvin Anthony Albert, 35, of San Jose, a convicted rapist known as "Tone Capone" who was sentenced to 14 years in prison.

On Sept. 11, another defendant, Henry Fryson, 42, whose nickname is "Biggie," was sentenced to more than nine years in prison. The last defendant, Mike Randall, is to be sentenced in November.

Typically, authorities have seen a "revolving door" of suspects who are back on the streets relatively quickly after being placed on county probation. Many served shorter stints in local jails where convicts could arrange drug deals or even executions from behind bars.

Drug dealers who are sent to federal court often face longer sentences and are sent to prisons across the country, far from friends and family, authorities say.

"You're going to feel totally isolated in every way from your way of life," said Officer Roland Holmgren, Oakland police spokesman. "If you continue on this path of violence and destruction, there's now warnings -- this is it."

Authorities are using the same tactic in North Richmond, where 15 suspected members or associates of the Project Trojan street gang were indicted in March by a federal grand jury in Oakland on charges of cocaine and methamphetamine trafficking.

Suspect May Be Linked To Zetas (DMN)

By Sergio Chapa, Al Día

The Dallas Morning News, September 20, 2006

Lancaster: Lawyer says man denies smuggling guns for cartel enforcers

A Lancaster man arrested late last week for being a felon in possession of a firearm is part of a network that provides weapons to the drug cartel enforcers known as the Zetas, according to court documents and testimony.

Members of a local task force with the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives arrested Erasmo Arciba, 42, near his Franklin Street home Thursday. The arrest came after a five-month investigation into handguns and assault rifles that were bought in the Dallas-Fort Worth area and delivered to Mexico's Gulf cartel.

Mr. Arciba's attorney, Carlton McLarty, said his client – who is being held without bail pending a Thursday hearing – admits to being a felon in possession of guns but denies being part of an international weapons smuggling ring.

In a court hearing Monday, Dallas police Officer Paul Freese told U.S. Magistrate Judge William F. Sanderson that Mr. Arciba's case is part of an ongoing investigation of the Zetas' local connections, including weapons trafficking.

The Zetas, a paramilitary group that murders rivals and collect debts on behalf of the Gulf drug cartel, have been linked to crimes in Mexico and the U.S., including at least three killings in the Dallas area first reported in The Dallas Morning News.

Officer Freese testified in court that Mr. Arciba is affiliated with a group "that sends weapons to Mexico and Zetas ... but he is not a member" of the Zetas.

Mr. Arciba "is a hardworking person in town" who runs a construction business out of his Lancaster home, Mr. McLarty said. "He admitted to having the guns and should be granted bond."

Police say Angilita Ortiz, 21, of Grand Prairie helped Mr. Arciba buy at least two FN Herstal 5.7 USG guns from a pawnshop in the 2900 block of West Northwest Highway in Dallas on Sept. 8 and Thursday.

A probable-cause affidavit filed in the case states that Zetas use the same type of handgun as "one of their weapons of choice" and that ATF agents have watched over the purchase of the Belgian-made weapons in the Dallas area.

The pawnshop owner declined to comment on the case Tuesday, but an affidavit states that he informed ATF investigators of the purchases, because Ms. Ortiz bought two of the same type of handgun for self-defense in a short period of time and did not buy ammunition.

Officer Freese testified that guns of the same brand bought by Ms. Ortiz were used in a shootout between Zetas and Mexican federal agents in June and that ATF officials determined those weapons came from Dallas.

Ms. Ortiz did not respond to an interview request. She has not been charged with a crime.

The affidavit states that Mr. Arciba recruited Ms. Ortiz to buy guns for him, because he served 60 months in prison for a 1991 drug trafficking case in East St. Louis, Ill.

According to federal law, an ex-felon cannot purchase or be in possession of a firearm.

Tom Crowley, ATF regional spokesperson, said arms trafficking is more common along the border, but there have been several gun-purchasing cases similar to the Arciba case in Dallas-Fort Worth. Mr. Crowley said those weapons were sold to criminals in Mexico.

Mr. Crowley said Tuesday that ATF officials are still trying to determine how many weapons were funneled into Mexico by Mr. Arciba and his associates.

According to the affidavit, ATF agents followed Mr. Arciba and Ms. Ortiz when they left Bachman Pawn and Guns on Sept. 14.

He admitted to having possession of the gun she purchased earlier in the day and had it with him. He also told agents he had three more in his garage.

According to the affidavit, Mr. Arciba told investigators that the other FN Herstal gun – the one Ms. Ortiz bought Sept. 8 – ended up in Mexico.

The News was among the first news organizations to report on the existence of the Zetas and their enforcement role for the Gulf cartel. The organization has been engaged in a bloody turf war with rival cartels along the Texas-Mexico border and elsewhere in Mexico.

Cause Of Blaze Stumps Officials (JOHNSTD)

By Mike Faher, The Tribune-Democrat

Johnstown (PA) Tribune-Democrat, September 20, 2006

More than a week after fire leveled a popular Johnstown bar, investigators say they have no idea what caused the blaze.

And local officials have called in some outside help: The federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives has dispatched agents to assist at the 1167 Franklin St. site formerly occupied by Lamont's.

But city police Chief Craig Foust cautioned that an ATF presence does not mean anyone has determined that the fire is suspicious in origin.

"It's not unusual to bring (federal investigators) in if there's a lot of damage," Foust said. "It's a challenging scene because of the extent of the damage."

Lamont's burned to the ground early Sept. 12.

City firefighters said they found the structure fully engulfed when they arrived around 3:30 a.m. The intensity of the flames and proximity of overhead power lines prevented emergency crews from getting inside.

City police and fire personnel, a state police fire marshal and now ATF representatives are involved in the probe.

"(ATF agents) have investigative skills that may help us," Johnstown fire Chief Anthony Kovacic said. "It's just additional assistance."

Foust said investigators have ruled out nothing, including the possibility that the blaze was accidental.

"That's the whole purpose of the investigation – to find out what happened," he said.

The fire scene remains under 24-hour guard. Foust said that protection was arranged by property owner Lamont Crocco's insurance company, not by city officials.

Crocco, who has said he was the last to leave the bar before the fire, has vowed to rebuild there. He operated Lamont's for 24 years.

IMMIGRATION:

Calif. Woman Admits Nazi Link (AP)

AP, September 20, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- An 83-year-old woman who admitted she had served as a guard at a concentration camp during World War II was deported to Germany, federal officials said Tuesday.

Prosecutors would not say how they learned about Elfriede Rinkel, but a department spokeswoman said investigators routinely compare guard rosters and other Nazi documents to U.S. immigration records.

Rinkel admitted in court documents that she worked as a prison guard at the Ravensbrueck camp near Furstenberg from June 1944 until the camp was abandoned by the Nazi government in April 1945. According to the U.S. Department of Justice, she worked with an SS-trained attack dog but was not a member of the Nazi party.

"Concentration camp guards such as Elfriede Rinkel played a vital role in the Nazi regime's horrific mistreatment of innocent victims," said Alice Fisher, a Justice Department lawyer. "This case reflects the government's unwavering commitment to remove Nazi persecutors from this country."

As part of her June agreement with prosecutors, Rinkel gave up her green card, moved to Germany and agreed never to return to the U.S., according to the court documents. The government agreed to not release information about Rinkel's case, which began in April, until after her departure. She left this month.

A call to her lawyer Tuesday wasn't immediately returned.

Rinkel's husband, a German Jew whom she married after coming to the U.S., died in 2004. Her brother and sister-in-law, when reached at their Northern California home, said they were unaware of Rinkel's past and believed her husband had been, too. The couple asked not to be identified by name because they feared a backlash from friends and family.

More than 130,000 women passed through Ravensbrueck's gates between 1939 and 1945; an estimated 40,000 survived, according to the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum.

In January 1945, it had more than 45,000 prisoners, mostly women. The camp had more than 150 female guards and was a major training site for female concentration camp staff.

Rinkel was a furrier by trade in her hometown of Leipzig, according to her younger brother, who fought for the German army in North Africa and was captured by U.S. troops. In 1950, the general who ran the prison camp in Wyoming where he was held helped Rinkel's brother permanently settle in the U.S.

Nine years later, the brother and sister-in-law sponsored Rinkel to come to the Bay Area where she met her husband, Fred Rinkel, at a German-American friendship club, according to the couple.

Fred Rinkel received a Jewish burial in San Francisco and his wife was to be interred next to him, but she has since changed those plans.

SF Woman Hid Nazi Past From Jewish Husband (OAKTRIB)

By Josh Richman

Oakland (CA) Tribune, September 20, 2006

Berkeley relatives shocked to learn of the 84-year-old woman's past as a concentration camp guard

An elderly San Francisco woman was deported to Germany this month after admitting she was a guard in a Nazi-operated concentration camp in the Third Reich's waning days, federal officials said Tuesday.

But although Elfriede Lina Rinkel, 84, now admits her terrible past, shocked Berkeley relatives said Tuesday she had hid her secret for more than 60 years even from them and apparently from her late husband -- a German Jew who'd fled the Holocaust himself.

Rinkel's brother and sister-in-law, longtime Berkeley residents who asked that their names not be published, said they just learned the truth Tuesday when reporters called them for comment.

"It knocked us off our feet," the sister-in-law said. "We have many, many Jewish friends who live in the Oakland/Berkeley area and this would be quite shocking to them as it was to us."

Rinkel -- charged under a federal law requiring removal of aliens who took part in acts of Nazi-sponsored persecution -- in June signed a settlement agreement with the government admitting that from June 1944 to April 1945 she was a guard at the Ravensbruck camp, built near Furstenburg, Germany almost exclusively for female prisoners.

Documents released Tuesday by the U.S. Department of Justice's Office of Special Investigations say she used a trained SS guard dog at the camp. The OSI also provided copies of her service card, taken from an SS records office, and bank records showing pay she received for her service at the camp.

Ravensbruck's construction began in late 1938, and the camp was liberated by the Russian Army on April 30, 1945, according to the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum. In the interim, an estimated 130,000 women and children were imprisoned there, of whom an estimated 90,000 died by starvation, execution, weakness or medical experimentation. The inmates came mostly from Poland and the occupied Soviet territories; almost 15 percent were Jewish.

Rinkel's husband, Fred William Rinkel, died in January 2004; his obituary said he was a longtime member of the Jewish service organization B'nai B'rith, and his funeral services were held at a Jewish memorial chapel.

The sister-in-law -- who said her husband didn't know of his sister's wartime activity, as he served in the German Army and was captured by U.S. troops in North Africa -- said Fred Rinkel almost certainly didn't know, either.

"He had to leave Germany during all that terrible stuff that happened there and had to relocate in Shanghai, a lot of the Jewish Germans went to Shanghai," she said, adding he was from a prominent Berlin family of doctors and lawyers, and had been training to become an opera singer before being forced to flee his homeland. He owned a San Francisco tie shop.

The government's charges, filed in April, say Elfriede Rinkel was born July 14, 1922 in Leipzig, Germany; served at the camp from 1944 to 1945; and applied for a U.S. immigrant visa Aug. 29, 1959 at the U.S. consulate in Frankfurt. The visa application instructed her to list all her residences from 1938 forward, but she omitted Ravensbruck.

Rinkel was admitted as an immigrant to the United States on or about Sept. 21, 1959 at San Francisco, the document says. Her sister-in-law, who with her husband had sponsored their sibling's immigration, said Tuesday Elfriede Rinkel met Fred Rinkel decades ago at a German-American

The Justice Department wouldn't discuss what Fred Rinkel knew or didn't know. "OSI is obviously aware of the background information on Fred Rinkel," spokeswoman Jaclyn Lesch said Tuesday. "We really can't speak beyond that... We're unable to speak to that subject."

The SS, or Schutzstaffel -- German for "protective squadron" -- was a large, elite security and military arm of the Nazi party; one of its duties was operating concentration camps.

"Thousands of innocent women were brutalized and murdered at Ravensbruck through the active participation of Elfriede Rinkel and other guards, whose principal function was to prevent prisoners from escaping the abominable conditions inside the camp," OSI director Eli Rosenbaum said in a news release issued Tuesday. "Her presence in the United States was an affront to surviving Holocaust victims who have made new homes in this country."

Her address as of this April was an apartment building on Bush Street at Powell, two blocks up Nob

Hill from Union Square.

"We did help her to close up her apartment and helped her to buy her airplane ticket and go to the airport and buy her luggage -- but never a word about why she was leaving," the sister-in-law said. "We thought she was going because her situation in her apartment had deteriorated."

Elfriede Rinkel had bad arthritis, she explained, and her apartment building's elevator was often out of service. "She said she just wanted to go back to Germany, and because she told us that, we believed her."

During a sworn interview last November, it says, Rinkel admitted she'd concealed her time at Ravensbruck for fear her application would be rejected. The settlement agreement she signed in June says she admits her work as a Ravensbruck guard, and that it's a deportable offense; she agreed to give up her green card, leave the country and never return, although after death her remains can be brought back here for burial.

The government agreed not to publicize the case until after she left the country, and not to assert that she was a Nazi Party member; the Justice Department reported Tuesday she returned to Germany this month.

Rep. Tom Lantos, D-San Mateo, the only Holocaust survivor ever elected to Congress, called the case's facts "chilling, compelling, and in some ways hard to fathom. But such is the nature of individuals linked to the Holocaust; so much of what happened is difficult but important to examine, even decades after humanity endured this nightmare."

Lantos applauded the German and U.S. governments for their efforts. "This process comes years too late for many who deserved to see their day in court, but at least it is now close at hand."

S.F. Immigrant Married Holocaust Survivor, Attended Synagogue (SFC)

By Demian Bulwa, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, September 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0065911

Those who knew San Francisco's Elfriede Rinkel never found it remarkable that the German immigrant would marry a Jewish survivor of the Holocaust, or attend synagogue with him, or plan to be buried next to him at a cemetery run by a Chevra Kadisha, a Jewish burial society that performs ritual purification.

On Tuesday, though, came a jarring twist: The U.S. Justice Department said the 84-year-old Rinkel had been deported to Germany, nearly half a century after she emigrated to the United States, because she had been a guard at a Nazi concentration camp in World War II where an estimated 90,000 people, many of them Jews, were exterminated.

"I think it may have been a type of atonement for her," her attorney, Alison Dixon, said of Elfriede's marriage to Fred Rinkel, who died two years ago. "My understanding is that she has also contributed to Jewish charities."

Dixon said Rinkel never told her husband that she had spent nearly a year as a guard at the Ravensbruck concentration camp in Germany, the only major Nazi camp for women.

She might not have told anyone in the United States -- including her brother and his wife, who dropped her off at San Francisco International Airport on Aug. 31. Rinkel told them she was returning to Germany because she was having problems with her apartment on Bush Street in downtown San Francisco. It wasn't until Tuesday that the couple learned the truth from reporters.

"I just don't have any words," said Rinkel's brother, an 82-year-old Berkeley resident who asked that his name be withheld because he is afraid of a possible backlash. "I don't have any feelings anymore. Life has given me too many things. I cannot accept it, let's just put it that way."

The government said Rinkel, a permanent resident alien who never applied for U.S. citizenship, had admitted after a two-year investigation that she had guarded female prisoners at Ravensbruck from June 1944 to April 1945, when the Nazis abandoned the camp to the advancing Allies. She now lives with her younger sister in the German city of Viersen, her brother said.

The Justice Department alleged that Rinkel had used attack dogs to march emaciated inmates to slave-labor sites. More than 130,000 women from dozens of countries -- Jews, gypsies and others -- were brought to Ravensbruck during its six years of existence. More than two-thirds of them died of malnourishment, in medical experiments and in a gas chamber, according to the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum.

Rinkel is the first woman prosecuted by the Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations, which was formed in 1979. The agency has won cases against 102 people who took part in Nazi persecution and has deported 62 of them.

Eli Rosenbaum, director of the office, would not say how the government found out about Rinkel. But he said staff historians have searched around the world for evidence such as rosters of Nazi guard units and mobile killing units, building a list of more than 70,000 names that are checked against immigration records and other documents.

"She was an integral part of the machinery of destruction and persecution at Ravensbruck," Rosenbaum said of Rinkel. "The message to would-be perpetrators of genocide and crimes against humanity is that if you dare to act on your fantasies of destruction, there is a real chance that what remains of the civilized world will pursue you for the rest of your life, even if you live for a very long time."

Attorney Dixon said Rinkel regretted her wartime actions. However, she added, "I was informed that it was not completely voluntary on her part. She answered a work ad. ... In Germany at that time, if you answered certain work ads and went to the interview and said you didn't want the job, they would put you in the camp yourself."

Rinkel admitted to the Justice Department's charges in part to avoid the publicity of a trial, Dixon said.

Rinkel's brother said he had fought in the German army and had been captured by U.S. forces in North Africa, and as a result he was in a prisoner-of-war at a camp in Wyoming when his sister allegedly worked at Ravensbruck. He emigrated to America in 1950 and nine years later petitioned for his sister to join him.

Rinkel soon met her future husband at an event for German Americans. They were a quiet couple and kept to themselves, her brother said.

Fred Rinkel, who grew up in a prominent family in Berlin, fled Germany with a brother as Nazi persecution of the Jews spread. He had trained to be an opera tenor in Germany, but after making his way to San Francisco he settled on a job as a singing waiter. Elfriede Rinkel worked as a furrier.

Fred Rinkel's past and Jewish heritage were important to him, according to those who knew him. He belonged to B'nai B'rith, one of the world's largest Jewish organizations.

He died of a heart attack Jan. 21, 2004, and was buried at the Eternal Home Cemetery in Colma. Elfriede Rinkel planned to be buried beside him, the cemetery said. It's not clear now whether that will still happen, although under an agreement with the Justice Department, she can be buried on U.S. soil.

An employee at Sinai Memorial Chapel, which owns the Colma cemetery, said those who met the Rinkels while they prepared for the end of their lives are in shock at the news.

"It's so easy to hate her and want to beat her up," said the employee, who asked that her name not be published. "But we were not there. We don't know what happened. Why did she marry a Jewish man? Maybe she loved him.

"The human soul is much more evil and good than it appears from the outside. There's a Russian expression that says you have to eat a kilogram of salt with someone before you begin to know them. There's just so much we don't know."

Border Fence Must Skirt Objections From Arizona Tribe (NYT)

By Randal C. Archibold

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

TOHONO O'ODHAM NATION, Ariz., Sept. 14 — The Senate is expected to vote Wednesday on legislation to build a double-layered 700-mile-long fence on the Mexican border, a proposal already approved by the House.

If the fence is built, however, it could have a long gap — about 75 miles — at one of the border's most vulnerable points because of opposition from the Indian tribe here.

More illegal immigrants are caught — and die trying to cross into the United States — in and around the Tohono O'odham Indian territory, which straddles the Arizona border, than any other spot in the state.

Tribal leaders have cooperated with Border Patrol enforcement, but they promised to fight the building of a fence out of environmental and cultural concerns.

For the Tohono O'odham, which means "desert people," the reason is fairly simple. For generations, their people and the wildlife they revere have freely crossed the border. For years, an existing four-foot-high cattle fence has had several openings — essentially cattle gates — that tribal members use to visit relatives and friends, take children to school and perform rites on the other side.

"I am O'odham first, and American or Mexican second or third," said Ramon Valenzuela, as he walked his two children to school through one gate two miles from his O'odham village in Mexico.

But the pushed-up bottom strands of the cattle fence and the surrounding desert littered with clothing, water jugs and discarded backpacks testify to the growth in illegal immigrant traffic, which surged here after a Border Patrol enforcement squeeze in California and Texas in the mid-1990's.

Crossers take advantage of a remote network of washes and trails — and sometimes Indian guides — to reach nearby highways bound for cities across the country.

Tribal members, who once gave water and food to the occasional passing migrant, say they have become fed up with groups of illegal immigrants breaking into homes and stealing food, water and clothing, and even using indoor and outdoor electrical outlets to charge cellphones.

With tribal police, health and other services overwhelmed by illegal immigration, the Indians welcomed National Guard members this summer to assist the Border Patrol here. The tribe, after negotiations with the Department of Homeland Security, also agreed to a plan for concrete vehicle barriers at the fence and the grading of the dirt road parallel to it for speedier Border Patrol and tribal police access. The Indians also donated a parcel this year for a small Border Patrol substation and holding pen.

Tribal members, however, fearing the symbolism of a solid wall and concern about the free range of deer, wild horses, coyotes, jackrabbits and other animals they regard as kin, said they would fight the kind of steel-plated fencing that Congress had in mind and that has slackened the crossing flow in previous hot spots like San Diego.

"Animals and our people need to cross freely," said Verlon Jose, a member of the tribal council representing border villages. "In our tradition we are taught to be concerned about every living thing as if they were people. We don't want that wall."

The federal government, the trustee of all Indian lands, could build the fence here without tribal permission, but that option is not being pressed because officials said it might jeopardize the tribe's cooperation on smuggling and other border crimes.

"We rely on them for cooperation and intelligence and phone calls about illegal activity as much as they depend on us to respond to calls," said Chuy Rodriguez, a spokesman for the Border Patrol in Tucson, who described overall relations as "getting better and better."

The Tohono number more than 30,000, including 14,000 on the Arizona tribal territory and 1,400 in Mexico. Building a fence would impose many challenges, apart from the political difficulties.

When steel fencing and other resources went up in California and Texas, migrant traffic shifted to the rugged terrain here, and critics say more fencing will simply force crossers to other areas without the fence. Or under it, as evidenced by the growth in the number of tunnels discovered near San Diego.

The shift in traffic to more remote, treacherous terrain has also led to hundreds of deaths of crossers, including scores on tribal land here.

The effort to curtail illegal immigration has proved especially difficult on the Tohono O'odham Nation, whose 2.8 million acres, about the size of Connecticut, make it the second largest in area.

Faced with poverty and unemployment, an increasing number of tribal members are turning to the smuggling of migrants and drugs, tribal officials say.

Just this year, the tribal council adopted a law barring the harboring of illegal immigrants in homes, a gesture to show it is taking a "zero tolerance" stand, said the tribal chairwoman, Vivian Juan-Saunders.

Two members of Ms. Juan-Saunders's family have been convicted of drug smuggling in the past several years, and she said virtually every family had been touched by drug abuse, smuggling or both.

Sgt. Ed Perez of the tribal police said members had been offered $400 per person to transport illegal immigrants from the tribal territory to Tucson, a 90-minute drive, and much more to carry drugs.

The Border Patrol and tribal authorities say the increase in manpower and technology is yielding results. Deaths are down slightly, 55 this year compared with 62 last year, and arrests of illegal immigrants in the Border Patrol sectors covering the tribal land are up about 10 percent.

But the influx of agents, many of whom are unfamiliar with the territory or Tohono ways, has brought complaints that the agents have interfered with tribal ceremonies, entered property uninvited and tried to block members crossing back and forth.

Ms. Juan-Saunders said helicopters swooped low and agents descended on a recent ceremony, apparently suspicious of a large gathering near the border, and she has complained to supervisors about agents speeding and damaging plants used for medicine and food.

Some traditional and activist tribal members later this month are organizing a conference among eight Indian nations on or near the border to address concerns here and elsewhere.

"We are in a police state," said Michael Flores, a tribal member helping to organize the conference. "It is not a tranquil place anymore."

Mr. Rodriguez acknowledged the concerns but said agents operated in a murky world where a rush of pickups from a border village just might be tribal members attending an all-night wake, or something else.

"Agents make stops based on what they see," he said. "Sometimes an agent sees something different from what tribal members or others see."

Agents, he added, are receiving more cultural training, including a new cultural awareness video just shot with the help of tribal members.

"Our relations have come a long way" in the past decade, he said.

Mr. Valenzuela said several agents knew him and waved as he traveled across the border, but others have stopped him, demanding identification. Once, he said, he left at home a card that identifies him as a tribal member and an agent demanded that he go back into Mexico and cross at the official port of entry in Sasabe, 20 miles away.

"I told him this is my land, not his," said Mr. Valenzuela, who was finally allowed to proceed after the agent radioed supervisors.

Mr. Valenzuela said he would not be surprised if a big fence eventually went up, but Ms. Juan-Saunders said she would affirm the tribe's concerns to Congress and the Homeland Security department. She said she would await final word on the fence and its design before taking action.

Members of Congress she has met, she said, "recognize we pose some unique issues to them, and that was really what we are attempting to do, to educate them to our unique situation."

The House last week approved a Republican-backed bill 238 to 138 calling for double-layer fencing along a third of the 2,000-mile-long border, roughly from Calexico, Calif., to Douglas, Ariz.

There is considerable support for the idea in the Senate, although President Bush's position on the proposal remains uncertain. The Homeland Security secretary, Michael Chertoff, has expressed doubts about sealing the border with fences.

Texas' U.S. Senators Oppose House Plan On Border Fence (FWST)

By Dave Montgomery

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, September 20, 2006

WASHINGTON - Texas' two senators expressed opposition Tuesday to House-passed legislation calling for more than 700 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border, including stretches in the Lone Star State.

"For Washington to try to dictate to places like Laredo, Texas, exactly where fences need to be built is, to my mind, ludicrous," said Sen. John Cornyn.

"I don't think Congress should be dictating that," Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison said.

The House voted 283-138 last week to construct large sections of double-layered fencing in the four states along the U.S.-Mexico border. The Senate, which previously called for more than 300 miles of fencing, may begin consideration of the measure Wednesday.

The bill is part of a broader package of border security initiatives advanced by the House Republican leadership and includes more than 230 miles of fencing in Texas at border cities such as El Paso, Laredo, Brownsville, Del Rio and Eagle Pass.

Hutchison and Cornyn, both Republicans, said they support toughened border security measures. While some new fencing may be necessary, they said, it should be part of a mix that would include added Border Patrol agents, high-tech surveillance and unmanned aerial vehicles.

They also said that the Homeland Security Department - not Congress - should determine that mix, in consultation with the affected states and based on the needs of each.

House leaders last week announced their border security initiatives, which include relatively noncontroversial features such as beefing up the Border Patrol, amid fading prospects for a more comprehensive overhaul of the nation's immigration laws.

A stalled Senate bill would create a foreign worker program and put millions of illegal immigrants on track toward permanent legal status and U.S. citizenship.

TAX:

Taxes And Justice (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

Prosecutors have been advertising their ballyhooed case against a pack of former KPMG partners as the largest criminal tax-shelter trial in history. They'd better do some scrambling for better evidence, however, or the case could end up becoming one of the biggest flops in Justice Department history.

Last week, a previously undisclosed memo from 2004 suggested that the IRS wasn't sure that the tax shelters at issue in the trial of 18 defendants even needed to be registered with the IRS. This revelation is important because the failure to register the shelters is one of the Justice Department's justifications for charging a conspiracy to defraud the IRS.

Separately, we've obtained an internal KPMG memo to Richard Smith, one of the defendants in the case. In that 2003 memo, IRS Acting Chief Counsel Emily Parker is cited as assuring KPMG "that there has been no criminal activity" in KPMG's marketing of the shelters. The defendants have claimed all along that they thought the shelters they were publicly marketing were entirely legal, and memos such as this one will certainly help the argument for "reasonable doubt."

As early as today, the defendants are expected to file for another delay of the trial on the basis of the 2004 IRS memo. Among other things, they will demand that prosecutors make available any other internal government documents that might tend to show that the tax shelters in question were not as fraudulent as the Justice Department claims.

Failure to produce evidence of this sort runs afoul of the 1963 Supreme Court decision Brady v. Maryland, which held that prosecutors have a duty to disclose exculpatory evidence in their possession. The KPMG prosecutors have already been rapped on the knuckles by federal Judge Lewis A. Kaplan for dragging their feet on the defendants' discovery requests, so this late revelation is unlikely to please the court.

In July, Judge Kaplan excluded from evidence the statements of two defendants on the grounds that they had been coerced by the government. That order has led to a series of motions, still pending, on what other evidence should be excluded and how much of a case remains against the two in the absence of their statements.

And in the latest sign that this case is unlikely to go to trial in January, if ever, KPMG this week requested a delay in a related civil trial over the payment of legal fees for its former employees. That trial had been scheduled for October in hopes of resolving that question before the criminal trial is supposed to start. In June, Judge Kaplan ruled that the government had violated the defendants' Sixth Amendment rights to counsel by coercing KPMG to cut off legal support to its former employees. Justice is appealing that ruling, with a hearing expected in November.

At the time of that June ruling, Judge Kaplan wrote that he would not yet consider dismissing the case, in part because he hoped the legal-fee issue could be resolved prior to trial. But if KPMG's aggressive filing on Monday is any indication, there will be no quick fix here.

KPMG not only argued that it was not required to pay for the defense of the 16 defendants that formerly worked there, but that Judge Kaplan had no jurisdiction to even consider the question and, what's more, that the defendants owed the company millions of dollars for getting it in trouble in the first place. Never mind that KPMG benefited from the marketing of those shelters and had defended them right up until the time it cut a deferred-prosecution deal that included throwing those partners over the side.

So let's sum up this case to date: In the year since the indictments were handed down, Judge Kaplan has ruled that the prosecutors violated the defendants' Fifth and Sixth Amendment rights. He has found the prosecutors delinquent in responding to document requests from the defendants' lawyers. And he has excluded evidence that he found to have been coerced, as well as the "fruit" of that coerced evidence. None of this speaks well of Justice's respect for due process.

More broadly still, the evidence that is coming to light suggests that the legality of these tax shelters was a subject of debate within the government itself. Justice nonetheless decided, for the first time, to prosecute such a case before the IRS had ever won a ruling in tax court declaring the shelters to be illegal. We have no brief for tax evasion, but mere tax avoidance is not a crime. This newspaper first raised questions about due process and the underlying legal theory in this case a year ago, when the first defendants were indicted. Increasingly, those concerns are being borne out.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

A Paper Trail Leading To A Fight (WP)

By Cindy Skrzycki

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

Susan E. Dudley, President Bush's nominee to become his new regulatory review chief, has written extensively about federal rulemaking for years, a miles-long paper trail that is providing ammunition for her opponents.

Business supporters say Dudley, director of regulatory studies at George Mason University's Mercatus Center, is experienced, analytical and dispassionate in expressing her belief that the market will correct most problems and that rules should be subject to a tough cost-benefit test. Public interest groups fighting the nomination say those writings disqualify her for the job.

The new job, administrator of the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs at the White House's Office of Management and Budget , is an important one. It makes final decisions on which major federal regulations are approved, which are sent back for more work and which never see the light of day.

With so much at stake, many participants expect the same kind of fight that the previous administrator, John D. Graham, faced five years ago, one that brought him 37 "nay" votes on his confirmation in the Senate.

OMB Watch , a foundation-funded, liberal nonprofit group that monitors federal regulatory policy, will oppose an executive nomination for the first time, said Gary Bass , the group's executive director. "This time, we will come out swinging," he said.

OMB Watch and Public Citizen , the consumer advocacy group founded by Ralph Nader , released a 68-page report last week using Dudley's writings to attack her. It chastised her for ties to corporate donors and for what it called "Dudleynomics," an emphasis on free-market solutions to health and safety issues at the public's expense.

The study said Dudley has suggested that the Environmental Protection Agency leave it up to individual communities to control arsenic in their water; that publicly releasing information on toxics may be more costly than it's worth; and that regulators' "one-size-fits-all" approach to vehicle airbags eliminates consumer choice.

The Mercatus Center called the report "incomplete and biased" against Dudley and the center.

Dudley's backers point to what they call her personal commitment to environmental stewardship, noting that she and her husband, Brian Mannix, the EPA's associate administrator for policy, economics and innovation, drove hybrid cars before hybrids were cool. Her profile on the Mercatus Center Web site says she enjoys hiking, canoeing and fly fishing.

Business lobbyists say the 51-year-old Dudley's experience working at EPA and the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs gives her an insider's view of regulation.

"She is very articulate and has a great read on the issues," said William Kovacs , vice president of environment, technology and regulatory affairs at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

Graham, the former regulatory review chief who is now dean of RAND Corp. 's graduate school in Santa Monica, Calif., said Dudley was a "superb choice" because she has hands-on experience at federal agencies, is an academic and has made scholarly contributions to the literature on regulation.

Under Dudley, who was paid $115,000 for the year ending August 2005, according to Mercatus's tax return, her group has analyzed a broad swath of regulatory initiatives, including growth in rulemaking expenditures and staffing. (She also wrote a mixed review of this writer's 2003 book on regulation.)

The center -- whose board of directors includes Edwin Meese , attorney general under President Ronald Reagan ; Vernon Smith , a George Mason professor who shared the Nobel Prize for economics in 2002; and Charles Koch , chief executive of Koch Industries Inc . -- regards regulations as a hidden tax on American consumers. It has urged the Bush administration to pay more attention to market solutions and allow Americans to make their own choices about the need for regulation.

Koch Industries is a privately held oil and gas company in Wichita that has contributed to the Republican Party and conservative causes for years. Its foundation has given millions to Mercatus, including $2 million in the last fiscal year, according to the center.

The center's clout in the regulatory arena is clear. When Bush took office, his administration asked for suggestions on which regulations might be changed, eliminated or improved. Mercatus responded with 44 proposals, and more than a dozen were implemented. At the time, business lobbyists said they were dumbfounded at the reach of the small group of policy wonks at Mercatus.

"Everyone thought Graham was a true believer, but there were limits beyond where even he would go," said Robert Shull , deputy directory for auto safety and regulatory policy at Public Citizen, which also opposed Graham. "I don't know if there are any limits with Dudley. She has a really distorted view of economics."

"She is rock solid," said Thomas Sullivan , chief counsel in the Small Business Administration 's Office of Advocacy . Sullivan said Dudley's prolific paper trail will be an asset, not a liability, "because it gives amazing insight into her philosophy."

With little time left in this session of Congress, experts on both sides are betting that a Dudley confirmation hearing, not yet scheduled, will become a proxy for the administration's record on regulation but will not lead to a Senate vote. More likely, they say, is a recess appointment after Congress adjourns. If that comes early next year, Dudley would be able to serve until the end of the Bush administration.

House Demands Student Search Policies (AP)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod

AP, September 20, 2006

The House issued an ultimatum to school boards Tuesday: Establish policies on student searches or risk losing federal funds.

The House passed a bill by voice vote that would require the search rules. The Senate has not yet considered a companion measure.

"Shocking acts of violence have been planned and unfortunately executed at our schools," said Rep. Geoff Davis, R-Ky., a sponsor of the bill. He said the measure would help curb violence.

The legislation relies on a standard for school searches that was established in a 1985 Supreme Court ruling.

The bill states that the policies implemented by school boards should spell out that searches have to be conducted by a full-time teacher or school officials acting on a reasonable suspicion that a student has weapons, drugs or other dangerous materials. The bill says search methods cannot be "excessively intrusive."

Rep. Mark Kirk, R-Ill., another sponsor of the bill, said teachers in his district are looking for guidelines. "They want to search the book bags, and the policies are not clear," he said.

The bill has the backing of the National Education Association, the largest teachers union. But the American Teachers Federation, another teachers union, called the measure unnecessary and said it might put additional burdens on teachers.

California Rep. George Miller, the senior Democrat on the House committee that oversees education issues, called the legislation an intrusion into local affairs.

"Schools and school districts already have policies in place regarding student searches," Miller said. "Those policies are the product of consultation with local administrators, teachers and parents. They take in the concerns of the community."

Mary Kusler, a lobbyist for the American Association of School Administrators, said her group opposes the bill. She said she is concerned it is a political stunt to help Davis win a tough re-election campaign against a former member of Congress, Democratic Rep. Ken Lucas.

"We worry that it's just election-year messaging, and we don't think that's a good reason to pass a bill," Kusler said.

In his effort to pass the bill, Davis cited an Education Department report that said 29 percent of high school students in 2003 reported drugs were made available to them. Nine percent of students were threatened or injured with a weapon on school property, according to that report.

The Education Department has not taken a position on the legislation.

A Quiet Break For Corporations (WP)

By Joe Stephens

The Washington Post, September 20, 2006

For three generations, the Dungey family of Auburn, N.Y., has produced handmade dog collars and leashes for pet stores around the country. The family's six-person shop has staved off competition from cheaper foreign labor by offering a range of products, from affordable "Sparky's Choice" leashes to a $100 beveled-brass collar known as the "Gatsby."

One day this spring, the company president, Anita Dungey, happened across a few words on a Web site, leading her to a startling discovery: One of her small advantages over imports was about to disappear, thanks to a little-noticed proposal in the Senate. The plan, it turned out, had been promoted by Wal-Mart Stores Inc.

In Connecticut, chemical company executive Kenneth Kelly got a similar jolt when a business associate called to warn that a bill tailored to benefit a German-owned competitor was working its way through Congress.

Dungey and Kelly had stumbled upon a largely unknown congressional apparatus that allows companies to erase tariffs -- taxes levied on products and materials shipped to the United States from overseas -- for years at a time.

Each legislative season, corporate executives and lobbyists quietly draft hundreds of bills to suspend tariffs. Over time, the changes cost taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars in lost revenue, a Washington Post analysis of U.S. trade data found.

Most of the tariff suspensions involve obscure chemicals and dyes, but many other products show up, including boilers for nuclear reactors, green peanuts, child potty seats, unicycles -- even chocolate coatings for laxatives.

"It's become sort of a lobbyists' dream," said Jim Schollaert, a former State Department trade specialist who now represents domestic manufacturers. "It's a gravy train, and there's little work to it."

The bills in Congress generally give no hint of whom the suspensions have been designed to benefit and sometimes refer to the products only by strings of numbers linked to phone-book-size tariff tables. But many corporate names can be found in reports on the legislation produced for Congress by the U.S. International Trade Commission.

Lawmakers usually introduce the provisions at the behest of companies in their districts. Many of those companies and their executives have given federal campaign contributions totaling millions of dollars.

The dog-collar proposal was introduced by Sen. Blanche Lincoln (D), who represents Wal-Mart's home state of Arkansas. Rep. Henry E. Brown Jr. (R-S.C.) sponsored the suspension of tariffs on a chemical virtually identical to one produced by Kelly's firm, R.T. Vanderbilt Co. The request came from Lanxess Corp., which has two plants in South Carolina.

Since 2003, Wal-Mart's political committee has contributed $9,000 to Lincoln's campaigns. Lanxess is a 2004 spinoff of Bayer AG, a German company whose U.S. political committee has donated $3,500 to Brown's campaigns since 2000.

Congressional sponsors of such bills said they are trying to lower consumer prices and create jobs by cutting costs for U.S. manufacturers and retailers. They said they do not want to hurt domestic businesses and they generally drop legislation if trade officials find a U.S. company that objects.

"Removing these tariffs will help reduce costs for American businesses," House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Calif.) said in a statement in March, when the House passed an omnibus bill with hundreds of tariff suspensions. "This is absolutely the right thing to do."

The practice of not naming companies in the legislation obscures a fact revealed by The Post's analysis: The biggest beneficiaries of the rising tide of tariff-suspension bills are domestic subsidiaries of foreign corporations. Of the 10 companies that stand to benefit from the greatest number of bills examined in the study, eight are owned by or affiliated with German and Swiss chemical companies.

Companies linked to Bayer and Lanxess, for example, initiated more than 100 bills in the current session of Congress, records show. If passed, over the next two years the bills could cost the U.S. Treasury more than $44 million.

The Post's findings come at a time when pork-barrel spending in the form of congressional earmarks is drawing increasing criticism from the public -- and occasional attention from federal prosecutors. Meanwhile, tax breaks delivered to corporations in the form of tariff suspensions have gone largely without public notice.

The current session of Congress is on track to enact a record number of suspensions, the Post analysis found. Since the beginning of last year, legislators have introduced more than 1,400 bills seeking new or renewed tariff waivers or reductions.

"It's a huge number," said John Deming, a lobbyist for Ciba Specialty Chemicals, which the analysis shows has initiated more than 30 tariff-suspension bills in the past two years. "The chemical industry has always been doing this, and now other people are doing it. It's amazing this time, everybody understands how this works now."

Although suspensions are supposed to be shelved if competitors object, trade officials acknowledge that some smaller companies may never hear about the proposals.

"I was shocked when I saw how many there are, and I wondered how you could possibly keep abreast of what's proposed," said Kelly, the chemical executive.Congress's Tip Sheet

Tariffs have been around since the earliest years of the republic -- they funded the government long before income taxes. In the 19th century, legislators began using them increasingly to protect domestic businesses from cheap imports.

Tariff suspensions have a long history, too. Traditionally each suspension was introduced as a separate bill. Their popularity leapt 20 years ago when Congress decided to combine most of the unopposed suspension bills into one huge piece of legislation, to be passed quickly and unanimously at the end of each session. Today corporate lobbyists deliver a steady stream of proposed tariff suspensions to congressional aides, who use computer spreadsheets to track the avalanche of paperwork.

The last time Congress passed an omnibus bill, in 2004, budget analysts estimated that the waivers would result in at least $172 million in lost revenue. The next set of suspensions, slated for passage this fall, is looking much more costly.

Budget analysts estimate that the grab bag of tariff suspensions passed by the House in March, if approved by the Senate and signed into law, would cost taxpayers $278 million. Last month, in an unusual move, the Senate attached 262 of the suspensions to a pension bill. The rest, with an unknown number of the Senate's own proposals, are expected to be rolled into a miscellaneous tariff bill this month.

The House Ways and Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee review most of the bills in what members say is an attempt to weed out those too costly to the Treasury. Making the tariff suspensions temporary -- usually three years -- avoids interference with trade negotiations, aides said.

The process has become so standardized that Ways and Means has drawn up a tip sheet for companies to streamline the procedure. One tip says sponsors should "avoid using trade names for products." Instead, a product "should be described precisely" in the bill. That can help customs officials in the field identify obscure chemicals. But it also can mask which companies would benefit.

The Post analysis shows that some members of Congress went to bat repeatedly for their corporate constituents. At least 36 members of Congress have introduced five or more tariff-suspension bills in the current session.

Rep. Sue Myrick (R-N.C.) has introduced at least 34 such bills. She did not respond to interview requests.

South Carolina's Brown ranked second among House members, with 32 bills. Brown declined to be interviewed but issued a statement calling the suspensions "a budget-neutral means of promoting a positive economic climate."

Other leading bill sponsors in the House included Pennsylvania Republicans Tim Murphy and Phil English, each with 23, and Emanuel Cleaver (D-Mo.) with 21.

Murphy said in a statement: "American companies are being forced to pay duties on materials not available in the United States that they need. Eliminating these duties keeps American businesses globally competitive and thousands of jobs right here at home."Juggling the Ball Bills

Under guidelines set by Congress, each tariff suspension is supposed to cost taxpayers no more than $500,000 a year. Many proposals above the limit are rejected; others win approval anyway.

On June 8, 2005, Rep. Richard E. Neal (D-Mass.) introduced a bill seeking to suspend the tariff on one small category of inflatable balls -- in this case, leather basketballs.

Before the day was over, Neal introduced a nearly identical bill covering rubber basketballs, another for synthetic basketballs, and another covering basketballs "other than leather, rubber or synthetic."

Still not done, Neal introduced yet another bill covering "certain volleyballs."

Neal returned the next day to introduce a final bill for what he described simply as "certain . . . inflatable balls other than basketballs and volleyballs."

Each change is supposed to be reviewed before passage by analysts at the trade commission. The analysts found that each of Neal's six bills would result in annual revenue losses that fell just below or somewhat above the guideline. Added together, however, the bills could cost $3.7 million a year.

In an interview, Neal said he was unaware of how much the bills would cost taxpayers, but he added, "I think it's really negligible."

The bills mention no beneficiaries, but Neal said he was asked to sponsor the suspensions by Spalding, a sporting goods maker in Springfield, Mass. "For a company in my district, I was happy to help," Neal said.

Neal's legislative director, Peg McGlinch, acknowledged that multiple bills were filed to avoid violating the $500,000 guideline. "That's why they split it up," she said. An aide on the Ways and Means Committee confirmed: "We advise people to do it that way."

Bryan Wolfe, customs director for Russell Corp., Spalding's parent company, said the tariff reductions would benefit a number of U.S. importers and would not hurt American manufacturers because most inflatable balls are made in China.

Provisions covering four types of balls were rolled into the Pension Protection Act of 2006, which President Bush signed into law on Aug. 17. The other bills remain pending.

There are many similar examples. Shoes of various stripes are the subject of at least 19 tariff-suspension bills. Payless ShoeSource Inc., listed as the proponent of the bills, did not respond to phone messages.

David Beck, acting director of the trade commission's tariffs office in Washington, said analysts have noticed the strategy. "Depending on how you look at it, it might not pass the sniff test," Beck said. He said Congress has been "pretty liberal on it."Overseas Winners

No government agency has calculated the economic impact of the tariff suspensions. Some corporations acknowledge keeping some or most of the savings, but many say consumers also benefit.

"Any ability we have to eliminate a 1 to 3 percent tariff and save a couple pennies for our consumers, we think is important," said Wal-Mart lobbyist Angela Marshall Hofmann, who previously helped oversee the process as an aide for the Senate Finance Committee.

Hofmann has written to lawmakers that Wal-Mart supports 41 current tariff-suspension bills but that "it is our understanding that these products are not manufactured in any commercially viable manner in the United States."

Lobbyists and lawmakers said many tariff suspensions aid small businesses. The savings "can be especially meaningful for a small company, or one struggling to stay afloat in the United States," Senate Finance Chairman Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) said in a statement.

But The Post's analysis of data from nearly 600 trade commission reports from this session of Congress found that the biggest winners are not small U.S. firms but rather domestic subsidiaries of European corporations.

During this session, eight foreign corporations alone have generated at least 277 tariff-suspension bills. The total is undoubtedly higher, since the Post study could not identify the corporate sponsors of many bills.

The analysis shows that various Bayer subsidiaries were the unnamed primary beneficiaries of more than 70 suspension bills covering imported chemicals, including the ingredients for aspirin. Over the next two years those suspensions would cost the Treasury more than $35 million on imports worth nearly $850 million. A Bayer spokesman would say only that Bayer expects other corporations to share in the savings.

Since 2000, Bayer's political committee has made campaign contributions totaling $951,000, according to the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics. In 2005 alone, Bayer and its U.S. affiliates spent $3.2 million on lobbying.Finding Competitors

To safeguard domestic producers, trade commission analysts try to identify U.S.-based companies that might make the products, then ask them whether the suspensions would be damaging.

But identifying affected companies that are small and based far from Washington can be difficult. The trade commission's Beck said that despite analysts' best efforts, they occasionally miss such firms. "It happens, but not very often," he said. "In the last 10 years I'd say I've seen one or two examples."

Grassley said his staff posts proposed suspensions on his committee's Web site and welcomes public comment. "Our process is transparent and well publicized," he said. "It probably isn't perfect, but no process is."

Kelly, general manager of R.T. Vanderbilt Co. of Connecticut, said it was largely luck when a colleague tipped off his firm about Brown's bill to suspend the tariff on Vulkanox ZMB, a chemical used in rubber production. Kelly's company produces a similar chemical at a Kentucky plant that employs more than 100 people.

The company dashed off a letter to the Ways and Means Committee, arguing that the waiver would give Lanxess, which imports Vulkanox, a competitive advantage and might force Vanderbilt to shut its factory.

"We do not understand why this legislation is needed, and its sponsor has not provided an explanation," the letter said. ". . . [T]he only result of the legislation would be windfall profits at our expense to the German, Indian and Chinese suppliers."

The letter also called it "ironic" that the European Union charges a 6.5 percent tariff on Vanderbilt's chemical.

Kelly said his company has no practical way to ensure another waiver does not slip through without its knowledge -- short of hiring a lobbyist just to keep watch.

"There maybe should be a higher bar on our elected officials on making clear why they want to do this," Kelly said.

Dungey, who co-owns Auburn Leathercrafters in Upstate New York, launched a one-woman campaign against four bills that would cut the 2.4 percent tariff on imported dog collars and leashes. She argued that anyone familiar with the industry would realize domestic producers would find the waivers "devastating."

She said she believes that Wal-Mart and other big importers count on U.S.-based manufacturers never learning about the obscure legislation. "A lot of people just don't have the time to devote to staying on top of it," Dungey said.

Wal-Mart officials said their only motivation is to save consumers money. While the dog-collar bills would cost taxpayers more than $9 million over the next three years, the company stressed that all importers would share the benefits.

The bills' legislative sponsor, Sen. Lincoln, said in a statement that she was pleased that the Senate process had allowed Dungey to raise objections. In response, Lincoln said, the measures have been removed from consideration.

Dungey said no one had told her the tariff suspension was dead. Had she not stumbled across the mention on a Web site and spent days on research, Dungey said, she is convinced the cut in tariffs would have passed without opposition -- and led to the end of her company.

"The suspension is . . . just about long enough to put most of the small guys out of business," Dungey said. "I would have just shaken my head and said, 'How can Wal-Mart sell for this price?' "

Air Controllers Chafe At Plan To Reduce Staffing Levels (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

DALLAS, Sept. 13 — A drive by the Federal Aviation Administration to cut the number of air traffic controllers nationally by 10 percent below negotiated levels, and even more sharply at places like the busy radar center here, is producing tension, anger and occasional shows of defiance among controllers.

At the radar office that controls planes around Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport and at a cluster of other airports where staffing levels are falling fast, unhappiness is usually not visible in the darkened radar centers where they work, except when it is glaringly obvious.

Like the recent day when a controller here went to work in lime green pants and a clashing brown jacket, along with hair dyed blue, to protest a new dress code. Elsewhere, male controllers have rebelled by going to work in dresses.

Most controllers here say they are far more concerned with workplace changes that do not involve wardrobe, including salary caps, lower pay for new hires and stricter control of vacation schedules and sick leave.

The F.A.A. imposed the changes on Sept. 3, three months after it declared an impasse in contract talks. Most of the changes have had little effect on the public. But one in particular may have safety implications, controllers and some outside experts said. That is the ending of contractual protection against being kept working on a radar screen controlling traffic for more than two hours without a break.

The agency has been defensive about staffing rules since a plane crash on Sept. 1 in Lexington, Ky., in a case where the workload of the lone controller on duty violated policy.

Having just one controller on duty "degrades the safety net," said Pat Forrey, president of the National Air Traffic Controllers Association, "by not having another set of eyes and ears." Mr. Forrey and others make a similar argument about keeping controllers at their work stations in positions that require intense concentration for extended periods.

The president of the union local here, Michael Conely, said that with the number of controllers now scheduled, "you can't staff all the positions properly.''

"You are on position longer, watching more airplanes, and it becomes a tired-eye syndrome," Mr. Conely said.

The aviation agency says that traffic is down in the Dallas region and that the goal is to "staff to traffic" and not to an arbitrary standard.

Controllers, who earn more than $100,000 a year, are too expensive to leave idle, the agency says, and nationally, it has a goal of gradually increasing each controller's workload 10 percent. The manager here, Dan Gutwein, said controllers spent five and a half hours a day at their radarscopes, up from four hours historically.

In an interview, the administrator of the agency, Marion C. Blakey, said the goal of the changes was to make the agency run more like a business.

"You can't serve an industry that's largely teetering on bankruptcy and ask for a bigger slice of the pie," Ms. Blakey said last month in a speech. Explaining why the dress code matters, Ms. Blakey said there are "folks who push outside the norms of what is professional dress and what's professional behavior."

The dress code bans jeans, as well as T-shirts and shirts with big lettering and requires that controllers not appear "disheveled," rules that are not onerous, she said.

Ms. Blakey is trying to reshape the agency as two-thirds of the controllers face retirement in the next 10 years. That bulge is a result of extensive hiring in the early 1980's to replace thousands of striking controllers whom President Ronald Reagan fired.

The controllers, many with two decades in positions in which they are entrusted with thousands of lives, say the changes make them feel trivialized. A cartoon that controllers circulated by e-mail shows a radar screen with two converging airplanes and a picture of a man's sneaker, banned under the new dress code. The caption asks which should be the priority.

The agency says the controllers' attire must not "erode public confidence," although most work in windowless rooms, out of public view. The lighting in the radar room here is so dim that it is not easy, at a glance, to tell whether controllers are wearing the now-banned sneakers or sandals.

Mr. Conely said in an interview that the dress code was about more than clothes.

"It's absolutely a power thing," he said. "They want to show they're in charge and this is how we're going to do it and if you don't like it quit."

Some controllers are convinced that quitting is what the agency hopes they will do. Under the new rules, their replacements will earn substantially less. By the union count, 86 controllers worked here as of Jan. 1. Ten have retired, the union says, with some leaving early because of the new rules.

In the late 1990's, the controllers and the agency negotiated a national staffing pact that called for 117 controllers here. The agency disagrees on the current count and says many changes that grate on controllers are needed for scheduling flexibility.

The agency says that controllers are no longer guaranteed two consecutive weeks of vacation and that vacations can be canceled at the last minute. Controllers scheduled to work on holidays can be called off a few hours before and lose the holiday pay.

Management also gave itself the flexibility to keep controllers on their scopes for more than two hours. Two hours is still the goal, but controllers can no longer file grievances if they are there longer.

A former controller, Craig Carlson, now a co-director of the Air Traffic Control Program at the University of North Dakota, which provides initial training in air traffic control, said, "When it's really busy, it gets really taxing on you if you are sitting there for a full two hours."

Referring to tougher schedules for controllers, John Cox, an aviation safety expert and a former safety official at the Air Line Pilots Association, said, "This is exactly what the airlines have done with pilots."

"The airline pilots today are flying more hours, flying more days, and they are being more efficiently scheduled, and fatigue is an issue for them," he said.

A longtime controller here said what the agency had done with the changes "feels awfully retaliatory." The controller, who insisted on anonymity because of fears that managers would take offense, and others did say that some people had, in fact, abused sick leave, but that the remedy should not be rules that made everyone's lives miserable.

Nonetheless, the controller said, he loved his work and would not quit despite significant pay cuts and the difficulty in planning vacations.

Excess Reserves Help Slow The Rise In Health-Care Costs (WP)

By Stephen Barr

DOJ_NMG_0065923

Health insurance premiums for federal employees will increase by an average of 1.8 percent next year, the lowest annual increase in the government's employee program since 1997.

Officials said they substantially slowed the rise in 2007 insurance rates by dipping into excess financial reserves of the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program, which provides about $33 billion in health-care benefits annually. They said the reserves had increased in recent months because insurance claims and other expenses had not grown as fast as estimated.

Next year, 63 percent of FEHBP enrollees "will see no increase in their premium," said Linda M. Springer , director of the Office of Personnel Management, which administers the program. "That is amazing."

She said 15 percent of the program's enrollees will see a premium increase of less than 5 percent.

The federal program will offer 284 plans next year and will provide insurance coverage to about 8 million Americans -- civil service and postal workers, retirees, and family members. The government picks up about 71 percent of premium costs in its role as an employer.

Next year, individuals will pay an average of $1.45 more per two-week pay period, and families will pay $3.13 more biweekly.

More than 56 percent of FEHBP enrollees are in two plans provided by the Blue Cross and Blue Shield Association, and Blue Cross enrollees will see their share of the premium drop or stay the same.

Enrollees in the Blue Cross standard option will pay $57.30 biweekly, 77 cents less than this year. Families covered by the standard option will pay $134.30 biweekly, $1.29 less.

The Blue Cross basic option, which requires enrollees to stay in the Blue network, will not raise premiums for the third consecutive year. The enrollee cost will be $37.99 for individuals and $88.99 for families on a biweekly basis.

Data provided by the OPM showed that $500 million will be drawn out of the program's cash reserves, bringing down next year's premium increase by 5 percentage points. Otherwise, federal employees and retirees could have faced a rate increase of 6.8 percent, in line with this year's premium rise.

The program's reserves "are more than adequate," Springer said. "Everything is financially sound here." Rate decisions "are not things that are manipulated," she said. "They are certainly not political."

The use of the program's reserves helped reduce rate increases next year for national fee-for-service plans, which are required to set aside money for contingencies. The program's health maintenance organizations do not build up reserves because they operate on fixed-price contracts each year, officials said.

As a result, the national plans' average premium will rise 0.3 percent, and HMOs will rise an average 6.3 percent.

Premium increases in the federal employee program usually are lower than the annual rate increases in other large plans. The California Public Employees' Retirement System, for example, plans to increase HMO rates by an average of 11.6 percent and premiums for preferred-provider organizations by 12.6 percent next year.

Tom Billet , a senior consultant with Watson Wyatt Worldwide in Stamford, Conn., said surveys show that most private-sector employees' premiums will increase by 9 to 10 percent next year.

"Even when companies are fortunate to have a low increase, we find they are choosing to pass along something more than that so that it will be consistent with their long-term message -- health-care costs are high and that people should act responsibly to control them," Billet said.

Springer also said enhanced dental and vision benefits will be added to the federal benefits package next year. Premiums will vary by plan and by region, she said.

House To Big House (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, September 20, 2006

With Rep. Bob Ney's (R-Ohio) guilty plea on federal corruption charges last Friday and a stint in prison looming for the lawmaker, the House suddenly finds the ranks of its alumni behind bars growing to a level not seen in a decade.

When Ney heads off to prison, likely sometime next year, he will become the fourth Member to be locked up for criminal behavior, and the Ohio Republican may not be the last. Ney will join ex-Reps. James Traficant (D-Ohio), Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.) and Frank Ballance (D-N.C.), all of whom currently are being held in federal correctional facilities. Ney will appear in front of a federal judge on Oct. 13 to formally plead guilty to conspiracy and making false statements.

Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) could join this group of disgraced Members soon. Jefferson is at the center of a federal bribery probe that already has resulted in lengthy prison terms for two men involved in the scandal, including Brett Pfeffer, a former Jefferson aide. Jefferson has not been charged in the case and has repeatedly denied any wrongdoing, but FBI agents turned up $90,000 in marked bills in Jefferson's freezer when they searched his home last year.

In fact, not since the early 1990s, when the House Bank, Post Office and Page scandals were roiling Capitol Hill and prematurely ending dozens of political careers, have so many lawmakers been in prosecutors' sights.

From 1993 to 1996, 10 Members went to prison for varying lengths of time, and at least four, and possibly as many as six, were imprisoned at the same time, according to media reports. The list of jailed lawmakers included House stalwarts such as Rep. Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.), the powerful chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. The stench of corruption emanating from the Democrat-controlled House helped Republicans win control of the chamber in 1994, and they immediately instituted a reform agenda that included new restrictions on lobbyists and gifts to lawmakers and staff.

Rep. Jay Kim (R-Calif.), convicted in 1997 for campaign finance violations, barely avoided jail time and instead was sentenced to two months of electronic home detention when he should have been out on the re-election trail. Kim was defeated in a GOP primary in 1998.

There were so many ex-Members in the slammer during the 1990s that Roll Call, at that time, debuted the "Jailbird Caucus" to help its readers keep track of who was in, and who was out, of prison.

A decade earlier, the Abscam scandal of 1980-81 ended up landing six House Members and a Senator in prison, and the seven served contemporaneous prison sentences between one and three years.

Unlike previous periods when scandals plagued Congress, the current wave of corruption convictions does not involve a single thread of illicit behavior, although the Abramoff affair still has the potential to spread on Capitol Hill. So far, seven individuals, including Ney and Abramoff himself, have pleaded guilty or been convicted in that investigation. Adam Kidan, Abramoff's business partner in the purchase of a Florida cruise ship company, also has pleaded guilty to fraud charges not directly tied to the Washington, D.C., scandal.

Rather, up until this time, it is a series of smaller scandals involving individual lawmakers and their donors, staffers and families, that has brought down Members.

Two current Democratic lawmakers, Reps. Jan Schakowsky (Ill.) and Juanita Millender-McDonald (Calif.), even have close family members behind bars.

Robert Creamer, Schakowsky's husband, is incarcerated in the Federal Correctional Institution in Terre Haute, Ind., where he is serving five months for bank fraud and failure to pay withholding taxes as part of a check-kiting scheme. Creamer, who is scheduled to be released on Nov. 9, also will have to serve 11 months of home detention.

Roderick Keith McDonald, Millender-McDonald's son, is serving a 41-month prison sentence for mail fraud, money laundering, bribery and conspiracy to extort. He will be released on Dec. 31, 2008.

Ballance's son, Garey, a former judge, was just released from federal prison on Aug. 31 after serving a nine-month sentence for tax evasion. The younger Ballance failed to pay taxes on a $20,000 gift from his father.

Ney, who signed onto a plea agreement with federal prosecutors last week after nearly two years of denials, is expected to receive the lightest sentence of any of the incarcerated pols. Justice Department officials have agreed to recommend a 27-month term for the Ohio Republican. Ney is currently in an alcohol-abuse treatment center receiving counseling for what he called a "dependency" problem.

Ballance was sentenced to four years in prison for fraud and money laundering related to more than $300,000 in state funds that Ballance steered to a North Carolina nonprofit he controlled. Ballance is not scheduled to be released from federal custody until June 2009, according to the U.S. Bureau of Prisons.

Ballance, who served one term in the House after nearly 20 years in the North Carolina Legislature, recently applied to have his conviction overturned, although a federal appeals court asked him to resubmit his application because it wasn't filed on the proper form. Ballance argues that federal prosecutors "wired" his case by threatening family members, including his 86-year-old mother, with jail terms unless he cooperated with the FBI. He also alleges that prosecutors "made false and/or misleading answers to the court about alleged evidence in my case," according to a legal document filed by Ballance.

Cunningham, whose case has kicked off a wider investigation by the Justice Department into spending earmarks and government contracts, received eight years and four months — the longest prison term ever meted out to a former lawmaker — for taking more than $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors, as well as tax evasion and fraud. Cunningham's sentence is set to expire in June 2013.

Traficant, who was convicted of bribery, fraud and racketeering in 2002, among other charges, was sentenced to eight years in prison. He will be in prison until at least September 2009.

Scandals Play Varied Roles In Midterm Races As Election Day Nears (RC)

By Louis Jacobson

Roll Call, September 20, 2006

In recent months, the ranks of Out There's periodic scandal checklist have thinned significantly.

Since we last assessed the vulnerability of politicians facing ethical allegations, five people have vanished from our list.

Four besieged politicians were given the heave-ho by voters: Rep. Cynthia McKinney (D-Ga.), Alaska Gov. Frank Murkowski (R), Georgia lieutenant governor candidate Ralph Reed (R) and ex-Alabama Gov. Don Siegelman (D) all lost primaries this summer. A fifth, Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), bowed out of the re-election campaign as a federal probe into his ties with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff intensified; last week he pleaded guilty to charges stemming from that case.

In addition to making these changes, we've also streamlined the list a bit. We've removed Ohio Gov. Bob Taft (R), who's not running for re-election; his potential

Republican successor, Secretary of State Ken Blackwell, has seen his race turn largely on issues unrelated to any personal role in the state GOP's corruption scandal. We've also temporarily removed embattled Kentucky Gov. Ernie Fletcher (R) because he does not face the voters until 2007.

But that leaves plenty of names on our scandal checklist. Here's the rundown.

Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.)

Jefferson has notched a minor victory or two in his legal challenge to the FBI's unprecedented search of his Rayburn House Office Building suite on May 20, but most observers suspect that an indictment over bribery allegations is only a matter of time.

Risk factor: high. Jefferson has maintained his innocence, but he already has serious primary challengers, and if he doesn't step down first, he could well lose.

Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.)

Though not much new has been made public about the ties between Burns and Abramoff, the issue continues to dog him back home in Big Sky Country. Burns has acknowledged that language favorable to an Abramoff client, the Saginaw Chippewa Tribe of Michigan, was included in a spending bill he was responsible for, though Burns said the language was added without his knowledge.

Risk factor: medium-high. We've moved Burns' vulnerability up a notch, given the tough challenge he's facing from Democrat Jon Tester, who can nearly match Burns' good-ol'-boy persona but without the ethical baggage. Burns hasn't helped his cause by committing a series of gaffes, most notably his intemperate outburst at out-of-state crews fighting forest fires. But don't count him out yet.

Wisconsin Gov. Jim Doyle (D)

Both the U.S. attorney in Milwaukee and state prosecutors are reviewing possible links between campaign donations and state contracts. While Doyle has not been directly implicated so far, the media are having a field day with the corruption issue, and a legal bombshell that affects the governor is certainly considered possible.

Risk factor: medium. While Doyle is narrowly ahead in most polls, the continuing scrutiny has kept him under 50 percent. The general environment isn't good either: In addition to Doyle's problems, the voters are in a funk over scandals in the Legislature (which have affected both parties) as well as the troubles of another key statewide Democrat, Attorney General Peggy

Lautenschlager, who was convicted for drunken driving after running a state car into a ditch and lost her primary earlier this month.

Despite a ruling by the state ethics board requiring him to return more than $400,000 in campaign donations, Rep. Mark Green (R) has earned good marks as a candidate, outraised Doyle during the previous quarter and is in the odd position of seeming cleaner for being in Washington, D.C., than in Madison. Unless Doyle improves his game, Green could slip into the governor's chair.

Sen. Bob Menendez (D-N.J.)

Menendez comes from Hudson County, a jurisdiction known for its old-fashioned machine politics. In early September, federal prosecutors subpoenaed documents related to a Hudson County community center that received federal funding and once paid Menendez rent.

Risk factor: medium. Menendez, an appointee to the Senate, already faced a tough race for an elected term against state Sen. Tom Kean Jr. (R), and he hasn't been helped by the malaise surrounding the man who appointed him, freshman Gov. Jon Corzine (D). Now, with federal subpoenas public, Kean and the media finally have a hook for discussing Menendez's ethics.

Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich (D)

Blagojevich, who successfully campaigned against the corruption scandals surrounding his now-convicted Republican predecessor, George Ryan, continues to be the subject of federal investigations. Chicago-based U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald has said, in a letter to state Attorney General Lisa Madigan (D), that he has found "very serious allegations of endemic hiring fraud" in the administration. And the FBI is looking into allegations by the wife of his former campaign treasurer that involve a state job supposedly bought with a check made out to one of the governor's children.

Risk factor: medium. Blagojevich's ethical position probably has eroded as the year has gone on, but his political outlook hasn't suffered as much as one might expect. In an independent poll released earlier this week, he led by 30 points, partly because Republican nominee Judy Baar Topinka has been running an underwhelming (and underfunded) campaign. Voters seem, at best, blasé about Blagojevich, but in a Democratic state and a likely Democratic year, he could well survive, despite his predicament.

Rep. Don Sherwood (R-Pa.)

Last year, Sherwood, who's married, acknowledged a long-running extramarital affair and settled a $5.5 million lawsuit with his former mistress.

Risk factor: medium. In the May 16 Republican primary, political neophyte Kathy Scott held Sherwood to 56 percent, leading Democrats to work harder to elect Penn State Worthington Scranton political science professor Chris Carney, a lieutenant commander in the Naval Reserve and a counterterrorism expert. But while Democrats feel good about their chances of toppling Sen. Rick Santorum (R) and a couple of House Republicans from the Keystone State, the Sherwood seat remains out of the spotlight, overshadowed by the rest of Pennsylvania's competitive contests this fall. In a district that gave President Bush 60 percent of the vote in 2004, Carney may not be able to win without a more concerted Democratic effort.

Rep. Alan Mollohan (D-W.Va.)

An investigative report released by a conservative activist group and referred to the Justice Department accused Mollohan of underreporting financial assets and steering federal earmarks to entities he founded or controlled. Mollohan has denied any wrongdoing, though he did step down as the House ethics committee's ranking member.

Risk factor: medium. While little new and dramatic has emerged about Mollohan's troubles since they first came to light, the allegations are serious, and Republicans are putting their hopes on state Del. Chris Wakim (First lady Laura Bush made a visit to Fairmont — Mollohan's home — to stump for Wakim). But with poll data scarce, opinion in West Virginia continues to predict that Mollohan will survive, given the 12-term incumbent's record of delivering for his district, his social conservatism, his continued support from key business leaders and an endorsement from the National Rifle Association. In addition, Wakim has taken a hit for allegations that he inflated his résumé.

Rep. Charles Taylor (R-N.C.)

Taylor has faced a number of ethical questions in the past, most notably during investigations into Blue Ridge Savings Bank, which he founded in 1978. Hayes Martin, the bank's former president, was convicted in 2001 and alleged that Taylor was involved in bank fraud and money laundering. But Taylor vigorously denied those allegations, and he was never questioned, much less charged, in the case.

Risk factor: medium-low. Taylor occupies one of those House seats that is considered a reach for Democrats if a wave develops. But if the Democrats don't crest high enough here, Taylor has the personal wealth and the record of delivering to his district to be able to beat Heath Shuler (D), a political novice who gained fame as a quarterback at the University of Tennessee and in the NFL.

Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.)

The powerful House Appropriations chairman is facing fallout from the bribery case involving former Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.). The Justice Department is looking into the relationship between Lewis and several lobbyists who passed through the Congressional-K Street revolving door, including former Rep. Bill Lowery (R-Calif.), Jeff Shockey and Letitia White. Earlier this year, Roll Call reported that Lewis dropped the salary that White, then an aide on the panel, earned before she joined an appropriations-oriented lobbying firm, which made it possible for White to sidestep lobbying barriers and begin a lucrative career more quickly.

Risk factor: medium-low. Lewis' relatively secure status owes more to his lack of serious electoral opposition than to his legal situation. The continuing drip-drip of revelations about the sweet deals worked out with his current and former staffers suggests that the investigation could be a long and difficult one for the California Republican as he looks toward 2008.

Rep. John Doolittle (R-Calif.)

Aside from an Abramoff-related subpoena to Doolittle's wife, Julie, the questions surrounding Doolittle — who serves on the House Appropriations Committee and as Republican Conference secretary — have been raised only in the media. Beyond Abramoff, Doolittle's name has come up in connection with Cunningham and an alleged Cunningham co-conspirator, defense contractor Brent Wilkes. Doolittle has denied any suggestion of wrongdoing.

Risk factor: low. If prosecutors have Doolittle in their sights, they've been awfully quiet about it. And unless an investigation rapidly snowballs, Doolittle, a seasoned fundraiser, seems unlikely to lose to retired Air Force Lt. Col. Charlie Brown (D), despite a late-August poll commissioned by Brown that had Doolittle up by just 2 points.

Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.)

Several ex-aides claim that Conyers forced them to perform campaign work on government time, to baby-sit his children and to tutor his wife for law school. Conyers has denied any wrongdoing.

Risk factor: low. The ethics committee so far has shown no interest, and Conyers faces only nominal opposition in November. If the Democrats take over the House on Election Day, Conyers can look forward to becoming the Judiciary chairman.

Congress Is Ignoring Ethics, Voting Problems; So What Else Is New? (RC)

By Norman Ornstein

Roll Call, September 20, 2006

You can't make this stuff up: Republican leaders in the House found another way to deep-six any serious ethics and lobbying reform, on the very same day that prosecutors heralded the sorry end to the career of Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) and documented the sordid list of activities that has led him to a prison term.

Speaker Dennis Hastert (Ill.), Majority Leader John Boehner (Ohio) and Rules Chairman David Dreier (Calif.) decided to take up and pass a laughable sham of an earmark "reform" and hoped that nobody would notice it is neither serious nor a reform. They concocted a fig-leaf rules change that provides disclosure on earmarks, but one that does not encompass all or most earmarks, that is not at all certain to stay in place and that provides no protection against chicanery in earmarking, including last-minute lawmaking and lawmakers or their family members exploiting the system for personal gain.

The promises made by Hastert after the Jack Abramoff scandal broke — specifically that his party would lead the fight to enact sweeping lobbying reform — were dropped like a hot rock as soon as the public scrutiny eased, which strongly suggests that the intent of the Speaker was to deflect public outrage, not significantly change the status quo.

Boehner, too, kicked off his campaign to become Majority Leader by proclaiming his credentials as an original reformer — a charter member of the "Gang of Seven" that shamed the chamber over its excesses under Democratic rule. But then he turned his reform campaign into an anti-reform campaign once he saw that Members had no interest in making serious changes.

Ever since, the energies of the leadership have gone to minimizing change in the House. The Senate is no better. So far at least, it hasn't even felt the need to pass a sham reform.

The earmark culture has careened out of control. The wheeling and dealing of staffers enriching themselves and others as they exploit the revolving door is shocking, with Exhibit A being the House Appropriations Committee under Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.).

As time goes on, more lawmakers will be spotlighted, and probably some will be directly investigated. We have pitifully inadequate lobby disclosure rules and pitifully weak ethics procedures. The leaders may be right; voters will not make this their major issue this fall. But surely there is more at stake than how voters feel. The integrity of Congress, anyone? Doesn't anybody in power care about that?

With that off my chest — yet again — I want to turn this column's attention to another outrage, namely the integrity of the voting system as we approach critical elections. One week ago Tuesday, bright and early (way early for me) at 6:45 a.m., I was waiting expectantly at my neighborhood school in Chevy Chase, Md., for the polls to open at 7 so I could do my civic duty before tooling down to Capitol Hill for a 7:30 appointment. But 7 came and went; at 7:15, an embarrassed poll worker came out to the crowd and said they could not find the cards to activate the touch-screen machines. I left, as did many others — a few apparently to catch planes. I was able to get back before the polls closed that evening, but others clearly did not, or could not, return to vote.

Montgomery County has long prided itself as a bastion of civic responsibility — a role model in its voting processes. This was a meltdown, and one that was echoed, to varying degrees, in other parts of the state. Could there be a bigger or clearer wake-up call to the potential disaster that awaits us in the general elections?

The House majority is up for grabs; the most likely outcome is a House that will be within a handful of seats either way. And there very likely will be a half-dozen or more seats that are within a couple hundred votes or less. So here is a nightmare of nightmares: The House hangs in the balance, and the districts that make the difference cannot do recounts because there is no paper trail; the paper trail in jurisdictions that have it find huge discrepancies between it and the numbers recorded on the machines; screw-ups like Montgomery County's, or worse, disenfranchise large numbers of voters and make any outcome seem less legitimate; jurisdictions across the country lack established procedures for handling disputed elections and get mired in litigation or gridlock; and partisan election officials (à la Florida Republican Rep. Katherine Harris) make decisions that produce outcomes that are questionable at best.

This is not fanciful; it is all too real. And the reality would be even worse than the litany above suggests. All of the horrors above actually could occur with machines that are widely considered to be benign and safe from any corrupting influences. But we do not have such machines.

To all who have not yet done so, I urge you to look at the video of Princeton University researchers corrupting a widely used Diebold voting machine in less than one minute and creating a virus that alters results, spreads from one machine to another and corrupts the whole network, and disappears without a trace after the elections are over. The same computer scientists, led by Edward Felten at Princeton's Center for Information Technology Policy, discovered by chance that the "lock" protecting these machines can be opened by the key used by hotels to open mini-bars, keys that also can be purchased widely on eBay.

Diebold reacted to this news in the way that it and the other manufacturers of voting machines always react — they attacked the scientists. These companies have no interest in the integrity of elections, only in selling as many machines as they can and squelching any doubt about their efficacy.

The problem, of course, goes beyond the machines. There's also the lack of resources and professionalism in election administration around the country, which makes it easy to produce the kinds of screw-ups like we had in Montgomery County. Apparently, the checklist of equipment to be sent to each polling place failed to list the cards — a low-tech snafu if there ever was one.

The new machines are operated in most places by veteran volunteer poll workers who all too often are technologically challenged. (One test that ought to be applied before a poll worker is brought aboard is to see if he or she can turn the flashing 12:00 on a VCR to the actual time of day.)

A study by experts of voting in the 2006 primary in Cuyahoga County, Ohio, where touch-screen machines with paper trails are used, found huge differences in results between the machines' internals and the paper trails — and they found that many of the Smart Cards that record precinct results got lost on the way to the central office, resulting in incomplete results.

At the same time, the level of confidence in the election system is low, partisan tension is high, and Congress has been absent without leave as this problem looms. Brace yourselves: Troubled as its election was, we could end up looking with envy at Mexico.

Intense Dislike Of The President Remains Evident In The Polls (RC)

By Karlyn Bowman

Roll Call, September 20, 2006

One of the most notable features of polling about President Bush has been the intensity of the opposition to him.

In a September NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll, 36 percent said they had "very negative" feelings about the president. Since September 2005, more than three of every 10 respondents have expressed this view in the poll.

In the new poll, 23 percent had a "very positive" feeling about the president. His overall numbers were 42 percent positive, 49 percent negative.

In the meantime, ABC News asks respondents whether they approve or disapprove of the way the president is handling his job, then asks them whether they approve or disapprove strongly or somewhat. In the latest poll, 42 percent said they approved and 55 percent said they disapproved.

The poll found that the intensity of feeling was on the negative side as 43 percent disapproved strongly. Since June 2005, more than four in 10 have strongly disapproved of the job the president is doing.

An Aug. 30-Sept. 2 Opinion Research Corporation/CNN poll found that 30 percent thought Bush should be impeached and removed from office, while 69 percent thought he should not be.

CNN and Time asked the identical question seven times about former President Bill Clinton. In two September 1998 polls, 29 percent (the highest response) thought he should be impeached and removed. Bush's current ratings are similar to Clinton's in the fall of 1994.

Congressional Leaders. In an NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll, 50 percent of respondents didn't know of or weren't familiar with House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). Of the remainder, 15 percent had positive feelings and 23 percent negative ones.

As for Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), 55 percent were unfamiliar with him, with 13 percent positive and 15 percent negative.

Fifty-seven percent didn't recognize the name of Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) or have an opinion about him; 10 percent were positive, 18 percent negative.

And 38 percent were unfamiliar with Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), while 21 percent had positive feelings about him and 23 percent had negative ones.

Congressional Decision Time. One-quarter of likely voters told Fox News/Opinion Dynamics interviewers in mid-September that they already had decided whom they would vote for in November. Twenty-six percent of Democrats and 31 percent of Republicans said they have made up their minds.

Confidence in Rumsfeld. Thirty-one percent of respondents in a Sept. 8-11 NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll had positive feelings about Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, while 43 percent had negative ones (including 32 percent who felt very negatively about him). In January, feelings about Rumsfeld were 39 percent positive and 34 percent negative. In the September poll, 44 percent thought he should resign because of his handling of the war, while 46 percent did not.

In a Sept. 5-7 ABC News poll, 42 percent approved of the way Rumsfeld was handling his job, with 49 percent disapproving. His current rating is slightly better than his rating in December, when 35 percent approved and 53 percent disapproved. In a Sept. 8-11 Harris Poll, 38 percent rated him as doing an "excellent" or "good" job compared to 58 percent who said he was doing only a "fair" or "poor" job.

Gasoline Prices. With the recent decline in gasoline prices, the issue has lost some of its potency, polls show. In a Sept. 5-7 ABC News poll, 5 percent of respondents cited gas prices as the top issue driving in their vote, down from 15 percent in August.

In a Sept. 6-10 Pew Research Center Poll, 7 percent mentioned energy, gas or heating prices as the most important issue facing the country, down from 14 percent in May. When people were asked in the same poll about how often 11 different topics come up in their conversations with friends and family, 75 percent said gas prices came up frequently. More than 70 percent of Democrats and Republicans talked about them frequently. The next closest topics nationally were Iraq, the economy and education. For each of those three topics, 54 percent of respondents said they discussed the issue frequently.

Imprisoning Suspected Terrorists. In a September NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll, 54 percent of respondents said the Bush administration had taken the right course of action in its imprisonment and treatment of suspected terrorists and foreign fighters, with 34 percent saying the administration had gone too far.

A Royal Heir. In March and April, when the Pew Research Center interviewed Japanese adults about whether there should be a change in the Imperial Household Act to allow females to ascend to the imperial throne, 76 percent were in favor and only 19 percent were opposed. Men were more opposed than women were, at 26 percent compared to 13 percent.

Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi has endorsed a change in the law. But the birth of a male heir in early September reduced the urgency of the issue, leaving the fate of the proposal unknown.

All The King's Earmarks (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

Willie Stark would have had a good laugh.

Stark is the archetypal politician at the center of Robert Penn Warren's "All the King's Men." Not so loosely modeled on Louisiana's Depression-era governor and senator, Huey Long, he embodies the essential grittiness of politics and its inevitable corruptions, large and small.

One morning last week, I went to see the new film version of "All the King's Men." (Sean Penn plays a somewhat over-the-top Willie Stark.) So Stark was on my mind later that day as I watched members of the House of Representatives debate how to stop themselves -- or, more accurately, how to appear to stop themselves -- from spending money on pet projects.

The subject was earmarking, a practice whose attractions Willie Stark would have instantly understood. Earmarking is a polite term for the federal slush funds available to lawmakers to direct as they see fit, currying favor with constituents and contributors.

Stark would have been a champion earmarker. "I'm going to build me the God-damnedest, biggest, chromium-platedest, formaldehyde-stinkingest free hospital and health center the All-Father ever let live," Stark vows in the book.

And he has no doubt what he plans to name his project: "I'm going to call it the Willie Stark Hospital and it will be there a long time after I'm dead and gone and you are dead and gone and all those sons-of-bitches are dead and gone."

And so Stark, as I said, would have found the congressional debate a hoot. Because this charade of earmark reform involved lawmakers forcing themselves to take credit for their earmarks -- in essence, engaging in the legislative equivalent of naming the hospital after themselves.

Under the new rule, some -- but not all -- earmarks will require that the sponsoring lawmaker be identified. Big whoop. The problem with the most egregious earmarks isn't that the public doesn't know who's behind them. It's that the patrons are completely unabashed about the pork they are pushing.

Exhibit B: the entire state of West Virginia, crammed with the earmarked products of the Senate Appropriations Committee's senior Democrat. To wit, the Robert C. Byrd Federal Building and Courthouse in Charleston (not to be confused with the Robert C. Byrd Federal Building and Courthouse in Beckley); the Robert C. Byrd Expressway (not to be confused with the Robert C. Byrd Freeway or the Robert C. Byrd Bridge); the Robert C. Byrd National Technology Transfer Center at Wheeling Jesuit University (not to be confused with the Robert C. Byrd Science and Technology Center at Shepherd University or the Robert C. Byrd Technology Center at Alderson-Broaddus College). "I don't care if you list the members who sponsor earmarks. I put out press releases on every one of them," Rep. David Obey (D-Wis.), the ranking Democrat on the House Appropriations Committee, said in explaining how ineffective this change would be.

That didn't stop the House leadership from congratulating itself. "Today is an important day for the House as an institution," pronounced Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio). Perhaps, in the sense that it showed how resistant the chamber is to any deviation from business as usual.

So resistant, in fact, that the writers of large checks, also known as the House Appropriations Committee, greeted this minor incursion on their power with howls of outrage. They were being unfairly singled out for abuse, the appropriators bleated behind closed doors; the new rule would still let the tax writers and the authorizers get away with their special-interest shenanigans.

By all accounts, this indignation was heartfelt, in the "they do it too" way that a 6-year-old punished for popping someone on the playground is sincerely outraged that his friend wasn't busted for the same offense. Yet you have to question whether the canniest of the appropriators don't recognize how easily they got off.

It brought to mind the scene in "All the King's Men" in which the narrator, reporter-turned-fixer Jack Burden, ponders whether Stark really had been the gullible rube he seemed when the two first met in the backroom of Slade's pool hall.

Burden recalls his introduction: "Willie's hand gave mine three decorous pump-handle motions, and he said, 'Glad to meetcha, Mr. Burden,' . . . and then, I could have sworn, he gave me a wink. Then looking into that dead pan, I wasn't sure."

Years later, Burden tries to find out. " 'Well, Boss,' I demanded, 'did you or didn't you wink at me?' " Stark, for his part, is deliberately noncommittal. " 'Boy,' he said, and smiled at me paternally over his glass, 'that is a mystery. . . . Suppose I just had something in my eye?' " I wonder: Did the appropriators wink? Or was there just something in their eyes?

OTHER NEWS:

New-Home Starts Sink As Sales Slow, Inventories Rise (WSJ)

By Rafael Gerena-Morales

Construction starts on new homes plunged last month as builders curtailed production in response to mounting inventory and slowing sales.

The Commerce Department reported yesterday that housing starts dropped 6% in August from a month earlier to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1.665 million units. That was the fifth decline in construction starts in the past six months and the slowest rate of starts since April 2003. When compared with a year earlier, construction starts were down 19.8%.

The weak housing report helped send stocks lower yesterday, with the Dow Jones Industrial Average falling 14.09 to 11540.91.

WAITING FOR THE FED

David Wessel, The Wall Street Journal's deputy Washington bureau chief, says there's a lot of disagreement over where Fed will go with interest rates this year. While central-bank officials emphasize inflation risk, Wall Street is worried about a slowing economy. Listen to David Wessel's NPR interview2.

Construction starts on single-family homes fell 5.9% in August from a month earlier and declined 20.6% from a year earlier, the government report showed. Housing starts for multifamily homes with five or more units fell 8.2% in August from the previous month and declined 16.9% from a year earlier.

The Commerce Department report also showed that building permits -- a barometer of future construction activity -- fell 2.3% to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1.722 million in August when compared with the month before and were down 21.9% in August from a year earlier.

It is "pretty darn clear that ... we're in a pretty substantial downswing here," said David Seiders, chief economist of the National Association of Home Builders. Developers "can't keep bringing new supply on the market until [home] inventories come down and affordability is restored. The downside risk of [housing] to the real economy should be getting a lot of attention."

Yesterday's report on construction starts and building permits comes on the heels of a pessimistic reading on the home-builder association's confidence index, which was released Monday. The index indicated that home builders feel pessimistic about housing-market conditions and are likely to cut construction activity further for the rest of the year. The association reported Monday that its sentiment index for U.S. sales of new, single-family homes fell in September to 30 from 33 in August, indicating that most builders think the housing market is in poor shape. The housing index, compiled by the NAHB and Wells Fargo, was at 65 a year ago. A reading of 50 would indicate builder sentiment was balanced between good and poor.

Phillip Neuhart, an economic analyst with Wachovia Corp. in Charlotte, N.C., said the pullback in housing-construction activity will likely trim economic growth in the second half by at least 0.5 percentage point. The NAHB's Mr. Seiders said the slowing housing market could shave second-half economic growth by as much as a full percentage point. The 56 economists surveyed in WSJ.com's September survey said they expect economic growth averaging roughly 2.7% during the second half.

Amid a national housing boom, residential-construction activity contributed at least 0.5 percentage point to economic growth in 2004 and 2005, according to government data. However, a slowing housing market subtracted 0.63 percentage point from economic growth in this year's second quarter. "That's a dramatic swing" from previous years that is likely to worsen, Mr. Neuhart says. In the housing sector, "we expect choppy waters for the rest of the year."

Meanwhile, inflation pressures on the producer, or wholesale, level moderated last month -- offering welcome news for the economy. The Labor Department said its producer-price index for finished goods rose a seasonally adjusted 0.1% last month, matching July's increase. Producer prices in August were 3.7% higher than a year earlier, on an unadjusted basis, down from July's year-over-year increase of 4.2%. Core producer prices, excluding food and energy, fell 0.4% in August from a month earlier, in part because of a steep decline in automobile prices. The August decline in core producer prices was the sharpest drop since April 2003 and the second-straight monthly slide.

"We're not going to get these types of [auto-price] declines every month," said Joshua Shapiro, chief U.S. economist at consulting firm MFR Inc. Nonetheless, yesterday's data underscoring a cooling housing market and easing inflation "offer an overall message of comfort to the Fed. There's no incentive for them to do anything right now" with interest rates.

Separately, the Federal Reserve reported yesterday that the total net worth of U.S. households rose 0.1% to $53.33 trillion in the second quarter, marking the 15th consecutive quarterly increase. That was up from the revised first-quarter figure of $53.27 trillion, the Fed said in its quarterly "flow of funds" report. Meanwhile, the Fed reported that U.S. household debt grew at a seasonally adjusted annual pace of 9.1% in the second quarter, as "home-mortgage debt slowed to a single-digit pace for the first time in several years." U.S. household debt grew at a 9.6% annualized rate in the first quarter.

In US Housing Slump, Wider Concerns Rise (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

The Christian Science Monitor, September 20, 2006

These are tough times for the people who use hammers and nails to build the American dream - and those who employ them.

In some markets, buyers have gone missing - glued to their money in the expectation that home prices will fall. Desperate, sellers and developers are trying to sweeten their deals to unload McMansions and houses built on speculation. Now comes the news that new construction on homes has fallen so sharply that some economists use the "R" word when they talk about the housing market - and warn about what that might mean for the economy as a whole.

"Housing's in a recession, there are no two ways about it," says Paul Kasriel, chief economist at Northern Trust Co. in Chicago. "Typically when we get declines in housing of this magnitude, with a lag, the economy goes into recession. There have been exceptions, but not many."

Tuesday gave economists more cause for concern. The government reported new home starts fell 6 percent in August compared with July.

New home construction is now down about 20 percent compared with last year. There are seven months of unsold homes waiting for buyers - a record number.

The housing slump won't be welcome news in Washington when the Federal Reserve meets Wednesday to set interest-rate policy. Partly because of the problems in the housing sector, economists expect the Fed to leave interest rates unchanged as it did last month.

"Housing is a big worry for the Fed," says Scott Brown, chief economist at Raymond James & Associates in St. Petersburg, Fla. "At the start of the year they expected an orderly decline, but this summer the market started to fall apart."

Despite the drop in the housing market, many economists continue to forecast that the economy as a whole will weather the slump. Retail sales and employment remain healthy. Gasoline prices have fallen almost 50 cents a gallon in the past month. The Dow Jones Industrial Average is close to its all-time highs.

"It does not appear the bottom will fall out by any means," says Peter Morici, a professor at the University of Maryland School of Business in College Park. "I think lower oil prices - they are now down $15 a barrel - have taken any further slowdown off the table."

Economist Stuart Hoffman echoes this optimistic view. He says business will get a boost from exports as the rest of the world's economy grows. He notes that commercial construction, road work, and new warehouses are improving and will partially offset the drop-off in housing.

"You have to look at where housing is coming from," he says. "We knew it was frenzied in terms of starts and sales. But compared to the last few years, this would be considered a normal year."

However, Mr. Kasriel says, there is no clear sign of a bottom in housing. In July the number of homes for sale rose 35 percent while the number of new homes sold fell 15 percent. "We haven't seen such a wide disparity since 1984, when these data started," he says.

Despite these numbers, some economists are predicting the housing market will start to stabilize. David Wyss, chief economist at Standard & Poor's, is forecasting new housing construction will fall 25 percent from 2005 levels. He expects some overly hot markets will see prices fall. Nationally, he anticipates home prices will flatten out.

"We're in the stage now where people are beginning to lower their price or take what they can," he says. "The third stage wrings out the excesses. A year from now will be the best time to buy."

To move houses, real estate developers are trying to entice buyers with some unusual efforts. Indianapolis-based Davis Homes is straddling the line between builder and real estate agency. For a fee, Davis will buy a customer's old home if it isn't sold by a certain amount of time. The strategy frees the customer from shouldering two mortgages on two houses - and it helps Davis sweeten its deals for building new homes.

"It's just another avenue to get clients to their new home," says Cathy Epps, director of the company's Guaranteed Sale program. "Whoever thought of it, I think it was a great idea."

Alongside the Guaranteed Sale program that Ms. Epps directs, Davis also helps potential customers spruce up and sell their homes so they can buy new ones.

U.S. Economy: Housing Starts, Producer Prices Fall (BLOOM)

By Bob Willis And Courtney Schlisserman

Bloomberg, September 20, 2006

Sept. 19 (Bloomberg) -- Housing construction in the U.S. fell to a three-year low and a measure of wholesale prices dropped, increasing speculation the Federal Reserve is done raising interest rates through year-end and possibly beyond.

Housing starts plunged 6 percent last month to an annual rate of 1.665 million, the Commerce Department said today in Washington, a steeper slide than economists forecast. Prices paid to U.S. producers excluding food and energy declined 0.4 percent from July, the Labor Department said, marking the first back-to-back monthly drop since the end of 2002.

The slump in housing, which fueled growth for half a decade, is now so deep that it raises concerns the rest of the economy will be dragged down with it. Today's price figures suggest the Fed isn't under any pressure to resume raising interest rates following 17 consecutive increases that ended in June. Treasury notes jumped and stocks fell.

``Right now, it's just housing that's slowing, but this can spread to the rest of the economy very quickly," said Chris Low, chief economist at FTN Financial in New York. ``It should be absolutely clear to the Fed that they've done enough."

Fed policy makers meet tomorrow and will keep their benchmark lending rate at 5.25 percent for a second month, according to all 109 economists surveyed by Bloomberg News.

Building permits dropped to an annual rate of 1.722 million from 1.763 million the prior month. Not since May to November 1986 have permits declined seven straight months.

Economists expected starts to fall to an annual rate of 1.746 million from an originally reported 1.795 million pace in July, based on the median of forecasts in a Bloomberg survey.

Recession Risk

``In the past couple of months we've watched the growth side, housing in particular, deteriorate faster than anybody expected," said Gregory Miller, chief economist at SunTrust Banks Inc. in Atlanta. ``I'm not ready to raise the flag to start calling a recession, but there's clearly a risk."

Miller predicts the Fed will lower borrowing costs next year.

Diminishing increases in home prices helped bring the smallest gain in household net worth in four years last quarter, the Fed reported today. Total net worth rose $54.1 billion to a record $53.33 trillion in the second quarter, the central bank said in its Flow of Funds report.

Borrowing rose at an annual rate of 6.4 percent from April through June, the smallest increase since the first quarter of 2002, the Fed report showed.

Producer Prices

In a sign of easing inflation, overall prices paid to producers rose 0.1 percent for a second month in August, the Labor Department said. Economists surveyed by Bloomberg News expected a 0.3 percent rise.

New-home sales dropped in July and inventories of unsold new homes rose to a record, the Commerce Department said on Aug. 24, leaving builders with little choice but to cut construction and offer incentives to spur demand.

Bonds notes rallied with the yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note dropping 8 basis points to 4.73 percent at 4:11 p.m. in New York. The Standard & Poor's Supercomposite Homebuilding Index retreated 1.7 percent to 622.71, while the S&P 500 dropped 2.9 points, or 0.2 percent.

`Unsustainable' Expansion

Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson told his counterparts at a Group of Seven meeting in Singapore on Sept. 16 that they needn't worry about a housing-led collapse of the world's largest economy. The real-estate market is cooling from an ``unsustainable" expansion, he said.

Construction of single-family homes declined 5.9 percent in August to a 1.36 million rate, the slowest since February 2003, the Commerce Department said today. New construction of multifamily homes, such as townhouses and apartment buildings, fell 6.7 percent to an annual rate of 305,000.

Starts fell in all regions but the Northeast. They decreased 12 percent in the Midwest to 267,000, the lowest since December 2000; 6.1 percent in the South to an 833,000 pace; and 5.5 percent in the West to 410,000. Starts rose 5.4 percent in the Northeast to a 155,000 pace.

Industry Incentives

Wells Fargo & Co. Chief Executive Officer Richard Kovacevich said yesterday that the housing market is probably weaker than economic data suggest because homebuilders are using ``very significant incentives" to attract buyers.

``We will see, over the next five to six months, inventories increase quite substantially'' as that strategy becomes less successful in tempering the decline in demand for new homes, Kovacevich, whose bank is the second-biggest U.S. mortgage lender, said at a conference in San Francisco.

Builder confidence is suffering. The National Association of Home Builders/Wells Fargo said yesterday that its index of builder optimism fell this month to the lowest level in 15 years. The Standard and Poor's 500 Homebuilding Index, made up of five of the largest U.S. builders, has fallen by more than a quarter this year, the second-worst performance among S&P 500 industry groups.

Lennar Corp., the second-largest U.S. homebuilder by market value, on Sept. 8 said profit fell in the fiscal third quarter for the first time in six years.

``The U.S. housing market has continued to deteriorate,'' Stuart Miller, Lennar's president and chief executive officer, said in a statement. ``Given difficult market conditions, we have limited our land purchases while we have remained focused on even flow production and minimizing completed inventory.''

Home sales will probably drop 8 percent this year and another 2 percent next, according to a National Association of Realtors forecast issued Sept. 7.

Median existing home prices will rise 2.8 percent this year to $225,900 after rising 10.5 percent in 2005, the Realtors forecast. Home prices in some months this year may dip below year-ago levels, the Realtors forecast.

The group's measure of housing affordability fell in July to its lowest level since 1989 as mortgage rates increased and home prices edged up.

Home construction in the second quarter subtracted more from economic growth than at any time since the first three months of 1991, according to the Commerce Department. The slowdown in the real estate market is also producing smaller gains in home prices that may remove a source of strength for consumer spending as fewer home owners refinance.

Oil Trades Near Six-Month Low On Rising Stockpiles, Iran Talks (BLOOM)

By Gavin Evans

Bloomberg, September 20, 2006

Sept. 20 (Bloomberg) -- Crude oil traded near a six-month low in New York after plunging yesterday on signs rising fuel stockpiles and protracted negotiations over Iran's nuclear program have prompted investment funds to cut their holdings.

Oil posted its biggest fall in four months after U.S. President George W. Bush said he will give European diplomacy a chance to end the dispute with Iran, the world's fourth-biggest oil producer. A government report later today will probably show U.S. fuel stockpiles, already above average, extended their gains of the past month.

``The mentality of the market has changed,'' said Mark Waggoner, president of Excel Futures Inc. in Huntington Beach, California. ``We've got rising stockpiles, the summer driving season is over'' and worries about Iran are ``falling by the wayside.''

Crude oil for October delivery was at $61.78 a barrel, up 12 cents, in after-hours electronic trading on the New York Mercantile Exchange at 10:03 a.m. in Singapore.

The contract, which expires today, fell $2.14, or 3.4 percent, to $61.66 a barrel yesterday, the lowest close since March 21 and the biggest one-day decline since May 15.

The more actively traded November contract was at $62.25, up 8 cents, in after-hours trading, after falling 3.7 percent yesterday.

Oil futures reached a record $78.40 a barrel on July 14. Prices have fallen 21 percent the past two months as U.S. stockpiles rose and the United Nation's Aug. 31 deadline for Iran to stop uranium enrichment passed without sanctions being imposed.

French Initiative

French President Jacques Chirac yesterday proposed the suspension of plans for sanctions against Iran if the Islamic republic also suspended its enrichment during negotiations.

DOJ_NMG_0065936

The U.S. agrees with the French strategy and will ``come to the table," once Iran has suspended its enrichment, Bush said yesterday. The U.S. has ``no objection" to Iran's pursuing of a truly peaceful nuclear power program, he said.

``The Bush speech was tame relative to what a lot of us expected," Nauman Barakat, senior vice president of global energy futures at Macquarie Futures USA Inc. in New York, said yesterday. He ``appears to have moved to the European position."

Hedge funds may also be selling futures after seeing others lose money in the energy market and as the pace of the decline in oil has accelerated, analysts and traders said.

``We can't know that for sure, but I think some of that probably is happening," Excel's Waggoner said. ``The trend is now down and you go with the trend."

Amaranth

Amaranth Advisors LLC, a hedge-fund manager overseeing about $9.5 billion, told investors Sept. 18 that its two main funds fell an estimated 50 percent this month because of a plunge in natural-gas prices.

``The Amaranth debacle has spread to other markets to an extent," Aaron Kildow, a broker at Prudential Financial Derivatives LLC in New York, said yesterday.

Hedge-fund managers and other large speculators have cut their bets on rising oil prices for each of the past four weeks, according to the Commodity Futures Trading Commission.

Net long positions, the difference between bets on rising prices and bets on falling prices, fell by 22 percent to 37,020 contracts in the week ended Sept. 15. Short positions rose to their highest since March 14.

``These funds can go short as quickly as they went long," Jason Schenker, an economist with Wachovia Corp. in Charlotte, North Carolina, said yesterday. ``I think the most important thing at the moment is how lush product inventories are."

Stockpiles

An Energy Department report today will probably show U.S. supplies of distillates, including diesel and heating oil, rose by 1.8 million barrels last week, their sixth straight gain, based on the median estimate from a Bloomberg News survey of 16 analysts.

Inventories held 144.6 million barrels the week before, 12 percent more than the five-year average for the period.

Gasoline supplies probably rose for a fifth week, gaining 650,000 barrels according to analyst survey. Inventories held 207 million barrels on Sept. 8, 3.8 percent higher than the five-year average.

Gasoline for October delivery was at $1.5090 a gallon in after-hours trading, after falling 4.8 percent to $1.5038 yesterday, the lowest close since Feb. 22.

October heating oil was at $1.6980 a gallon, after falling 2 percent to $1.6916 yesterday, the lowest close since March 10.

Wall Street Dips On Mix Of Negative News (FT)

By John O'Doherty

Financial Times, September 20, 2006

Wall Street finished lower on Tuesday as investor confidence was soured by data showing a precipitous drop in housing starts, a warning on profits from internet group Yahoo, and news of a possible coup in Thailand.

Yahoo slumped 11.2 per cent to $25.75, erasing eight weeks of gains, after its chief financial officer said the company's quarterly results would be at the bottom end of a previously forecast range, due to slowing advertising demand.

The news also dragged down other internet stocks. Google shed 2.6 per cent to $403.81, and Ebay sank 3.3 per cent to $25.95.

Crude oil prices tumbled, as high inventories helped ease supply worries. The front-month Nymex contract lost 3.2 per cent to $61.66 a barrel, its biggest single day decline since May. Valero slid 4.3 per cent to $50.10, and Devon Energy lost 3.8 per cent to $64.32.

Mining stocks were also hurt by falls in copper and gold prices. Barrick Gold sank 4.1 per cent to $28.76, and Freeport McMoran also slipped 4.1 per cent to $51.26.

Semiconductor group Maxim Integrated Products lowered its revenue and earnings guidance for the fiscal first quarter due to sluggish orders. Its shares fell 4.9 per cent to $29.84. The stock has fallen 17 per cent since the start of the year.

Time Warner announced that its strategy of not charging its AOL broadband subscribers access fees was succeeding in attracting new internet users. Its shares rose 1.5 per cent to $17.3 9.

At the close, the S&P 500 was down 0.2 per cent, or 2.87 points, at 1,318.31, while the Nasdaq Composite was down 0.6 per cent, or 13.38 points, at 2,222.37. The Dow Jones Industrial Average dropped 0.1 per cent, or 14.09 points, to 11,540.91.

The producer price index – a measure of inflation at the wholesale level – fell more than expected in August, boosting investor confidence that further interest rate increases were not on the horizon.

However, housing starts fell 6 per cent in August, more than twice as much as expected. The steep decline in housing starts followed a report on Monday that sh owed confidence among homebuilders at a 15-year low.

Uncertainty deepened after the Thai military was reported to have declared martial law and to have announced a suspension of the constitution.

Pharmaceuticals group ImClone Systems tumbled 4.5 per cent to $29.16 after a New York judge ruled that three Israeli scientists from the Yeda research institute were the true inventors of a process used to create its cancer drug Erbitux.

"Last night's development is the worst possible scenario for ImClone, since Yeda, as sole inventors, might be entitled to large-sum damages," said Yaron Werber of Citigroup, who reiterated a "sell" rating on the stock.

U.S. Stocks Fall On Yahoo Forecast, Signs Of Housing Slowdown (BLOOM)

By Allen Wan

Bloomberg, September 20, 2006

Sept. 19 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. stocks retreated, snapping the Nasdaq Composite Index's longest winning streak in eight months, as slowing advertising growth at Yahoo! Inc. and a drop in home construction suggested the economy is losing momentum.

Yahoo, the most-visited U.S. Web site, tumbled 11 percent and spurred losses in technology shares. Toll Brothers Inc. led declines among homebuilders, the market's worst performers this year aside from Internet companies.

Stocks reached the day's lows after Thailand's military seized control of the country and the prime minister declared a state of emergency. While prices rebounded in afternoon trading, an inflation report that suggested the Federal Reserve will keep interest rates unchanged tomorrow failed to reassure investors.

``The market's vulnerable," said David Briggs, senior vice president of equity trading at Federated Investment Management in Pittsburgh, which has $30 billion in stocks. ``People begin to wonder about the psyche of the average consumer and how it might slow up the economy."

The Standard & Poor's 500 Index fell 2.87, or 0.2 percent, to 1318.31. Energy shares had the biggest drop among the benchmark's 10 industry groups as oil tumbled to a six-month low. The Dow Jones Industrial Average lost 14.09, or 0.1 percent, to 11,540.91.

Nasdaq's Drop

The Nasdaq fell for the first time in eight days, declining 13.38, or 0.6 percent, to 2222.37. The gauge last rose for seven consecutive sessions in the period ended Jan. 11.

Stocks opened lower after the government said a glut of unsold homes spurred a 6 percent plunge in housing starts. Losses accelerated after Yahoo said its profit and sales will be at the low end of its forecasts this quarter and Thai military chiefs took the capital.

Shares of mutual funds that invest in Thailand dropped in U.S. trading. Thai Fund Inc. fell 3.8 percent to $8.65 after earlier tumbling as much as 7.1 percent. Thai Capital Fund Inc. lost 4.4 percent to $9.70.

The housing report, along with Yahoo's forecast, raised concern that corporate profits may slow and supplanted confidence that the Fed will keep interest rates at 5.25 percent tomorrow for the second straight meeting after raising them for two consecutive years.

Yahoo Slumps

Yahoo plunged $3.25 to $25.75 for the biggest decline in the S&P 500.

Profit and sales this quarter will be at the low end of the company's forecast range on slower advertising demand from automakers and financial services companies, Chief Financial Officer Susan Decker said. It was Yahoo's biggest retreat since July 19.

Other Internet shares declined. Google Inc., the most-used Internet search engine, slid $10.88 to $403.81. Monster Worldwide Inc., owner of online job-listing service Monster.com, plunged $2.83 to $37.10. IAC/InterActiveCorp, an Internet and media company run by Barry Diller, was down 45 cents at $27.97.

Oracle Corp. rose $1.48, or 9.2 percent, to $17.61 in extended trading. The world's third-largest software maker said profit excluding some costs was 18 cents a share in the first quarter, beating a 16-cent estimate by Rick Sherlund, an analyst at Goldman, Sachs & Co. The shares fell 12 cents to $16.13 in regular trading.

Toll Brothers

Toll Brothers, the biggest luxury homebuilder, slumped 74 cents to $27.42. Pulte Homes Inc., the largest homebuilder by market value, slid 46 cents to $31.61.

The Commerce Department said builders started work on homes at an annual rate of 1.665 million last month, after a 1.772 million pace in July. Economists forecast 1.746 million.

``The lower-than-expected housing starts data raised the specter that the economy is slowing deeper than thought, corporate profits may slow and that stocks are not as fairly valued as investors thought they were," said Ken Tower, chief market strategist at CyberTrader Inc.

In a separate report, the Labor Department said producer prices rose 0.1 percent in August, matching the July increase. Economists had forecast a 0.3 percent gain. Excluding food and energy, prices dropped 0.4 percent, following a 0.3 percent decline in July. Economists expected a 0.2 percent increase.

About five stocks retreated for every three that rose on the New York Stock Exchange. Some 1.5 billion shares changed hands on the Big Board, 1.6 percent less than the three-month daily average.

Energy Stocks

A measure of energy stocks retreated 1.6 percent. Exxon Mobil Corp., the world's biggest oil company, declined 80 cents to $65.50.

Crude oil for October delivery fell 3.4 percent to $61.66 a barrel in New York, the lowest since March 21, after President George W. Bush said he will give diplomacy a chance to end a dispute with Iran over the country's nuclear program.

Micron Technology Inc. slid 39 cents to $17.74. Shares of the largest U.S. maker of computer-memory chips are expensive after price gains over the last several months, according to Citigroup Investment Research. Analyst Glen Yeung cut the stock to ``hold" from ``buy."

Dow Jones & Co., publisher of The Wall Street Journal, cut its third-quarter earnings forecast because of declining ad revenue at the paper. Profit will be as much as 11 cents a share, excluding a tax benefit of about 7 cents and severance costs of 1 cent. The company earlier forecast per-share profit in the ``low teens." The shares fell $1.08 to $32.79.

Icahn's Move

ImClone Systems Inc. plunged $1.36 to $29.16. The biotechnology company lost a court ruling that may result in the company paying royalties on its experimental cancer drug Erbitux to an Israeli research institute.

Billionaire financier Carl Icahn is also poised to gain control of one-third of ImClone's board and push to replace management. ImClone investors will vote on his board appointment at the company's annual meeting tomorrow.

Walt Disney Co. rose 41 cents, or 1.4 percent, to $30.47 for the biggest advance in the Dow. Chief Executive Officer Robert Iger expects the second-largest U.S. media company to sell $50 million worth of movies on Apple Computer Inc.'s iTunes Web site this year.

AutoZone Inc. added $4.57, or 4.9 percent, to $98.67 for the top gain in the S&P 500. The largest U.S. seller of auto parts had net income of $2.92 a share last quarter, beating the average analyst estimate of $2.79, according to Thomson Financial.

S&P 500 futures expiring in December lost 3.70 to 1330.50 on the Chicago Mercantile Exchange. Nasdaq-100 Index futures sank 10 to 1642.50.

The Russell 2000 Index, a benchmark for companies with a median market value of $596 million, fell 0.5 percent to 725.45. The Dow Jones Wilshire 5000 Total Market Index, the broadest measure of U.S. shares, retreated 0.3 percent to 13,170.14. Based on its decline, the value of stocks fell by $42.8 billion.

Fed Will Likely Pause On Interest Rates; Analysts See End Of Tightening (MCT)

By Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, September 20, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Federal Reserve is expected to leave interest rates unchanged Wednesday for a second straight month, and many analysts now think there won't be any more rate increases this year.

If true, that's good news for consumers, since the Fed's increases in the benchmark federal funds rate, an overnight rate that banks charge each other, influence a broad array of bank loans to consumers and businesses.

Falling oil and gasoline prices, along with a steeper-than-expected drop in new housing starts, are combining to reduce inflationary pressures that push up prices throughout the economy. The Fed's main job is to keep inflation in check. It now appears that the Fed's pause last month, which left the fed-funds rate at 5.25 percent after 17 consecutive quarter-point rate raises, may have ended the credit-tightening cycle that began in June 2004.

"I think we've probably seen the peak in terms of the Fed tightening. I think the economy will be soft enough for the second half of the year that over time it will help curb inflationary pressures," said Martin Regalia, chief economist of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and former Fed staffer.

When the Fed paused on Aug. 8, it issued a statement indicating that monetary policymakers believed the slowing U.S. economy would remove enough inflationary pressures to make another rate increase essentially overkill. The Fed said it wanted time to gauge the effects of its previous rate hikes, which take time to affect the economy.

Two months ago, crude oil cost more than $70 a barrel, and other raw materials were in hot demand globally and therefore were pricey. These trends drove up inflation, or the general rise of prices across the economy.

But in recent weeks, prices for oil, gasoline and many commodities have fallen sharply. And on Tuesday, the Commerce Department reported that housing starts dropped 6 percent in August to an annualized rate of 1.665 million.

That's the lowest rate in more than three years and a steeper plunge than most economists expected. Since housing drives much of U.S. economic activity, the slump points to a slowing economy. While a hot economy fans inflation, a slowing one douses it, reducing pressure on the Fed to raise rates.

"My view is we're done, and we'll have enough slowness brought on by the housing market and related consumer spending that they are probably cutting rates by the first quarter of next year," said Keith Hembre, the chief economist for First American Funds in Minneapolis.

It all depends, however, on whether energy prices spike up again and whether consumer and producer prices continue their downward trend. Both have been at the high end of the Fed's perceived tolerance zone.

The Labor Department reported Tuesday that wholesale prices are moderating but have been rising at a 3.7 percent annualized rate. Consumer prices are up 3.8 percent over the past 12 months.

But when the volatile energy and food sectors are stripped out, annual wholesale inflation stands at 0.9 percent, well within the Fed's comfort zone of 2 percent or less. Core consumer prices remain more problematic, rising by 2.8 percent from August 2005 through August 2006, but they now appear to be moderating.

"It seems highly unlikely that conditions change enough to put the Fed back in play," Hembre said.

Gauge Of Inflation Falls In August (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

A widely watched gauge of inflation fell again in August, providing fresh evidence that prices, which have climbed steadily for most of the year, may now be settling down.

The Labor Department reported today that the producer price index, which measures the wholesale prices that businesses charge one another, rose just 0.1 percent overall, matching the slowest pace of growth seen so far this year.

More tellingly, the so-called core index, excluding the volatile prices of food and energy, declined in August, as it did in July.

Adding to the weight of evidence that the economy is cooling, a separate statistical report showed further weakness in the housing market, with housing starts and new building permits both declining.

It was the inflation data, however, that surprised economists the most. Few had predicted that the core index would decline in August; it had been rising about 0.3 percent a month for most of the year, and the July decline of 0.3 percent might have been an anomaly. But the Labor Department said today that the core index fell 0.4 percent in August.

The August results helped lower the annual wholesale inflation rate to 0.9 percent, the first reading below 1 percent since early in 2004.

The Federal Reserve, which had ratcheted up interest rates steadily for two years in an effort to rein in inflation, stopped doing so only last month, with its key overnight lending rate at 5.25 percent. Together, today's statistics and a report last week that consumer-price inflation is moderating give the Fed some breathing room to leave interest rates untouched again when its policy committee meets tomorrow.

Certainly, standing pat is what many economists expect the Fed to do. "The unexpected 0.4 percent decline in core P.P.I. in August is more good news on the inflation front," wrote Capital Economics this morning in a research report. "Today's data provides more evidence, if any were needed, that rates are on hold and the next move will be downwards."

Mickey Levy, chief economist with the Bank of America, said today's report will further reinforce the public perception that inflationary pressures are easing. "It changes the psychology of inflation," he said. "It gives a boost to the consumer at exactly the right time, when housing clearly has downside momentum."

Today's data also showed that prices of goods in the early stages of the production chain are not increasing as quickly, a sign that wholesale prices could continue to moderate in future months.

But the link between producer prices and consumer prices is never a direct one, so it is unclear how much the decline in wholesale price increases in August will affect consumer prices in the coming months.

"Businesses still have some pricing power," Mr. Levy said, adding that he thinks consumer prices will be little changed.

Federal Judges Take Steps To Improve Accountability (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

WASHINGTON, Sept. 19 — The federal judiciary's top leadership responded Tuesday to criticism from Congress and elsewhere about asserted lapses in judicial ethics by announcing several steps aimed at enhanced self-policing and greater public accountability.

All federal judges below the Supreme Court level will be required to install "conflict checking" software on their computers to avoid unwittingly participating in cases in which they have a financial interest. Such software has recently become available but is not being used widely by federal judges, said Judge Thomas F. Hogan, who leads the executive committee of the Judicial Conference of the United States, which took the action at its semiannual meeting at the Supreme Court.

The conference, a group of 27 judges led by the chief justice of the United States, sets policy for the federal courts, but its jurisdiction does not extend to the Supreme Court.

The conference also adopted a policy on the attendance by federal judges at educational seminars sponsored by outside groups, the source of considerable controversy in recent years.

Judges will be prohibited from accepting reimbursement for attending a private seminar unless its sponsor has filed a public disclosure statement on the content of the program and all sources of financing. Judges will have 30 days to report their attendance at such seminars, and both the judges' and the seminars' reports will be available on judicial Web sites. The policy does not apply to bar association activities.

Federal judges have been criticized for attending expenses-paid seminars on economic and environmental issues sponsored by business-oriented groups that oppose much government regulation. Since 2000, bills have been introduced in Congress to ban judges' attendance at private seminars.

The conference has opposed the legislation as raising concerns of free speech and the separation of powers. In 2001, Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist denounced it in a speech as "antithetical to our American system."

Douglas T. Kendall, a leading critic of judges' attendance at private seminars, called the new policy "a dramatic change for the better."

Mr. Kendall, executive director of Community Rights Counsel, a public policy group here, has pursued the issue for years, at one point publicizing the names of more than 200 judges who had taken trips sponsored by business interests. In an interview on Tuesday, he said the new policy was a "very positive development that should have a significant effect on this practice."

Separately on Tuesday, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. endorsed a report proposing improvements in the handling of individual complaints against federal judges under the Judicial Conduct and Disability Act of 1980. The report was the product of a six-member committee, led by Justice Stephen G. Breyer, that Chief Justice Rehnquist set up two years ago.

The 1980 law established a complex and decentralized system for dealing with complaints from members of the public that a judge had "engaged in conduct prejudicial to the effective and expeditious administration of the business of the courts." Complaints are initially reviewed by each federal circuit's chief judge, who has considerable discretion in how to proceed.

Justice Breyer's committee found that while the bulk of routine complaints, about 700 a year, were handled properly, there was an "error rate" of nearly 30 percent in nonroutine cases, those in which complaints against judges had attained some degree of public visibility. That error rate was "far too high," the report said in recommending various steps for dealing with the problem.

One proposal was to encourage chief judges to refer sensitive cases to another of the 13 federal circuits. Others dealt with better education and training for the chief judges, who serve seven-year terms and thus may encounter only a handful of serious complaints in their tenure.

With Justice Breyer by his side, Chief Justice Roberts briefed reporters on the 183-page report, describing it as a "very important step on the judiciary's behalf in responding to criticism."

With some members of Congress calling for an inspector general to police the judiciary, many federal judges have grown increasingly concerned about the judiciary's public image and what they perceive as threats to the tradition of judicial independence. Earlier this year, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg called the independent counsel proposal "a really scary idea."

A clear if unspoken theme of the presentation on Tuesday was that judges were capable of policing themselves. Referring to Congress, Judge Hogan told reporters, "I would hope they would let us handle our own matters."

Justice Breyer described his committee's work as a "direct response" to criticism about lapses in judicial discipline. "The criticism turned out to be constructive," he said, adding that while the system was not "riddled with problems," it needed improvement to maintain public confidence.

Federal Judges Get New Disclosure Rules (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, September 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — The nation's federal judges will be required to disclose their attendance at corporate-sponsored seminars within 30 days of such programs, under rules approved Tuesday by the Judicial Conference of the United States.

The conference, the policymaking arm of the federal judiciary, also voted to require judges to use computer software that identifies cases in which a judge might have a conflict of interest and should not participate.

The moves are designed "to maintain public confidence in the system," said U.S. District Judge Thomas Hogan, a member of the 27-judge conference. He said it was important to have "transparency" in judges' off-bench activities.

Separately Tuesday, Chief Justice John Roberts released the results of a two-year study on how court circuits handle complaints of judicial misconduct. The study, led by Justice Stephen Breyer, found that about 30% of certain "high-visibility" claims — those that had been subject to considerable media attention — had been mishandled. The study recommended ways for judges to improve responses to such complaints.

The actions apply to all 875 life-tenured federal judges except the nine-member Supreme Court, which is exempt from the Judicial Conference rules but generally bound by ethical canons. The moves come as judges have been subject to increasing complaints on a range of matters. Among them: whether judges are sufficiently vigilant about possible conflicts of interests or appearances of impropriety in accepting privately financed travel, and whether they are policing their own.

Critics have included members of Congress — notably House Judiciary Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., who has proposed that an “inspector general” be created for the judiciary to investigate waste, fraud and ethical violations. Among outside groups that have been most critical of judges is the Community Rights Counsel, which has questioned whether some judges have been influenced by corporate-backed outings.

The Judicial Conference's most significant action was requiring judges to disclose their attendance at privately financed seminars within 30 days of a program, rather than waiting to do so on their annual financial disclosure filings. The conference said judges may attend such seminars only when sponsors have made public the companies and other sources supporting them, the topics to be covered and the names of the speakers.

Federal Judges Step Up Disclosure (AP-Y)

By Mark Sherman

AP, September 19, 2006

Federal judges decided Tuesday to require faster and fuller disclosure of their expense-paid trips, a response to criticism that the travel could undermine the public's faith in an impartial judiciary.

The nation's 2,200 federal judges also will have to use computer software that is intended to make it easier for them to identify and step aside from cases in which they have a financial conflict.

The changes were made by the Judicial Conference of the United States, a 27-judge body led by Chief Justice John Roberts that met at the Supreme Court.

Roberts also released a report from a committee headed by Justice Stephen Breyer that found problems in the way judges have handled high-profile complaints against their colleagues. Mistakes in these matters "might discourage people with legitimate complaints from filing them," Breyer said in a briefing for reporters in which he was joined by Roberts.

The work represents an aggressive effort by the Roberts-led federal judiciary to demonstrate its responsiveness to public criticism and ward off proposals in Congress to clamp down on judicial ethics through a travel ban or creation of an ethics watchdog for the court.

"I'd hope they'd let us work on our situations, as they come up, ourselves," said Chief Judge Thomas Hogan of U.S. District Court in Washington, the chairman of the Judicial Conference's executive committee.

Under the new trips policy, sponsors must reveal in advance who is paying for a judge's travel to private seminars. The information is to be posted on the judicial branch's Web site.

Then, within 30 days of the end of the program, judges must file a report about the trip. Local court Web sites will have the information.

Until now, judges have had to report their expense-paid travel in their annual financial disclosures.

The new rules will not apply to the Supreme Court, which has no written ethics rules and is not covered by the Judicial Conference.

The attention to judges' travel has increased in recent years with reports in 2004 that Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia went duck hunting with Vice President Dick Cheney as the court was considering Cheney's appeal in a records secrecy case. Scalia refused to step down from hearing the case.

A liberal-leaning environmental organization, the Community Rights Counsel, also has produced records showing that cigarette-makers and oil companies gave money to two conservative groups that host seminars for judges.

The groups, the Foundation for Research on Economics and the Environment in Bozeman, Mont., and the Law and Economics Center at George Mason University in Virginia, have said that corporate money they receive is not linked to the seminars.

Doug Kendall, executive director of the Community Rights Counsel, said the new travel policy sends "an unmistakable message to judges that they need to be careful, that they need to think long and hard before attending a junket."

Computer software for identifying financial conflicts has been around for years, but Hogan said that judges had found it cumbersome. A new version is easier to use, he said.

Judges, including Supreme Court justices, are required by law to stay out of cases in which they have a financial stake. Members of the high court, however, decide for themselves when to recuse with no oversight.

The conflict issue arose during Supreme Court Justice Samuel Alito's confirmation hearings. Alito, then a judge on the 3rd Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals, failed to disqualify himself from participating in a Vanguard case in 2002 despite having investments in Vanguard mutual funds.

Alito and his backers offered differing reasons for his inaction, including a computer glitch in conflict-checking software.

New Rules Mean Shift Toward Accountability For Judiciary (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 20, 2006

Responding to complaints about judicial junkets and conflicts of interest, the Judicial Conference on Tuesday enacted new rules to force judges to use conflict-checking software and to promptly disclose their participation in privately sponsored seminars for which they are reimbursed.

Separately, a committee headed by Supreme Court Justice Stephen Breyer issued a report recommending modest changes in how federal courts handle ethical complaints that members of the public file against judges. Among the recommendations is what Breyer described as a "Dutch uncle approach," whereby judges would seek advice on handling certain complaints from judges of another circuit to avoid "home court" bias.

Together, Tuesday's actions represent a major shift toward accountability -- or at least transparency -- from segments of a branch of government that has often resisted both.

Judges also hoped to defuse pressure from Congress, primarily in the person of House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., who has proposed creating an inspector general's office to oversee the judiciary's handling of ethical complaints. The late Chief Justice William Rehnquist appointed the Breyer Committee in 2004, mainly in response to congressional complaints.

"Issuance of the two policies and the Breyer Committee report are responsive to these concerns," says University of Richmond law professor Carl Tobias. "If the judiciary does not police itself, Congress may well attempt to do so in ways that judges may find troubling."

Tuesday's focus on judicial ethics comes on the eve of the Sept. 21 hearings by the House Judiciary Committee that could lead to the impeachment of California federal trial Judge Manuel Real, which would be the first judicial impeachment since 1989.

Significantly, none of what happened Tuesday affects the Supreme Court itself. The Judicial Conference never sets policy for the high court, and Breyer, speaking at the same press conference, said the scope of his committee's study of disciplinary procedures did not include the Supreme Court. As a result, it appears the justices have still not taken action on a 1993 recommendation by a blue-ribbon government commission that the Court consider establishing procedures for handling complaints against its own members.

Breyer said his committee concluded that, overall, the handling of ethical complaints by lower federal courts "does not suggest a serious problem," but a better job needs to be done in some instances, especially in the handling of complex complaints that receive media attention.

The Judicial Conference actions could have the most immediate impact on privately sponsored seminars other than those hosted by bar associations and judicial education groups.

Under the new rules, judges will be barred from accepting reimbursement for seminars hosted by organizations that do not publicly disclose their funding sources, speakers' names, and other information. Once they attend, judges will have to publicly disclose their attendance on their court's Web site within 30 days.

"The new junket rules are a pretty dramatic change of course for the judiciary, and they send a clear statement to judges that they should think twice before attending junkets," Doug Kendall of the Community Rights Counsel said Tuesday. Kendall's group has repeatedly criticized judges for attending seminars funded by companies with an interest in influencing how judges handle economic and environmental cases.

One of the targets of Kendall's criticism has been the Montana-based Foundation for Research on Economics & the Environment (FREE), which has hosted hundreds of federal judges in the past 15 years. It asserts that none of the funding for its judicial seminars comes from any corporate entity or any foundation that participates in federal litigation.

"I've seen the requirements, and everything they ask for, we've been doing voluntarily," says FREE Executive Vice President Pete Geddes. "FREE is happy to do anything it can to reassure the public about the integrity and independence of the judiciary."

The conference's action on conflict-checking software reflects the concern that many judges don't think it works well and have not put it to use. Now they will have to, said D.C. District Court Chief Judge Thomas Hogan, head of the conference's executive committee.

Hogan told reporters his software reminds him of a potential conflict of interest every time a party named Johnson appears before him. That, he said with a laugh, is because he and his wife own stock in the medical company Johnson & Johnson.

McAuliffe To Join Clinton (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, September 20, 2006

Former Democratic National Committee Chairman Terry McAuliffe has told business associates and Democratic donors that he will chair Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's (D-N.Y.) presidential campaign next year, according to several Democratic sources.

Together, Clinton, the favorite to win the Democratic nomination, and McAuliffe, the top money man in Democratic politics, have a good chance of raising $100 million before the first official contest, the Iowa caucuses in January 2008.

While Clinton and her staff insist she is focused solely on winning reelection in New York this November, the decision over who will be in charge of getting her elected to the White House is already settled.

McAuliffe told The Hill yesterday that Clinton has not made a decision on running for president and will not do so until after Nov. 7. McAuliffe also denied telling friends that he will serve as chairman, although sources contradict him.

He acknowledged that he would play a "huge role" in her presidential campaign if it materializes and that he has recruited donors for a possible White House run.

"I would just say that I hope she runs," said McAuliffe. "She's focused on the Senate and I'm focused on helping Democrats.

"Would I have a huge role on the campaign? Of course, that's not real news. People know that I have has been around lining up people if she decides to run."

Clinton referred questions to her Senate campaign, where spokeswoman Ann Lewis said, "There is no decision, there is no [presidential] campaign; if there is no campaign there are no titles."

Clinton's camp is not the only one among presidential hopefuls lining up donors for 2008. Allies of each of the Democratic contenders are aggressively seeking commitments because of the huge amount of money that will be needed next year.

McAuliffe, who became DNC chairman in 2001, said he has had no conversations with Clinton about titles and that Democrats are merely speculating about the role he would serve in the campaign.

Since he stepped down as DNC chairman after the 2004 election, he has been involved with about a dozen private companies by his own estimate. He said he has raised money for investment funds and real estate deals, and even dabbled in the energy sector. He has also served on the advisory board of Carret Asset Management, an investment firm in New York.

But McAuliffe said he would quickly drop these commitments to help Clinton if she ran for president.

"I would take off time and go full time," he said of his expected level of commitment.

Early next year, around the time Clinton is expected to launch an exploratory campaign committee, McAuliffe's new book " What a Party!: My Life Among Democrats" is expected to be in stores. It will span McAuliffe's 25 years in politics and discuss the strengths and weaknesses of his party, including the successes of the Clinton presidency.

Although McAuliffe's specialty is raising money, he would probably not be satisfied serving only as Clinton's presidential finance chairman.

"To be finance chair would be beneath him," said one Democratic donor close to Clinton, who added that McAuliffe is "trying to make his presence felt" in moneyed Democratic circles.

No Democratic fundraiser has as high a profile as McAuliffe. Nevertheless, he may be feeling some competition from the many Clinton allies who are positioning themselves as important financial players for her presidential campaign.

"She's got a full operation," said Wade Randlett, a prominent Democratic fundraiser based in San Francisco, of the network of Democrats who are laying the financial groundwork for Clinton in the Bay Area. "There are many, many friends who are active for her."

Randlett said donors who have met Clinton leave the room certain that she will run for president. He said the same clear impression is given by two other hopefuls, Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) and former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner (D).

"For Kerry, for Warner, and for Hillary, they are all a certainty," said Randlett. "People leaving the room all think she's running for president."

Randlett also said Bay Area donors have been told that Clinton will not visit there again between now and Election Day so as not to compete for campaign contributions in a Democratic fundraising hub with candidates running for the House and Senate.

Democratic fundraisers report that all politicians with an eye on the White House have been vigorously recruiting donors for primary season. That's because the Democrats have front-loaded the season even more than in 2004.

With key contests crammed into the first few weeks of 2008, giving the early front-runner the chance to eliminate rivals almost in a fell swoop, there is a premium on raising primary money next year ready to hit the early races in a winter avalanche.

"People are going to have to telescope and enormous amount of fundraising in a very short period of time," said Steve Grossman, a Democratic fundraiser who served as DNC chairman under Clinton. "In my judgment, if you can't raise the better part of $50 million, you're not going to be a first tier candidate.

Given Clinton's stature and McAuliffe's stature as a fundraiser, Republicans have little doubt that she will have close to $100 million in her presidential campaign coffers at the end of next year.

Raising that amount of money in the year before an election year would not be unprecedented. The Bush-Cheney '04 campaign reported $99.1 million in its account at the end of 2003.

"There's a growing consensus that the top-tier candidates of both political parties are going to opt out of the public financing for the general election as well as the primaries, which [would be] the first time in history that has occurred," said Federal Election Commission Chairman Michael Toner.

If candidates forego public funding for the 2008 presidential primary and general elections, they will be able to collect contributions for both elections as soon as they form exploratory committees.

Said Toner: "The higher contribution limits of [the] McCain-Feingold [campaign finance law] combined with candidates raising money for general and primary combined with a polarized electorate sets the stage for record-breaking fundraising."

McCain May Alienate Some Conservatives (AP-Y)

By Liz Sidoti

DOJ_NMG_0065946

Republican Sen. John McCain's standoff with the White House over treatment of detainees — an issue the former POW knows intimately well — threatens to exacerbate his already contentious relationship with conservatives.

"Maverick status is looked upon as a strength in Congress, but a maverick in the White House is not looked upon with great admiration from our folks," Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, said Monday.

"Politically, this isn't wise," added the Rev. Louis Sheldon, chairman of the Traditional Values Coalition, which supports the president's call for Congress to approve tough interrogation techniques for terrorism suspects.

The Arizona senator has been a staunch supporter of President Bush on the Iraq war. He has alienated conservatives, however, for opposing a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage and supporting federal expansion of embryonic stem-cell research.

Social conservatives also have taken issue with his effort to overhaul the immigration system, in part, by granting millions of illegal immigrants a path to eventual citizenship, and his work with a rogue group of senators to avert a Senate fight over Bush's judicial nominations.

The warnings from conservatives over the detainee issue illustrate the risk McCain faces in taking on the White House — alienating a base of support he would need to win the Republican presidential nomination.

As the clash escalated, McCain shrugged off suggestions that the dust-up could hurt him politically, telling reporters last week that his "credibility with the American people is that I do what I think is right."

Meantime, one of McCain's potential rivals for the GOP nomination, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, has made it known that he supports the president's immigration position, saying that Republicans who have broken rank with Bush "made a big mistake."

Still, McCain could benefit by showing voters he stands alone and inoculating himself from future efforts to link him to the legacy of Bush, whose support in public opinion polls hovers in the low 40 percent range.

McCain advisers brush off the notion of long-term political consequences.

"At the end of the day, he's going to do what he thinks is right, and when he does that, it works out politically," said John Weaver, a senior political adviser for McCain. He added that when McCain doesn't hold true to that, it usually "blows up in our face."

Long known as a maverick, McCain's latest tussle with the White House is over the president's insistence that Congress allow the CIA to use aggressive methods against terrorism suspects.

McCain and a growing group of Senate Republicans contend the United States must adhere strictly to the Geneva Conventions international standards.

Bush wants Congress to quickly pass his own proposed legislation authorizing military tribunals for detainees and harsh interrogations of terror suspects. Last week, he singled out McCain, a rival for the presidential nomination in 2000, making clear whom he blamed for standing in the way.

A year ago, McCain led a high-profile charge in Congress to clarify a law against torture by extending it to also ban cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment of prisoners. The White House issued a veto threat.

But McCain, a former Navy pilot tortured during nearly six years of imprisonment in Vietnam, attracted enough support in the House and Senate to override a veto. After a very public spat, the White House and McCain reached an agreement that essentially resulted in the senator getting what he wanted. Bush signed the bill in December.

Since then, McCain has resisted engaging in a public battle over how the administration has implemented the law, choosing instead to use back channels to make known his displeasure and negotiate with the Pentagon and the White House. That changed last week.

"We have an honest disagreement with some particular points of this topic," said Weaver, who characterized the relationship between McCain and the White House as excellent.

Over the past year, McCain's ties to the president have grown. Several of Bush's high-profile campaign strategists have lined up behind McCain, widely considered the front-runner for the GOP's presidential nomination though he has yet to formally enter the race.

Traveling in politically pivotal New Hampshire over the weekend, McCain again was the target of conservatives' ire — this time because of his interrogation position.

The editorial page of the Manchester Union-Leader accused McCain of "blocking our ability to gain from terrorist captives the vital information we need to fight a war in which the enemy strikes us here at home from multiple locations around the world."

Sixteen months from presidential primary season, some Republicans believe McCain's latest haggling with the White House won't have lasting negative implications.

"In the long term, no one can hold a candle to McCain on national security issues," said Scott Reed, a Republican strategist. Plus, he said: "Strong poll numbers and a commanding lead in a presidential race allows everyone to forgive and forget."

The Republican Divide (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

With fewer than 50 days left until Election Day, as many as 40 House and 10 Senate seats are in play, fueling Democratic hopes of capturing power in November. Washington is awaiting polling data that will show how much success the White House has had in trying to put Democrats on the defensive on national security — and whether that effort has been undercut by the battle among Republicans over what is permissible in interrogating terrorism suspects.

Conventional wisdom is that the battling has derailed the effort to engage Democrats on the issue. But some Republicans say that while intramural warfare is never pretty, it has knocked Iraq out of the news and kept the campaign story line precisely where President Bush and Karl Rove want it.

But Republicans face additional peril from a public distressed at a Republican-controlled Congress that accomplished little this year. Strategists in both parties see increasing pressure on the two Republican camps to cut a deal on interrogation.

Redistricting Leaves Races In California, Elsewhere Cold Campaign Journal Offers Insights About Political Developments From The Front Lines Of The Fall Races Through Election Day. (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

MONTEREY, Calif. -- It's a red-hot election year, with control of Congress at stake, and this political reporter has come to the state with a whopping 53 of the 435 U.S. House seats. That's one-eighth of the congressional total and 21 more seats than the next biggest state, Texas. So why do the seagulls over Monterey Bay seem to be screaming in reproach?

Because it's less than eight weeks until Election Day Nov. 7, and not a single one of those 53 congressional contests is competitive enough to merit a busy correspondent's attention.

In a year of anti-Republican and anti-incumbent fever, that fact stands as a testament to the completeness of California's bipartisan gerrymandering. The mapping of political lines for partisan advantage after each decennial census may have originated back east with Massachusetts Gov. Elbridge Gerry 194 years ago, but it has been perfected here on the West Coast.

Of course, California isn't alone. Nearly all states have maps for their legislatures and congressional districts drawn by incumbents, to protect incumbents. Where one party dominates, as in Texas, the lines reflect that. Where power is divided, the two parties' mutual back-scratching makes the redistricting process a bipartisan one even when nothing else is.

For all the talk, then, of what a contentious campaign year this is -- and it is -- some perspective is in order: The nation's political chattering class now counts about 45 U.S. House seats as potentially winnable by either party; most are currently held by the beleaguered Republicans. That total is more competitive districts than in most election years, but it is still just over 10% of the total House. That means in almost nine out of 10 House districts, voters could be excused for not knowing there's a congressional election come November. So while Democrats need just 15 seats to regain the majority they lost in 1994, the pool of pickings is a small one. (See related article8.)

Consider these excerpts from the most recent outlook for House races from nonpartisan handicapper Stuart Rothenberg: "Alabama…No competive races." "Alaska…Forget it." "Arkansas…Nothing." "Delaware…A snoozer." "Kansas…No races of interest." "Maine…Nothing of interest." "Massachusetts…No contests of note." "Michigan…Nothing especially compelling." "Mississippi…Don't bother." Ditto for the Dakotas, Oklahoma, Oregon, Rhode Island and Utah.

California did draw national attention briefly last spring, for a June special election to fill the seat that former Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham vacated for a prison cell after his conviction on corruption charges. Although the suburban San Diego district is a mostly Republican enclave, Democrats had high hopes of seizing the seat, given the notoriety of Mr. Cunningham's case and the political headwinds against Republicans generally. But the Republican candidate, former Rep. Brian Bilbray, easily dispatched with Democrat Francine Busby. The two are on the ballot again in November for a full two-year term, and Mr. Bilbray now rates as the prohibitive favorite.

Similarly, national Democrats initially targeted Republican Rep. Richard Pombo of California's Central Valley, with help from environmentalists outraged by his record as the House Resources Committee chairman. But their preferred candidate, a former Navy officer, lost in June's Democratic primary to wind-energy engineer Jerry McNerney, who lost overwhelmingly to Mr. Pombo in 2004. Now most race-watchers are ignoring this one, too, though just this week the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee put the Pombo-McNerney contest on a new list called "emerging races."

Also on that long-shot list is the suburban Sacramento district represented for 16 years by Rep. John Doolittle; he and his wife have been implicated in the scandal involving convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff. This week the Sacramento Bee newspaper endorsed Democratic challenger Charlie Brown, a former Air Force pilot in Vietnam and the first Persian Gulf war, saying, "Doolittle is emblematic of what's wrong in Washington." It takes a big scandal to turn a safe seat like Mr. Doolittle's into one the opposition party can seize, but often even that isn't enough -- as Republicans' retention of the former Cunningham seat shows.

Redistricting in California "has really done a very effective job of creating safe Republican and Democratic seats, and it's just really hard to break in," says Leon Panetta, the Democrat who represented the Monterey Bay area for eight terms until he left in 1993 to be President Clinton's budget director and then White House chief of staff. Among other things, Mr. Panetta and his wife, Sylvia, have founded the Panetta Institute for Public Policy here, and every year they invite speakers from Washington to address policy, politics and the press for students from the California State University system. The current group of students ask lots of questions about U.S. politics. None go to their home state's congressional races.

Here, as in most places, the state legislative leaders draw the political boundaries for the state House and Senate districts every 10 years, but let the state's senior members of Congress effectively draw the U.S. House district lines. In California in 2001, that meant Republican Rep. David Dreier, chairman of the powerful House Rules Committee, and Democratic Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi. In a state where the parties generally are more polarized than anywhere, both sides agreed to turn over the job of redistricting to expert Michael Berman, brother of longtime Democratic Rep. Howard Berman. The resulting map protected all but one Republican incumbent and preserved Democrats' big 33-20 majority of the U.S. House delegation for the increasingly blue state.

In both 2002 and 2004, only one of the 53 districts was at all competitive. So this year's dearth of races isn't surprising, except that it occurs in one of the most volatile, anti-incumbent seasons in years. In effect, Democrats have all the seats they can possibly grab here.

Last year, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger called on voters to approve an initiative that would leave the redistricting of state and federal districts to a nonpartisan commission of retired judges. Mr. Panetta, who supported the proposal, says the Governator told him that rarely do the state legislative leaders of both parties come to his office at the same time, but on this one "they walked in together and said, 'You cannot put this initiative forward.'" Mr. Schwarzenegger told Mr. Panetta, "When that happened, I knew it was the right thing to do."

But the ballot initiative, like redistricting itself, was "the one area where bipartisanship prevailed -- both Republicans and Democrats opposed it," Mr. Panetta recalls. A bipartisan bankroll financed the media campaign against the initiative, and it was easily defeated. Which helps explain why a national reporter visiting here now is watching seagulls instead of candidates.

Republicans Maintain Strong Fund-Raising Edge (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

WASHINGTON -- As both political parties steel themselves for a furious final push before Election Day, Republicans maintain a strong fund-raising advantage that could play a pivotal role in close races.

Financial-disclosure reports to be released today will show that the Republican National Committee has more than triple the cash as its counterpart, the Democratic National Committee. The RNC raised $7.6 million in August and has $39 million in the bank, compared with the DNC's August donations of $6.7 million and a balance of $11 million in the bank.

RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman has promised to use that money to bombard the airwaves with negative advertisements aimed at Democrats and to run a high-tech, get-out-the-vote operation that will overwhelm their opponents' operations.

The Democratic financial disadvantage stems from a decision by DNC Chairman Howard Dean to spend money to hire full-time workers in state party offices who can help produce a national turnout program this year, as well as sustain the party through more than one election cycle.

Mr. Dean's decision has created friction with House and Senate Democratic leaders, who fear the more immediate consequences of such an imbalance -- particularly when the opposition onslaught hits the television airwaves.

That barrage could be offset somewhat by the work of the Democrats' House campaign committee, which released numbers yesterday that show continued fundraising strength and spending discipline.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee raised $5 million in August and ended the month with $35 million -- a million dollars shy of its counterpart. The National Republican Congressional Committee said yesterday it collected $8.5 million in August donations and has $36 million in the bank.

The senatorial committees are expected to release their figures tomorrow.

The biggest stakes are in the House, where Democrats see enough seats in play to gain the 15 they need to capture control. Still, it is an uphill slog that requires ousting several entrenched incumbents.

In a meeting with reporters yesterday, New York Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds, the NRCC chairman, said he is confident his party will prevail in the end, particularly given its national committee's overwhelming financial advantage. "We are not going to be outgunned. We are not going to be outrun," he said.

But during a wide-ranging discussion of closely contested races, Mr. Reynolds also conceded that his incumbent colleagues are being forced to fight their way to victory.

In his own state of New York, Democrats are expected to dominate the gubernatorial and Senate races. That means, Mr. Reynolds said, that he and other House Republicans must try to create their own voter-turnout operation after relying for years on outgoing Republican Gov. George Pataki's organization.

Party Groups Evenly Matched Financially (AP-Y)

Republican and Democratic committees battling over control of the House held almost equal amounts in their bank accounts, giving neither side a substantial financial advantage going into the final stretch of the congressional campaign.

Rep. Tom Reynolds, R-N.Y., the chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, said his organization raised $8.5 million last month and had $36 million cash on hand at the end of August. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee said it had collected $5 million in contributions last month and had $35 million in the bank.

Both committees are in substantially better shape financially than they were at a comparable point during the 2004 election. Reynolds said the NRCC had $10 million more in the bank than it did then. DCCC spokesman Bill Burton said the Democratic group was $15 million ahead of its 2004 mark.

"It's clear that Democrats are motivated for November and our historic fundraising shows the tremendous momentum behind the idea of a new direction," Burton said.

Democrats need to gain 15 seats in the House on Nov. 7 to take control after a dozen years of Republican rule. The two parties are battling in 36-40 competitive congressional districts.

Democrats are counting on public opinion polls that show them with a national political advantage. DCCC chairman Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., said voters are hungry for a "new direction."

"We will not be outgunned, we will not be outrun, and we are going to be in the majority in the 110th Congress," Reynolds countered.

Meanwhile, the Republican National Committee, the party's overarching political organization, said it would report raising $7.6 million in August, and cash on hand totaling more than $39 million. The Democratic National Committee said it raised nearly $6.7 million and had $10.9 million in the bank.

The overall election effort is being carried out by the national party committees and their respective House and Senate campaign committees. Together, their cumulative resources will help candidates in competitive races with advertising, mailing and voter mobilization. The two Senate committees did not release their August financial totals.

The RNC has already weighed in specific Senate races, buttressing the national Republican Senatorial Committee in Tennessee and in Ohio. On Tuesday, the RNC reported spending more than $500,000 in new advertising aimed at Sherrod Brown, the Democrat challenging incumbent Republican Mike DeWine. Overall, the RNC has spent more than $1.6 million in that contest.

Fundraising Picks Up For Committees (RC)

By David M. Drucker

Roll Call, September 20, 2006

Seven weeks before Election Day, an upbeat National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) guaranteed on Tuesday that his party would hold the House majority on the strength of its war chest, political organization and positions on the issues in the 36 districts that matter.

Reynolds announced that the NRCC would report raising more than $8.5 million in August, to end the month with $36 million on hand, when it files its report with the Federal Election Commission today. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee isn't far behind, raising $5 million in August and banking $35 million.

"Reports of our majority's demise are greatly exaggerated. We will be in the majority next Congress. You can count on it," Reynolds told reporters during a news conference.

While Reynolds boasted of being $10 million ahead of where the NRCC was in 2004 and raising $10 million to date for the committee's Battleground program, the DCCC countered that it is $15 million above where it was in the previous cycle.

Compared to 2004, when the DCCC at a similar point in the cycle trailed the NRCC by $4.7 million in cash on hand, the difference this year is negligible, said DCCC spokesman Bill Burton.

"The DCCC is competitive nationally and Democratic challengers are competitive locally," Burton said. "It's clear that Democrats are motivated for November, and our historic fundraising shows the tremendous momentum behind the idea of a new direction."

The DCCC's effort has been aided by several high-profile Democrats.

According to DCCC estimates obtained by Roll Call, a series of e-mails and direct-mail pieces pegged to Rep. John Murtha's (Pa.) anti-Iraq War message have netted the committee approximately $500,000 for the cycle.

Those figures, which include an e-mail plea released Monday, put the Pennsylvania lawmaker among the most prolific direct-mail fundraisers for the committee, behind only House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), who has raised about $15 million through e-mail and mail solicitations.

The direct-mail contributions represent less than half of the approximately $1.2 million Murtha — who in June announced that he would seek the Majority Leader's office if Democrats retake control of the House this fall — has raised for the committee this cycle, according to DCCC records.

The Pennsylvania lawmaker, among the top contributors to the DCCC, remains shy of completing his dues payments however, contributing $242,500 of the $250,000 required from ranking members on exclusive subcommittees.

House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (Md.) — who holds the No. 2 post in the Democratic leadership and widely had been considered the heir apparent to the Leader's office — has raised fewer funds via direct mail, but he has contributed more than $3 million to the DCCC this cycle, as well as the full $600,000 in dues required by his post.

Meanwhile, Reynolds on Tuesday was peppered with questions about Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) and whether it would be politically advantageous for Republicans if the admitted felon resigned from Congress.

Ney recently pleaded guilty to two felony counts of conspiracy and making false statements, including accepting "things of value" from disgraced GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff and a foreign businessman in return for official actions.

State Sen. Joy Padgett (R), who replaced Ney on the ballot in Ohio's 18th district, has called for Ney's resignation. But Reynolds, saying Padgett did what she felt she had to do to be successful in her race, declined to go that far.

"It's not going to be an issue in other seats in the country. That's between Bob Ney and his district, and Sen. Padgett has had her opinion," Reynolds said. "Right now he's in alcohol rehab, and I don't know of anyone that is going to talk to him."

Four Democrats Boost DSCC (RC)

By Paul Kane

Roll Call, September 20, 2006

A quartet of leading Senate Democrats gave $1 million each from their campaign accounts to the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee in recent days, as the Caucus makes its final push to give itself as much of a financial edge as possible over its GOP counterpart.

Sens. Edward Kennedy (Mass.), Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), Dick Durbin (Ill.) and Dianne Feinstein (Calif.) each gave $1 million from their campaign committees to the DSCC, according to Senators, aides and strategists. The Senators' campaign committees are allowed to give unlimited donations to national and state party organizations.

The donations — which represent the largest contributions the committee has received so far this election cycle — are part of the daily effort by DSCC Chairman Charles Schumer (N.Y.) to round up as much cash as possible to boost his committee's financial advantage over the National Republican Senatorial Committee, which trailed the DSCC by $15 million in cash on hand at the end of July.

The DSCC declined to discuss these contributions and Schumer's ongoing effort to round up even cash from the Caucus. But DSCC officials said Democratic incumbents are now putting up more money than in previous cycles.

"Democratic Senators are stepping up to the plate helping get us positioned to win," said Phil Singer, DSCC spokesman.

New figures through the end of August will be out today for the party campaign committees, but the $4 million worth of donations from Kennedy, Clinton, Durbin and Feinstein won't officially register with the Federal Election Commission until next month, sources said.

Senate Democrats have made raising money from electorally safe incumbents a critical component of their finance operation ever since the abolition at the end of 2002 of soft money — the unlimited donations from individuals, unions and other interests that the DSCC previously had relied on. In the 2004 cycle, Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), then Minority Whip, solidified his standing with his caucus by forking over a $1 million check to the DSCC, an amount that Schumer topped when he cut $2.5 million worth of checks to the committee and to state party committees in battleground states two years ago.

Despite the DSCC's $15 million edge over the NRSC, Schumer and Democrats are well aware that the GOP is banking on the Republican National Committee — which held a $33 million cash-on-hand advantage over the Democratic National Committee — to level the financial playing field for Senate races.

Senators in both parties are expected to lend a hand in fundraising, particularly in making calls to their most loyal donors to gather cash for party campaign committees and top candidates. But in the final weeks of the campaign season, donations straight from their campaign accounts to the DSCC and NRSC are highly sought after, since they are the easiest and quickest infusions of cash.

With his $1 million donation, Durbin is now the single largest donor to the DSCC, having already cut a check for $235,000 in January 2005 in an effort to help the committee wipe out its debt from the '04 cycle.

Through the end of July, the largest Senatorial donor to the NRSC was Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (Ky.), who donated $400,000 from his campaign account last year, according to FEC reports. These figures for the two campaign committees do not include donations that Senators gave from their separate political action committees, which are allowed to give $15,000 per year and $30,000 total for the two-year cycle.

Ann Lewis, a spokeswoman for Clinton's political operations, said the Senator thought of the $1 million check from her Friends of Hillary committee to be "the most direct support she can show, and she's pleased she'll be able to do it."

For Clinton, parting with $1 million was a bit easier than it was for other Senators. As of June 30, Clinton was sitting on $22 million for a re-election bid that has turned into a virtual coronation. Kennedy and Feinstein, who also are facing nominal challenges in November, were sitting on $8.7 million and $8 million, respectively, at mid-summer.

However, Clinton is considering a presidential bid, and any leftover money from this Senate campaign can be directly transferred into a White House campaign account, providing her with a financial leg up over almost any opponent she may end up facing. Lewis noted that, since taking office in January 2001, Clinton has helped raise $60 million for Democratic candidates nationwide, adding that her $1 million contribution to the DSCC "for the moment" was her last donation to the committee, but that there was still a long way to go until Election Day, and the situation could change.

This marks the second straight campaign cycle in which New York Republicans have not fielded a strong challenge to an incumbent Democratic Senator, allowing Schumer and now Clinton to start steering millions of dollars into DSCC coffers that will help in other states. Schumer still holds $10.1 million in his account.

Democratic aides and strategists are privately monitoring several other Senators who are sitting on large, multimillion-dollar stockpiles of campaign cash yet not facing stiff challenges, including Sen. Evan Bayh (Ind.), who held $10.4 million in his campaign account at the end of June but had yet to turn over any donations to the DSCC.

Like Clinton, Bayh is considering a presidential run, and money in his Evan Bayh Committee would be the seed money.

Another potential donor could be Sen. Bill Nelson (Fla.), who held more than $12 million in his campaign account June 30. Nelson's opponent, Rep. Katherine Harris (R), has run a campaign so marred by political and personal embarrassments that Nelson is considered the overwhelming favorite.

Sen. Fumes Over Jewish Debate Question (AP-Y)

By Bob Lewis

AP, September 20, 2006

A day after being asked in a debate about his immigrant mother's heritage, Sen. George Allen fired back in a written statement Tuesday confirming his Jewish ancestry.

Allen, a Republican seeking re-election in a close race, denounced the reporter's question as "reprehensible" and irrelevant and said he only recently learned that his maternal grandfather was Jewish.

"Whenever we would ask my mother through the years about our family background on her side, the answer always was, `Who cares about that?'" Allen wrote in the statement.

DOJ_NMG_0065954

"To be getting into what religion my mother is, I don't think it's relevant," Allen tersely replied to Fox. "So I'd like to ask you, why is that relevant? My religion? Jim's religion ..." he said as applause drowned out his remarks.

"My mother is French-Italian with a little Spanish blood in her," Allen told the panelist, but did not mention any Jewish heritage.

On Tuesday, Allen said his mother, Henriette "Etty" Allen, grew up in the Christian faith. She is a French-speaking native of Tunisia.

Allen and his siblings also were raised as Christians. He said he became aware only recently that his grandfather, Felix Lumbroso, who had been imprisoned by the Nazis, was Jewish.

"I embrace and take great pride in every aspect of my diverse heritage, including the Lumbroso family line's Jewish heritage, which I learned of from a recent magazine article and my mother confirmed," Allen said in the statement.

Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams would not specify when Allen's mother told him about her ancestry. As a child, Allen knew Lumbroso, who is now deceased, Wadhams said.

Allen accused Webb's campaign of peddling the notion that he is embarrassed by his heritage, a claim Webb spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd rejected as "completely, totally false."

Fox defended her questions. She said she wanted to determine if there was a political reason Allen was not forthcoming about a Jewish ancestor. "I don't know why it would be so upsetting to him," she said in a telephone interview Tuesday. "I was shocked at how he took offense to the question."

Fox had also asked Allen whether he had learned the word "Macaca" from his mother. Allen had applied the word to a Webb campaign volunteer of Indian descent during an Aug. 11 rally before a mostly white crowd. In some cultures, including Tunisia, the word is considered a racial slur.

Allen glared at Fox for a moment, then said, "I hope you're not trying to bring my mother into this matter."

References to the nationality of Allen's mother prompted the first report of his Jewish ancestry on Aug. 25 in The Forward, a Jewish daily newspaper, said its editor, Ami Eden.

"There was some talk at that time that perhaps he picked this up from his mother, and it was an easy way to get to the story behind the headlines," Eden said in a telephone interview from New York.

Allen Says He Embraces His Jewish Ancestry (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

Virginia Sen. George Allen (R) said for the first time publicly yesterday that he has Jewish ancestry, a day after responding angrily to an exchange that included questions about his mother's racial sensitivity and whether his family has Jewish roots.

At a campaign debate with Democratic challenger James Webb on Monday, a reporter asked Allen whether his mother's father, Felix Lumbroso, was Jewish. He became visibly upset, saying his mother's religion was not relevant to the campaign and chiding the reporter for "making aspersions about people because of their religious beliefs."

Allen's campaign manager said the senator believed the question was hostile because it followed another one about whether Allen had learned the word "macaca" from his mother. The word, which Allen used last month to describe a Webb volunteer, is a French slur for a dark-skinned person. Allen's mother, Henreitte "Etty" Allen, is a native of Tunisia and speaks French.

In a statement released by his campaign yesterday, Allen said he was proud to have recently discovered that his grandfather, a Nazi resistance fighter in North Africa, was part of a well-known Jewish family.

"I was raised as a Christian and my mother was raised as a Christian," Allen, 54, said. "And I embrace and take great pride in every aspect of my diverse heritage, including my Lumbroso family line's Jewish heritage, which I learned about from a recent magazine article and my mother confirmed."

Allen's religious background has not been a campaign issue. But when the reporter asked Allen about it Monday, the exchange triggered a flood of critical commentary on Internet blogs yesterday, demanding that Allen clarify his ancestry.

The Jewish weekly newspaper the Forward recently explored Allen's possible Jewish roots and his connection to the Lumbrosos, a prominent Jewish family that settled in Italy in the 15th century. Allen's campaign spokesman did not return calls seeking confirmation, according to that article.

Peggy Fox, the WUSA (Channel 9) reporter who asked the question at the debate, said she read the article in the Forward. "I had heard from other reporters that his staff had been asked the question before. I thought it was fair game," she said yesterday.

Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams said, "Saying your mother was a racist. That was exactly the intent and the thrust of the question. Then she [Fox] went on to introduce religion. Introducing religion at all into the debate was inappropriate."

The question about Allen's religion and his delayed response to it are the latest twists in a bizarre Senate campaign that has been dominated for five weeks by Allen's "macaca" comment and more recently by allegations that Webb demeaned military women in an article written 27 years ago.

Polls have indicated that Webb is closing the double-digit lead Allen held earlier this summer. But in addition to a debate over the Iraq war with Webb, a decorated Marine and former Navy secretary, Allen has repeatedly been distracted by other issues.

Allen is not the first public official to discover Jewish roots late in life, including former presidential candidates Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) and Gen. Wesley K. Clark. In 1997, Secretary of State Madeline Albright revealed that her family history includes three Jewish grandparents who were killed in the Holocaust.

Some Jewish leaders said that Allen's angry reaction to the question about his Jewish heritage bothered them.

"He was visibly uncomfortable and called it an 'aspersion,' " said J. J. Goldberg, editor in chief of the Forward. "What is it that makes him so uncomfortable with it? It raises more questions about who the guy is."

"How does one not know that his grandfather was a Jew?" asked Samuel Heilman, a professor of sociology at the City University of New York. Heilman called it a "tempest in a teapot" but said it would be a big story to American Jews.

"It is the case that for many people who are so much a part of blue-blood America, it's hard to imagine there is a Jew in their cupboard there," Heilman said.

But other Jewish leaders defended Allen's reaction, saying he was clearly upset not about being called a Jew but at what he considered to be the negative tone of the questioner.

"This was an 'I got you' question -- 'See, you really are a racist,' " said Rabbi Irwin Kula, author of "Yearnings: Embracing the Sacred Messiness of Life." Kula said there are many people who have been raised Christian and are not aware that they have any Jewish heritage. "I felt tremendous empathy for George Allen. It is 100 percent possible."

Allen has been asked before about his religious background. Bob Gibson, a reporter at the Charlottesville Daily Progress who has written about the senator for almost three decades, told the New Republic that Allen once wanted a correction "when I wrote about his mother's Jewish family origins. He insisted, through a press secretary, that his mother was raised a Christian."

Part of the interest in Allen's heritage comes from his speeches, in which he often includes references to his grandfather being incarcerated in a Nazi concentration camp. In 2000, he told the Richmond Times-Dispatch his grandfather was put in the camp because he was an Allied sympathizer.

He brought up his grandfather's incarceration at the Monday debate, just before Fox asked her question.

"If there's one lesson that I learned more than from anyone else, it was my mother, whose father was incarcerated by the Nazis in World War II," Allen said. "And of all people in my life who told me about tolerance and not judging people by their religious beliefs or their ethnicity or their race, it is my mother."

But people close to Allen have been reluctant to discuss his grandfather's religion in the past. Asked about it several weeks ago, campaign advisers either said they did not know or refused to comment. They also refused to ask Allen about it, saying at the time that it was not relevant to his job.

Yesterday, Wadhams accused Webb's campaign and liberal bloggers of anti-Semitism for raising the issue of the senator's religious background.

Bloggers, some of whom are on Webb's staff, spent yesterday writing furiously about the debate question and Allen's answer. "What does Allen have against Jews?" one headline read on a national liberal blog.

"Introducing religion at all into the debate was inappropriate. It makes no difference what anybody's religion is," Wadhams said.

Wadhams also accused Webb's campaign of mailing an anti-Semitic flier to Virginia voters during the state's Democratic primary this year. That flier depicted Webb's Jewish opponent, Harris Miller, with money coming out of his pockets.

"They have been continuing that anti-Semitic strategy through their paid bloggers," Wadhams said.

Webb spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd called that charge "completely false." She said the flier was not anti-Semitic and declined to comment about Allen's Jewish heritage.

"We are in the race for Senate to talk about ideas, issues and what's best for Virginia," she said. "That's all we are here to do."

In the statement issued yesterday, Allen called Fox's questions "especially reprehensible" and "deeply offensive." And he confronted questions about why he did not know about his heritage sooner.

"Some may find it odd that I have not probed deeply into the details of my family history, but it's a fact," he said. "Whenever we would ask my mother through the years about our family background on her side, the answer always was, 'Who cares about that?' "

New Twist In Senate Race In Virginia (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

WASHINGTON, Sept. 19 — The turbulent re-election campaign of Senator George Allen took another unexpected turn Tuesday when Mr. Allen, a Virginia Republican, issued a statement confirming his Jewish ancestry.

“I embrace and take great pride in every aspect of my diverse heritage, including my Lumbroso family line’s Jewish heritage, which I learned about from a recent magazine article and my mother confirmed,” Mr. Allen said in a statement.

The issue was injected into the campaign on Monday in a debate with Mr. Allen’s Democratic opponent, Jim Webb, when a panelist asked Mr. Allen, a former governor, if his mother was Jewish.

“To be getting into what religion my mother is, I don’t think it’s relevant,” he responded angrily.

But the campaign, which had earlier found itself on the defensive over Mr. Allen’s reference to a volunteer for Mr. Webb as “macaca,” apparently decided to try to defuse the issue quickly by putting out a statement acknowledging his family ties.

It was apparently the first time Mr. Allen, a practicing Presbyterian, had done so publicly, and he said he learned of his ancestry only through an article last month in The Forward, a Jewish publication.

“Some may find it odd that I have not probed deeply into the details of my family history, but it’s a fact,” Mr. Allen’s statement said. “We in the Allen household were simply taught that what matters is a person’s character, integrity, effort and performance — not race, gender, ethnicity or religion.”

Before the question arose in the debate, Mr. Allen had mentioned that a grandfather had been incarcerated by the Nazis. He said in his statement that he had never known the circumstances surrounding that chapter in his family history.

After the macaca comment, which drew national attention, The Forward published an article suggesting that Mr. Allen’s mother, Henriette, who was born in Tunisia, came from a prominent Jewish family and that Mr. Allen would most likely be considered Jewish under rabbinic law.

Mr. Allen was considered a potential presidential prospect for 2008 and had been rated a near-lock for re-election as senator. But the difficult political environment for Republicans and the macaca comment have made his contest more competitive than anticipated.

Mr. Allen apologized to the young volunteer of Indian ancestry who was the object of the comment, which was perceived by some as a racial slur.

Victory Of The Non-Pol? (WP)

By Lee Hockstader

This politics business, it's a struggle for Jim Webb.

Cerebral, private and generally solemn, he garbles sound bites and chokes at asking people for money, which the Democrat badly needs if he's to overtake Republican incumbent George Allen in the remaining seven weeks of their race for the

U.S. Senate in Virginia. Wading into crowds gives him the willies. "I know how hard it is, I've had a camera three foot from my face for eight months now at any public place," he said Sunday on "Meet the Press."

On the road, the Webb campaign is unorthodox. In Arlington a few months ago, he appeared at a rally with his wife -- and was introduced to the crowd by his ex-wife. His driver, Mac McGarvey, lost an arm to a mine while serving as Webb's radio operator in Vietnam; before signing on with the campaign, he was managing a honky tonk in Nashville.

Webb's son, a Marine lance corporal who shipped out to Iraq this month, is stationed in Ramadi. If elected, Webb will be one of a tiny handful of members of Congress with a child serving in Iraq (or Afghanistan, for that matter). But while he mentions his son from time to time, and wears a pair of his son's combat boots, he seems unable or unwilling to exploit the fact of his service for all it's worth.

He is, in short, a consummate non-pol, which makes his race for the Senate among the most interesting, and treacherous, of the year. Badly underfunded so far and mostly allergic to stump speech mumbo jumbo, he could just blunder his way into the Senate on the strength of Allen's problematic past and bullying present -- and on Webb's consistent stance that the war in Iraq is a terrible strategic blunder. Or, just as easily, he could drown in the sea of Allen's financial advantage if the Democratic fundraising machine doesn't deliver in the next few weeks.

Not that it seems to matter overwhelmingly to Webb. In the scheme of things, Webb said in a debate at Tysons Corner on Monday, whether or not he is a senator won't rate very high "on my agenda."

In the Tysons debate, and the one on "Meet the Press," it wasn't hard to tell which candidate was the amateur politician. Webb's delivery was choppier, his demeanor slightly grim, his collar a size too small. At times, particularly when challenged on his views on women in the military, he seemed to delve into the dead ends of ancient debates hearkening back to his days as Ronald Reagan's secretary of the Navy a generation ago.

But there were no major gaffes either, and on balance he managed well against the more practiced, more fluent Allen. Unlike some of his earlier performances, Webb seemed prepared to discuss not only grand strategy and Iraq but also domestic policy. His advisers, convinced the campaign's momentum is with them, were thrilled.

Allen, whose national and statewide reputation has tanked since he mocked an Indian American campaign aide of Webb's by repeatedly calling him "macaca" in a nearly all-white part of southwest Virginia, is unleashing what is certain to be a nonstop negative assault on Webb.

He is in trouble not only because of the macaca remark but also because of revelations in the New Republic this year about his schoolboy romance with the Confederate flag and his own sister's depiction of the young Allen as nasty and thuggish. (It is a strange aspect of this race that Webb seems on better terms with his ex-wife than Allen does with his own sister.)

Allen has tried to square the circle of seeming moderate enough to be reelected this fall while staying conservative enough to compete in the 2008 presidential primaries. It's an impossible trick, as illustrated by his current squirm in the debate on torture, in which he cannot bring himself to side either with the White House or with fellow Virginia Sen. John Warner, whom Allen likes to call "my partner."

Although Allen is a smarter, more sophisticated candidate than Jerry W. Kilgore, the Republican who lost the race for governor of Virginia last fall, he may face a similar demographic problem in the Northern Virginia suburbs, whose wealthy, well-schooled electorate includes tens of thousands of new voters, many of them Democrats and independents.

The macaca flap has hurt him badly there, and his good-ol'-boy shtick can't help much either. At a Labor Day parade, Allen, who favors cowboy boots for daily wear, rode a horse called Bubba. And his campaign is gearing up for its 11th annual "Hoe Down" fundraiser, where contributors of $1,000 will have the title of "Buckaroo" bestowed upon them, while deeper-pocketed donors will be dubbed "Ranch Boss" and "El Ranchero Grande."

Then again, it was Webb who insisted on arguing over the candidates' southwest Virginia roots, sparking a debate-within-a-debate in Tysons over which one of them is more authentically country. ("I've been coming to southwest Virginia since George Allen was a Californian," said Webb, who has relatives there. "For me," said Allen, "it's a place in my heart, not a place on a map.")

Many of the dark-suited business types in the audience at Tysons must have been mystified. After all, most of southwest Virginia is closer to Nashville than to Northern Virginia. But if Webb's unvarnished performance convinces many voters that he is somehow the more genuine and likable of the candidates, the non-pol may just pull this race out.

Black Leaders Endorse Cardin (WT)

By S.A. Miller And Jon Ward

The Washington Times, September 20, 2006

U.S. Rep. Elijah E. Cummings and other black Democratic leaders yesterday endorsed Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin for the U.S. Senate, as the Cardin campaign and that of his Republican rival -- Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele -- sought approval from supporters of Kweisi Mfume.

"We know where Ben Cardin stands on all the issues," said Mr. Cummings, who had backed the primary campaign of Mr. Mfume, the former president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. "We do not know who Michael Steele is, and we do not know what he stands for."

Meanwhile, Mr. Steele has aired a new TV ad that mocks negative campaigning and features him professing to "love puppies."

He congratulated Mr. Cardin on his endorsements yesterday, saying, "It just tells me I've got to work harder," and brushed aside Mr. Cummings' criticisms.

"They want to sound bite people's experiences and sound bite people's lives into 30 seconds, and people don't live that way," Mr. Steele said during a tour of Ellicott City.

"I'm not engaged in a conversation with Ben Cardin or Elijah Cummings," he said. "I'm talking to real Marylanders whose problems aren't red or blue, conservative or liberal, Republican or Democrat. They're real."

Race has played a key role in the U.S. Senate contest, which pits Mr. Cardin, a white 10-term congressman from Baltimore, against Mr. Steele, the first black to win statewide office in Maryland.

Mr. Steele's potential to break the Democratic lock on black votes has made Maryland's Senate race one of the most closely watched campaigns in the country and one of the most fiercely fought between the national parties.

Among the black leaders endorsing Mr. Cardin yesterday were Mr. Cummings; state Sen. Verna Jones, chairman of the state legislature's black caucus; and state Senate Majority Leader Nathaniel J. McFadden -- all Baltimore Democrats who endorsed Mr. Mfume in the primary election.

Mr. Cardin beat Mr. Mfume, 43.7 percent to 40.4 percent, statewide but lost in Baltimore and Prince George's County, two of the state's most populated and heavily Democratic jurisdictions, which are also both more than 65 percent black.

In Baltimore, Mr. Cardin received 24,637 votes to Mr. Mfume's 50,731, losing by 30.82 percent to 63.46 percent, according to unofficial results from the State Board of Elections.

The margin was wider In Prince George's County, where Mr. Cardin lost by more than 52,000 votes or 18.71 percent to 69.79 percent, unofficial results show.

U.S. Rep. Albert R. Wynn, a black Maryland Democrat who endorsed Mr. Mfume, has not announced whom he will support in the general election.

Cardin campaign spokesman Oren Shur said that yesterday's public endorsements were "important" in wooing support of black voters from Mr. Steele.

"Democrats are united," Mr. Shur said.

Mr. Cardin, Mr. Cummings and others at the event linked Mr. Steele with President Bush, whose approval rating is about 34 percent in Maryland and even lower among the state's black voters.

Mr. Cummings said Mr. Steele has hidden his positions on issues such as judicial nominations, stem-cell research, universal health care, education and the Iraq war.

"Where do you stand?" he said.

Mr. McFadden called out, "Behind George Bush," eliciting laughter and cheers from the officials on the stage.

Also yesterday, Mr. Cardin pressed Mr. Steele to start "immediately" debating him twice a week, saying that Mr. Mfume "didn't duck debates, we engaged in them."

Steele campaign officials said that they have not been contacted by the Cardin campaign and that their phone calls and letters to the Cardin campaign have not been returned.

"That's the old, 'Oh he won't debate me,'" Mr. Steele said. "You know, trust me, be ready."

Black Officials Proclaim Support For Cardin (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

U.S. Senate candidate Benjamin L. Cardin reached out to African American leaders within the Democratic Party yesterday, trying to heal lingering racial divisions from the Democratic Primary and focus the contest on issues.

In front of Baltimore City Hall, a succession of black elected officials pledged their support for the veteran lawmaker, who is white, in his campaign against Republican Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, the first African American to win a statewide office in Maryland.

"It's time for all Democrats to come home," said state Sen. Nathaniel J. McFadden (D-Baltimore). "We are family!" he boomed. " We are family !"

The task before Cardin may not be so easy. African Americans have been among the most loyal Democratic voters in Maryland, but the dynamics of this campaign could test that loyalty.

Cardin's chief rival in last week's primary, Kweisi Mfume, has signaled that he will rally behind the Democratic nominee but did not appear at yesterday's event and has not formally endorsed him.

In the primary, Cardin drew limited support in two jurisdictions where African Americans make up the majority of voters. In Prince George's County, Mfume collected nearly 71,000 votes to Cardin's 18,600. In Baltimore, Mfume led Cardin 50,731 to 24,637.

Steele, meanwhile, has dedicated much of his campaign machinery to wooing black voters. After sewing up the primary last week, Steele's first move was to visit the election night parties of the two candidates for county executive in Prince George's. He spent the next morning talking to black voters at a barbershop in suburban Baltimore.

But Wayne K. Curry, a former Prince George's county executive, said Cardin can not assume that the county's black voters will line up behind the Democrat this time.

"It's going to be a different kind of election," Curry said. "Steele is a very attractive candidate. Flogging him with partisan labels is not going to be enough."

Steele's campaign pushed yesterday for more answers from Cardin about the caustic remarks a former staff member posted in a personal diary on the Internet. The staffer vented about a work environment she described as being hypersensitive about race and described her discomfort in being a "sex object" for Cardin's Jewish friends, whom she described using ethnic stereotypes.

Cardin fired the staffer Friday, but Steele's campaign has urged reporters to dig deeper to determine whether the woman really was a low-level staffer, as Cardin has described her. They also called the incident part of a pattern of racial insensitivity toward Steele.

"It goes to the heart of why people are sick and tired of politics as usual," said Doug Heye, Steele's spokesman.

Cardin said the matter was behind him and suggested that an attempt to draw further attention to it was a diversion.

He sought to focus the contest on issues at yesterday's event, and speaker after speaker said Steele's candidacy would not survive scrutiny once his views are known. "We know where Ben Cardin stands" Rep. Elijah E. Cummings (D-Md.) said. "We do not know who Michael Steele is, and we do not know what he stands for."

Cardin called on Steele to debate twice a week for the remaining seven weeks of the campaign. "Since this campaign started, Ben Cardin has participated in more than a dozen debates. Many of these debates included Democrats, Republicans and third-party candidates. Michael Steele never once showed up," said Cardin campaign spokesman Oren Shur.

In response, the Steele campaign said it was Cardin who has not responded to a request for debate. "We're still waiting for them to return our campaign manager's call," Heye said.

Third-party candidate Kevin Zeese said he, too, should be included in any debate.

Corker-Ford May Tip Senate (RC)

By Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, September 20, 2006

SODDY-DAISY, Tenn. — Sitting behind the counter of the Soddy Bible and Church Supplies store Friday afternoon, proprietor Frank Copeland admitted he hasn't devoted much attention to the Volunteer State's hotly contested Senate race. He's been focused instead on fighting a November referendum that would allow restaurants in this beer-only town to serve liquor by the drink.

In the contest between Rep. Harold Ford Jr. (D) and former Chattanooga Mayor Bob Corker (R) — a critical part of the math for Democrats to win a majority in the chamber this fall — Copeland said he is undecided about whom he will vote for.

But he does know he likes what he sees in Ford's newest campaign commercial, which features the 36-year-old Congressman in a church sanctuary talking about faith.

"I like his new ads," said Copeland, a retired power plant employee who took over the bible and church supply store as a hobby six years ago. "As a Christian, I'm definitely going to look at moral issues before other things."

Soddy-Daisy, a town of almost 12,000 located halfway between Chattanooga and Dayton, home of the 1925 Scopes Monkey Trial, isn't traditionally fertile territory for Democrats. But Ford must appeal to and convert voters like Copeland across the state to have any shot at winning the seat being vacated by retiring Sen. Bill Frist (R).

The race is tight and a poll done for Ford's campaign in late August showed the Congressman with a two-point lead.

Still, while Copeland remains open to Ford's message, his wife, Donna, is sure she's voting for Corker. And the reason is no mystery.

"Because he's a Republican," she said.

The Insider vs. The Outsider?

But with a difficult national political environment for the GOP, Corker isn't exactly embracing that party label. His campaign materials don't identify him as a Republican, and neither do his television ads.

Instead, Corker is focused on running as the anti-Washington, D.C., outsider while painting his opponent as a liberal, insider elitist.

Corker has touted his record as mayor and played up the fact that he started at the bottom before building a successful, and very lucrative, construction business.

His latest campaign commercial features him standing in front of a bridge and pledging to never forget where he came from.

"When I was 20, I poured concrete as a construction laborer building that bridge," Corker tells voters in the ad.

At the same time he talks about how Ford, the son of a Congressman, moved to Washington at age nine and graduated from the prestigious St. Albans School. Later, Ford graduated from the University of Pennsylvania and the University of Michigan law school. Corker graduated from the University of Tennessee in 1974.

"He really has kind of grown up in D.C." Corker said in an interview at his Chattanooga campaign headquarters last week. "I grew up in Tennessee."

Ford, meanwhile, has worked to portray himself as a fresh face, using the slogan "A New Generation of Leadership" in his ads and campaign materials. He argues that his voting record is much more moderate than Corker has portrayed it to be.

To refute Ford's message, Corker's commercials have made a point of identifying Ford as a Congressman — the one with the most liberal record in the state's delegation — who has been in Washington for 10 years.

Corker also argues that he is the candidate who better represents what Tennessee voters have come to expect in their Senators, making him the best choice to follow in the footsteps of GOP Sens. Howard Baker, Bill Brock, Fred Thompson, Lamar Alexander and Frist.

"By the time the race is over, obviously people are going to know both of us really, really well," Corker said. "I just really believe I'm going to win this race."

Some of that voter education was on display Saturday, at the tailgating before the 8 p.m. kickoff of the University of Florida vs. University of Tennessee Southeastern Conference showdown.

DOJ_NMG_0065961

Both campaigns had a presence amid the orange-clad, GOP-friendly crowd that surrounded Neyland Stadium.

General Contractor Mark Price, a Morristown Democrat, was the most visible Ford supporter in crowded Lot 9, directly across from the stadium and where Republicans had their tailgate set up.

While Corker has been billed as having strong partisan crossover appeal, a frustrated Price said he didn't see any.

Price, who had a billboard-sized blue and white "Ford" sign attached to the top of a black sport utility vehicle, said he was fed up with the current direction of the country and he said it didn't matter what Corker's background was.

"As far as what our nation needs, he's going to be more of the same," Price said.

And he believes he isn't the only one who feels that way.

""I've got a lot of Republican friends who are fed up," he said. "They're going to flip to Ford."

Old Wounds

By 4:30 p.m. a Bluegrass band is rocking the GOP tailgate, located in a prime position on Peyton Manning Pass, where thousands of fans gather to see the Pride of the Southland Band lead the team march to the stadium to the apparently never tiresome strains of "Rocky Top."

Corker did not attend the tailgate or the game, but he had plenty of surrogates on hand.

State Sen. Tim Burchett (R), whose district includes the stadium and the 104,079 who fill it on Saturdays, said he is confident of Corker's chances.

Burchett is a longtime supporter of Corker, going back to his failed 1994 run for the GOP Senate nomination.

"I was for Corker when it wasn't cool to be for Corker," Burchett quipped.

Corker lost the 1994 contest to Frist, and that race has played a prominent role in Corker's 2006 primary as well.

In the 1994 race, Corker said he was in favor of abortion rights. But in this year's primary he said he had since changed his stance and no longer supports abortion rights.

Corker's GOP opponents — former Reps. Van Hilleary and Ed Bryant — hammered him hard on the issue. But in the end, the split conservative vote helped Corker cruise to an easy win.

Still, he did not emerge without some visible wounds.

Tennessee Right to Life officials have refused to endorse Corker in the general election and don't plan to aid his campaign. Corker has been endorsed by the national Right to Life, a fact that is noted in the candidate comparison on the flip side of the depth chart GOP volunteers hand out at the game.

At the GOP tailgate, Tennessee Republican Party Chairman Bob Davis played down any divisions within the party and focused more on the math for a Ford victory.

East Tennessee has been traditionally Republican, west Tennessee has long been Democratic and the middle part of the state increasingly has become a key battleground.

The collar counties around Nashville will be an important factor in the Senate race, Davis said, noting that Ford has been spending a lot of time there.

"I'm not sure where he gets his votes," Davis said, predicting Ford would ultimately come up short.

Republicans also are counting on competing for votes in rural west Tennessee, where many culturally conservative voters have been lifelong Democrats.

"We will communicate with people who are middle of the roaders," said Corker, who already has spent more than $2 million of his personal fortune on the race. "The rural west Tennessee Democrats in this state are really a lot like east Tennessee Republicans. People who've worked hard and value the same kind of things that I do."

The Rockstar

It's just past 4:30 p.m. at Ford's tailgate, the band is still setting up and the food still cooking even though handmade posters invite passersby to "Wear a Sticker Get Free Food" or "Meet Harold Ford and Get Free Food."

A crowd of supporters has gathered in the semi-secluded Claxton Courtyard area, where the band eventually drowns out a student using a megaphone to announce that fans can get a free blanket or T-shirt if they sign up for a no-obligation credit card.

Ford arrives a little after 6 p.m. on his campaign bus. Along for the ride is Dylan Glenn, a Georgia Republican who has unsuccessfully run for Congress and a Ford friend since their days at St. Albans.

Ford, wearing an orange mesh polo shirt, grey dress slacks and black boots, is treated like a rockstar as he navigates his way through the throng of supporters, many of whom are whipping out camera phones and posing for pictures.

He speaks to individuals but does not address the crowd, which thins out quickly as fans head toward the stadium.

Before Ford arrives, John Townsend and a friend are chowing on a selection of the fried fish, chicken and gator tail that is being served at the Democrat's tailgate. Neither is wearing one of the orange "Jr." stickers that are being handed out.

Frustrated with the general direction of the country, Townsend said he is leaning toward Ford.

"I'd like to see a different change in government in general," he said, as the band's lead singer croons about sending "H-F-J-R" to Washington.

Townsend describes himself as middle of the road, having voted for Democrats in most local races but also for George Bush in 2000, choosing him over Tennessee native son Al Gore (D). In 2004, he voted for Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.).

"Bush cowboy policy has got to go," said the Rouse Construction Co. employee.

Ford's Hurdles

While the lagging popularity of the president, and the possibility of depressed GOP turnout, is no doubt a concern among Republicans, Ford has some unique hurdles of his own.

Friday evening, Jim and Nancy Robinson are having dinner on the patio of the Blue Plate restaurant on the revitalized Chattanooga waterfront that Corker claims as among his accomplishments as mayor.

The couple recently has celebrated their 50th wedding anniversary and characterize themselves politically as moderates with conservative leanings.

They are voting for Corker and also for Gov. Phil Bredesen (D), who is on course to win a relatively easy re-election in November.

"We're going to split our ticket and I think a lot of people will do the same," Jim Robinson said.

Robinson, a litigation attorney specializing in medical malpractice, decries the negative tone of the Senate race, and is especially disappointed in Corker.

"The negative campaign gives the appearance that you're behind," he said.

He thinks both Ford and Corker are good candidates.

But she was not as optimistic in her assessment of whether Tennessee voters are ready to embrace a black statewide candidate.

"This state just won't elect a black man," she said, as her husband quickly added that they personally have no problem with Ford's race.

Ford declined to be interviewed for this story. In a recent interview with the San Francisco Chronicle, he addressed the issue of race.

Ford jokingly told the newspaper that black candidates are undefeated in statewide contests in Tennessee.

"We've never won one, but we're undefeated because nobody's ever ran," he said.

If he wins, Ford would be the first black Senator elected from the South since Reconstruction, but he told the newspaper that he thinks voters are smart enough to look beyond race.

"I have great faith in the people of Tennessee. They are going to pick the person who can do the job for them," Ford told the Chronicle.

That is exactly what Lois Wilder said she is looking for.

"I try to find the best man," Wilder explained, as she and her husband, Bobby, finish their lunch at the Chase Diner in Harriman — a cafeteria-style throwback to a bygone era, with a red and white checkered floor and corresponding table clothes.

The Wilders, who own the local NAPA Auto Parts store and don't consider themselves to be aligned with one party, are voting for Corker.

"We own a small business," said Lois Wilder. "It seems like he's come out with a lot more things on that."

DOJ_NMG_0065963

Bobby Wilder said Ford's race wasn't an issue for him, but he said he did have concerns about the "things his Daddy's done."

Wilder's reference is to the south Memphis political dynasty from which Ford emerged.

While Ford's "Jr." stickers are the same as the campaign buttons used when he was elected to his father's House seat in 1996, they seem to have a different context in 2006.

Ford's uncle, former state Sen. John Ford, will go on trial early next year on charges of extortion, bribery and threatening a government witness — leading some observers to question whether the Ford name could be his biggest impediment to statewide office.

Ford repeatedly has said that his uncle's troubles will have no impact on his Senate race.

A Matter of Faith

Even before he appeared in the new church ad, it has been clear Ford's ability to appeal to voters of faith is an important part of his campaign strategy.

In another commercial, Ford tells viewers that one of the first things he tells children is to trust in God.

"We Democrats have been guilty of hiding our faith under a bushel basket," Davis said. "Now some of us are taking the basket off and letting the light shine in."

And if Frank Copeland, the Soddy Bible and Church Supplies owner, is any indication, that strategy may be making an impact.

Copeland said he is resigned to not finding a candidate he agrees with 100 percent — "I'm not going to find a perfect candidate. They'd kill him if he'd run," he said — so he will settle for the better of the two.

And, on the issues he cares about, he likes what he sees coming from Ford.

"He's a Christian, apparently, and he's showing it, and I like that," Copeland said.

Bellwether Is Hard To Predict (RC)

By David M. Drucker

Roll Call, September 20, 2006

LAKE OZARK, Mo. — State Auditor Claire McCaskill (D) is articulate, charismatic, intelligent and an effective, hard-nosed politician. But some Missourians who compliment her in one breath will tell you with the next that her liberal stands on key issues could sink her Senate bid on Nov. 7.

That Sen. Jim Talent (R) reflects the majority of Show Me State voters who are culturally and socially conservative — and that he is well regarded and

"Claire McCaskill has done a good job in the state of Missouri. She's very aggressive. ... Claire would be a good Senator," said Bill Miller, publisher of the Washington Missourian in Washington, a conservative, former farming community 50 miles west of downtown St. Louis that is slowly being suburbanized.

"But Talent's done a good job. Talent is very hard working. I think Claire's got a problem with the fact that she's aligned herself with the national Democratic Party. She's embraced some of their values and some of the things they promote and support, and I think that's going to hurt her in Missouri, frankly."

While the 300 or so mostly small-to-medium-size market newspaper publishers from throughout Missouri gathered on the banks of the Lake of the Ozarks for the Missouri Press Association's 140th annual convention, they also were there to host the first debate of four face-offs scheduled to occur before Election Day.

Many of the publishers heaped praise on McCaskill. But they were simultaneously skeptical of her ability to deliver the state for Democrats in the party's quest to pick up the six seats it needs to take back the Senate.

Yes, these publishers will tell you, the people of the communities they serve are concerned with national issues such as the Iraq War. It's one of the first things they mentioned when asked what their friends, neighbors and readers are talking about in regard to the midterm elections.

Yes, religious and conservative towns in rural Missouri that have been quite supportive of Republicans are unhappy with how the GOP has governed in Washington, D.C., on myriad issues.

From federal spending, to the economy and their quality of life, to additional bread-and-butter issues such as health care and education, many of these Missourians are less than thrilled.

And yes, McCaskill is making a concerted effort to woo these voters, placing ads in small newspapers serving these areas and crisscrossing the region in an RV. She readily acknowledged in an interview on Friday that a weak presence in rural Missouri — "outstate Missouri" to many from those parts — contributed to her poor showing there during her narrow loss in the 2004 gubernatorial election.

"I made a mistake in '04, and didn't go out and listen to rural Missouri," McCaskill said. "I didn't show them who I was, and my values. As a result, I was on defense."

This year, in a race of several nuances, the discontent that exists in the Missouri heartland, including among staunch Republicans and like-minded independents, is likely to help McCaskill drive up her vote totals in rural Missouri, especially when compared to her performance in 2004.

But voter discontent, and McCaskill's rural push, are not guaranteed to matter enough, said Kate Martin, publisher of the Republic Monitor in Perryville.

"I think she will do better in Perry County. I think it's the standard of living for people in small communities. We have a great number of young, struggling families who aren't able to take that next step into a comfortable life," said Martin, whose paper serves a rural community of around 8,000 located 80 miles south of St. Louis.

"But we're a very religious community, so her stance on stem-cell research, and a woman's right to choose, will hurt her there."

This particularly could be the case because Talent, who began this race with, and continues to have, a significant financial advantage, doesn't appear to be taking the support of conservative voters for granted. The incumbent Senator scored a political "coup" last week, contended Daily Events publisher Jeff Schrag, when he hit the pavement to knock on doors in the Republican stronghold of Springfield in southwest Missouri.

Talent finished June with $7.1 million in his campaign account, compared to $2.8 million for McCaskill.

Between Iraq and a Hard Place

Held at the luxurious Lodge of the Four Seasons in central Missouri, the Talent-McCaskill appearance before the publishers was a decidedly polite affair that was more idea forum than pointed debate. Both scored some points — and took some hits — as they argued over the Iraq War, the war on terror, illegal immigration and the economy, among other topics (the Libertarian and Progressive party candidates were included in the event).

"We were told, if we went in and helped build a Democracy in Iraq, we would have partners against terrorism," McCaskill said. "We clearly have not gotten what we were told we were going to get, and it's very important that we change course, that we begin redeployment and stabilize the entire region."

Talent tried to frame McCaskill's position as defeatist. He conceded that problems persist in Iraq, but he focused his comments on making the adjustments needed to see the mission through.

"I'm supportive of winning in Iraq. Not stalemate, not quitting," Talent said. "What we can't do ... is withdraw, either immediately or according to an artificial timetable that has nothing to do with winning. That's just another name for quitting. My opponent has policies of weakness."

Such bickering might be typical of a Democrat and Republican heading into the home stretch of a high-stakes campaign. But Show Me State voters aren't likely to fall for cheap rhetoric.

According to an analysis offered by some of the publishers attending the MPA convention, many of whom are longtime fixtures in their communities, the attitudes of Missouri voters aren't easy to pinpoint, especially given national public opinion polls that show the Republican Party in trouble.

The Iraq War is Exhibit A.

By and large, Missourians hew to the national polls in their disenchantment with the war and President Bush. But instead of clamoring for an immediate or future arbitrary exit, many are concerned that the United States could be embroiled in a losing conflict and are worried about what that would mean for the country's national security situation, the publishers said.

What these voters would like to see out of Congress and the White House is a plan to win, and then progress on the ground that provides evidence that the goal of building a democratic Iraq capable of defending itself is achievable and forthcoming.

"People on both sides of the aisle are disillusioned by the war — simply because we're not making any progress," said Jack Whitaker, publisher of Missouri's oldest daily newspaper, the Hannibal Courier-Post.

The cultural divide between the metropolitan regions of St. Louis and Kansas City, and rural Missouri, also is more complex than it appears from afar.

Republicans have been running well in outstate Missouri thanks to their positions on hot-button social issues such as same-sex marriage, abortion and stem-cell research (Talent opposes all three, McCaskill does not). In fact, many historically Democratic counties have elected their first Republican county commissioners and state legislators in the past few years, with the GOP controlling both houses of the state Legislature only recently.

But the Republican edge in rural Missouri can't be simply credited to the party's position on social issues. This also is about outstate voters perceiving that they've been slighted in regard to what they received for their tax dollars compared to the money spent by the state and federal governments in urban and suburban Missouri.

Much of this resentment built while Democrats held political control, and Republicans have been able to reap the benefits.

"There is a huge divide between the urban and rural residents of this state," said Whitaker, whose paper serves a community of about 20,000 located 115 miles due north of St. Louis. "The rural faction has finally gotten fed up to playing second fiddle, and said: 'It's our time.'"

The Battle for Black Voters

The Senate race is far from simply a contest for the hearts and minds of rural Missouri. Metropolitan St. Louis and Kansas City — and the Interstate 70 corridor that links the state's two most populated regions — loom large in this bellwether battle.

Kansas City is McCaskill's base — it's where she got her start in public life as a prosecutor. It is there, and in greater St. Louis, where Democrats traditionally run strong; where suburban swing voters are numerous; and where dissatisfaction over the Iraq War and Bush's unpopularity are palpable.

It is there where some voters are looking for a way to register their concern with the Bush administration and those politicians who they believe are supporting his policies.

It is there where McCaskill, the state auditor for nearly eight years with a gubernatorial run under her belt — she deposed a sitting Democratic governor in the 2004 primary — looks to benefit.

Jane McKie, a retired teacher who lives a few blocks from where Talent attended high school in suburban St. Louis (she was an elementary school classmate of his before he skipped a grade), describes herself as a registered independent who votes for politicians in both parties. When Talent stopped by to shake her hand Saturday while walking the parade route of the annual Greentree Festival Parade, McKie gladly extended her hand and was very cordial.

She's voting for McCaskill.

"Iraq definitely is a concern; Afghanistan is a concern; terrorism is a concern of mine. I can't speak for everybody, but that's sort of the things that are on the agenda at our house," McKie said.

Although officially a nonpartisan event, McCaskill received an enthusiastic welcome Friday evening at a black-tie event that focused on black education issues in St. Louis, and she got a round of applause when one of the keynote speakers, Atlanta Mayor Shirley Franklin, referred to her as the "new Senator to-be."

McCaskill was warmly embraced as she worked the room on the 20th floor of the Renaissance Grand hotel, accompanied by Sen. Tom Harkin (D-Iowa), who was in town for the evening to help her raise money. Missouri state Rep. Rodney R. Hubbard (D), whose district includes a portion of St. Louis, said he expects Missouri's blacks to vote Democratic in numbers similar to recent presidential contests.

St. Louis attorney Jerryl Christmas, a 43-year-old McCaskill supporter who attended the education event, agreed.

"The [black] community is solidly behind Claire McCaskill," Christmas said. "Sen. Talent has consistently voted with the president, whose interests have been outside the interests of the African-American community."

But Talent isn't conceding the black vote. His outreach into the community continues to be extensive, having run television and radio ads tailored to black voters beginning in July. Additionally, Talent has held several events geared toward winning black votes, including roundtables, meet-and-greets and church visits.

He began airing two new spots on black radio stations this week.

"I think that in some of the recent activity, [Talent] has made some inroads into the minority community. The record already indicates that that is in fact happening," said St. Louis businessman Ivan James, 62, a McCaskill supporter.

"It's just not a matter of [blacks] voting for Claire because it's Claire. She's going to have to demonstrate what she has to offer and what she can do better than what Talent has already done. She has a real tough road ahead of her."

Local Boy Makes Good

As a native of Des Peres and a graduate of Kirkwood High School, Talent's base is the St. Louis suburbs, about a 25-minute drive west from downtown. He previously represented the area in the state Legislature and the House, and he has run strong there in past races.

At the Greentree Festival parade on Saturday that snaked through the leafy residential neighborhoods of Kirkwood, Talent vigorously worked the crowd that lined the streets for the event, responding to calls of "Hi, Jim" and "Way to go, Jim." Almost no one called him Senator, with one self-described "values voter," 20-year-old youth ministry employee Ryan Pott, getting up out of his lawn chair to give Talent a big bear hug.

But in an interview before the parade got under way (it began in the parking lot of Kirkwood High School, where Talent graduated from in 1973) and with a C-SPAN camera crew filming, Talent acted as though his support in these parts was something to be earned, as opposed to assumed.

"I feel pretty good about the race generally," Talent said. "But it's still, in the minds of the average voter, early. ... So we'll have to see what happens."

Cantwell, McGavick Win Big In Washington (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, September 20, 2006

SEATTLE -- Sen. Maria Cantwell, Washington Democrat, last night easily defeated her anti-war challenger, setting up a November showdown against Republican businessman Mike McGavick in what the GOP sees as one of its best chances to pick up a Senate seat.

With about 55 percent of the expected vote counted, Miss Cantwell had 262,719 votes -- an overwhelming 92 percent of the Democratic vote. She easily won over Hong Tran, a lawyer with a nonprofit agency, who raised little money and relied on grass-roots volunteers to amplify her anti-war message throughout the campaign.

Mrs. Tran received 11,452 votes, or 4 percent of the total, leading three other little-known Democratic challengers.

"I feel very good about tonight's vote, but the ultimate vote is in November and I will work every day between now and then to be successful," said Miss Cantwell, who returned to Washington, D.C., for Senate votes on Monday. "We will work very hard to get around to every corner of the state and talk about the issues that affect the voters of Washington."

Mrs. Tran, 40, told supporters gathered at her Seattle home that Washington deserves a senator who stands up for working people.

"You know, I understood the challenges of running against a millionaire incumbent," Mrs. Tran told The Washington Times after early returns showed her losing. "But I ran to make sure people had an alternative choice if they really cared about ending the war."

She said she had no plans to calls Miss Cantwell, and said it is too bad her lack of fundraising prevented her from mounting a serious challenge. The refugee from Vietnam noted that many voters want to have an incumbent Democrat run in November, the better to keep the Senate seat in Democratic hands.

"People vote for Cantwell, but they do reluctantly," she said.

The Democratic contest initially seemed like it could harm the freshman senator, who was being criticized by several candidates for her October 2002 vote to authorize President Bush to use force in Iraq.

Ultimately, after the Cantwell campaign hired two of the senator's stronger critics, the primary served as a warmup for the general election against Mr. McGavick, who also easily won his primary.

Mr. McGavick, a former chief executive of Safeco Insurance, had 185,743 votes, or 85 percent of the total, easily outpolling five Republican challengers, led by Brad Klippert at 14,422 votes, or 6 percent.

"All I can say about the primary is one down, one to go. We are going to win this November," Mr. McGavick, 48, told cheering supporters from his Seattle campaign headquarters during a live Web cast.

Republicans consider the Washington seat one of their best opportunities in November, despite national trends showing voters irritated with Mr. Bush and his majority party. The state has a Democratic governor and legislature and Democrats hold six of its nine congressional seats.

"Mike McGavick's message of civility is resonating with Washington state voters, who are tired of a senator that puts party interests above the interests of the state," said Sen. Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, who leads the Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee.

Though Miss Cantwell, 47, was considered vulnerable a few months ago, she recently opened a double-digit lead over Mr. McGavick in several polls.

Mr. McGavick, a millionaire like Miss Cantwell, says he is running to "put an end to the mindless mean-spiritedness and partisanship" in Washington, D.C. He casts himself as an independent thinker and calls Miss Cantwell "part of the problem and not the cure." Mr. McGavick will be in Washington, D.C., tonight at a National Republican Senatorial Committee fundraiser in his honor.

Most of last night's results were tabulated from mail-in ballots. There are 3.3 million registered voters in Washington, and about 80 percent of them were expected to cast votes via mail.

Miss Cantwell and Mr. McGavick will probably debate twice before Oct. 16, when voters can begin mailing in their ballots. Both candidates have millions in the bank to run television ads in the fewer than 50 days remaining until votes are counted.

Meanwhile yesterday, on the other side of the country, Massachusetts voters set up a November gubernatorial race between Democrat Deval Patrick and Republican Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey.

Either candidate winning would be a first. Mr. Deval won 49 percent of the vote in his first bid for elective office after having been head of the Justice Department's civil rights division under President Clinton. He would be the state's first black governor. Mrs. Healey, who was unopposed in the GOP primary, is trying to become the first woman to be elected governor of the state.

Wash Senate: Now, The Main Event For Cantwell, McGavick (AP)

By David Ammons

AP, September 20, 2006

Washington's suspense-free U.S. Senate primary predictably cranked out the long-expected outcome — Democratic Sen. Maria Cantwell and Republican Mike McGavick were nominated as finalists on Tuesday.

Now the unpredictable begins.

Cantwell and McGavick dispatched their intraparty rivals by wipeout margins — with about 49 percent of the expected vote counted, the senator had 92 percent of the Democratic vote and the challenger had 85 percent of the GOP field.

There was so little suspense that Cantwell didn't even stay in her homestate to await the returns. Rather, she returned to Washington, D.C., on Monday to attend to Senate chores.

McGavick had the stage to himself, but after a brief celebration at his Seattle campaign headquarters, he, too, was heading to Washington, D.C., to shake the money trees.

The race has drawn attention as one of the Top 10 Senate contests this year, given that Cantwell barely won six years ago and McGavick has been described as perhaps the best GOP challenger in the country.

Two degrees of separation: McGavick once was campaign manager and chief of staff for Sen. Slade Gorton, whom Cantwell eased from office in 2000.

Some polls had showed Cantwell and McGavick in a fairly tight race, in the 5-to-7 percent range, in recent months, but several late polls have the senator leading by double digits.

Cantwell also has a strong lead in finances so far, and has $5.1 million on hand, to McGavick's $2.8 million, after he loaned his campaign $2 million.

But though the race leans Democratic, both sides agree that the seat still remains in play and that unforeseen developments could really change the dynamics.

The outcome could have national implications, since the Democrats need to hold the seat if they're to have a shot at taking back control of the Senate.

Cantwell, a freshman who alienated the anti-war base of her party by backing the Iraq invasion, and McGavick, who made his mark in the business world, said the real campaign can begin now, leading to the Nov. 7 finale.

Both Cantwell, 47, and McGavick, 48, pledged a high-road general election campaign and said they've tentatively agreed to at least two debates. Among the issues to be discussed: the Iraq war, which both have supported, energy prices, proposed oil drilling in the Arctic wilds, Social Security private investments, health care and federal spending.

"I feel very good about tonight's vote, but the ultimate vote is in November and I will work every day between now and then to be successful," Cantwell said from Washington, D.C. "We will work very hard to get around to every corner of the state and talk about the issues that affect the voters of Washington."

She said the primary balloting showed a strong Democratic turnout, and chalked that up to voter unrest with President Bush and the national Republicans, including the "stay the course" policy on Iraq, efforts to privatize Social Security and high energy prices.

"I feel terrific!" McGavick said in an interview. "We're feeling very good about the race and now we go on to the main event. The way we have dominated our primary shows that the voters are seeking something new and fresh and we can offer it in this campaign.

"The contrast between our campaigns will be very clear."

McGavick said he'll continue to base his campaign on civility and hopes Democratic backers of the senator will stop trashing him. Cantwell dismissed the jab and said "I will talk about the issues."

Cantwell was far ahead of four intraparty challengers and McGavick swamped five GOP competitors.

Cantwell's closest Democratic competitor, anti-war activist and attorney Hong Tran, was far back at 4 percent. Michael Goodspaceguy Nelson, who promoted space exploration, and perennial candidates Mohammad Said and Mike The Mover trailed.

McGavick's closest challenger was Brad Klippert of the Tri-Cities at 7 percent. William Edward Chovil, Gordon Allen Pross, B. Barry Massoudi and Warren Hanson trailed.

Independent Robin Adair of Seattle, Green Party nominee Aaron Dixon of Seattle and the Libertarians' Bruce Guthrie of Bellingham were nominated at earlier conventions and will be on the November ballot.

The only two incumbent congressmen with primary challengers, Republican Doc Hastings in the 4th District and Democrat Jim McDermott in the 7th, easily won renomination.

McDermott, nicknamed "U.S. Rep. for Life" because of his safe urban Seattle district, had nearly 90 percent of the vote in a three-way Democratic race, dispatching newcomers Joshua Smith and Donovan Rivers.

Challengers had primaries in some of the other districts, but in the hottest race, in the 8th District, neither Republican Rep. Dave Reichert or Democratic foe Darcy Burner had intraparty competition.

Cantwell, McGavick Ready To Face Off (SEAPI)

By Neil Modie

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, September 20, 2006

Democratic Sen. Maria Cantwell and Mike McGavick, her Republican challenger, swatted away nine dark-horse opponents in Tuesday's primary, a mere breather in a general election campaign that has seven weeks to go.

The senator has angered some liberals for her vote authorizing the invasion of Iraq and her measured criticism of the conduct of the war.

As expected, Cantwell easily rolled over Tran, one of four Democrats and five Republicans who were eliminated from the race Tuesday. But the freshman senator and McGavick, the former chief executive of Safeco Corp., have been running general election campaigns all along, paying virtually no attention to their primary rivals.

McGavick, in an interview after addressing supporters at his Seattle headquarters Tuesday night, said voters "really want robust conversation" between the two candidates about three issues: the Iraq war as part of the fight against Islamic terrorism; the federal deficit, and saving Social Security.

Cantwell, in an interview, pointed to some of the same issues, saying the country has "gone from record surpluses to record deficits" under President Bush. As for Bush's plan to privatize Social Security, she said, "I just think that should be off the table."

McGavick, aware of the political volatility of privatization, said he, too, is opposed to Bush's plan but favors allowing younger workers the option of government-managed Social Security investment accounts.

Seeking to project a moderate image, McGavick has suggested there isn't much difference between his and Cantwell's views on the war. Cantwell, though, voted for a rejected Senate measure calling for a gradual withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq to begin this year. McGavick said he didn't like it.

The two have had plenty else to disagree about. Cantwell said she wants to pursue an energy independence strategy but led the successful Senate fight to block oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. McGavick supports drilling. She voted to block a bill to cut estate taxes for the wealthy. He wants to repeal the tax.

McGavick has been in the ticklish position of criticizing the failure of the GOP-controlled Senate to pass meaningful legislation addressing border security, immigration, Social Security reform and health care costs.

Typical of an incumbent who feels she's ahead in the polls and a challenger looking for more exposure, Cantwell has agreed to only two debates -- one on each side of the state -- while McGavick has proposed nine. The McGavick campaign says it has accepted 15 invitations to forums or debates with the senator.

While Tuesday's election eliminated the Republican and Democratic also-rans from the Senate race, three other long-shot candidates will appear on the ballot in November. If the race is close, they potentially could cause problems for Cantwell and possibly McGavick by peeling away votes from one candidate or the other.

Aaron Dixon, the Green Party nominee and long-ago Black Panther leader, and Bruce Guthrie, a Libertarian, are running as peace candidates to Cantwell's left. Robin Adair, an independent, will also be on the November ballot.Conventional wisdom is that Libertarians usually take more votes from Republicans than Democrats. When Cantwell beat Republican Sen. Slade Gorton -- McGavick's former boss -- by 2,229 votes in 2000, the GOP blamed it on the 64,734 votes won by Libertarian Jeff Jared.

This time, however, with Guthrie waging an anti-war campaign, he as well as Dixon might draw liberals disenchanted with Cantwell.

On the other hand, some political analysts believe most voters know little about generally obscure third-party candidates beyond what party they represent. So the Libertarian might attract more voters who favor that party's philosophy of limited government and limited taxes than voters angry about the war.

McGavick, 48, a Seattle native, managed Gorton's successful 1988 Senate campaign and then was his chief of staff. McGavick became a Washington, D.C., lobbyist for the insurance industry and worked for a Chicago insurance company before returning to his hometown to take over Seattle-based Safeco.

Republicans Call For Ney To Resign (AP-Y)

By David Hammer

AP, September 19, 2006

A top House Republican on Tuesday called for Rep. Bob Ney to resign, days after the six-term GOP lawmaker agreed to plead guilty to federal corruption charges.

"He betrayed his constituents, he betrayed the body and there's no place for him in the Congress," said Rep. Deborah Pryce, the fourth-ranking Republican in the House.

Last week, Ney admitted improperly accepting tens of thousands of dollars worth of trips, meals, sports tickets and casino chips while trying to win favors for a disgraced Washington lobbyist and a foreign aviation company.

The Ohio congressman had defiantly denied any wrongdoing for months, but he reversed course and agreed to plead guilty in court papers filed Friday. Prosecutors will recommend he serve 27 months in prison.

Ney, who is under treatment for alcohol dependency, was expected to formally plead guilty in court Oct. 13.

Mary Jo Kilroy, Pryce's Democratic opponent, has called for Ney to step down and give up his federal pension.

Another Republican facing a close re-election race, Steve Chabot of Cincinnati, said through a spokesman that any lawmaker responsible for criminal wrongdoing should step down. Ohio Republican Party Chairman Bob Bennett and Ohio state Sen. Joy Padgett, the Republican running to replace Ney in Congress, have already called for Ney's resignation.

But House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, cautioned that Ney hasn't formally pleaded guilty and could change his mind before his scheduled court appearance. He has said repeatedly that resignation is a decision for Ney and his family to make.

"Until he has his day in court, I don't think it's up to me to comment what he should or shouldn't do."

Barry Bennett, chief of staff for Cincinnati-area Republican Rep. Jean Schmidt, took issue with Ney collecting a paycheck if he isn't actively representing his district.

"Short of expulsion, we can't make him leave, but meanwhile nobody is going to be voting for the constituents of the 18th district for the next two weeks and maybe not for two weeks in November and two weeks in December," Bennett said. "It's not right."

Ney's chief of staff, David Popp, and lawyer William Lawler could not be reached immediately for comment. Lawler said Friday that Ney was not ready to resign.

For Governors In G.O.P. Slots, A Liberal Turn (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

LOS ANGELES, Sept. 19 — Here are the things that Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger will be bragging about on the campaign trail: an initiative to lower greenhouse gases with the onus on big companies, a $1 increase in the state's minimum wage and a program to open up access to prescription drugs.

Mr. Schwarzenegger, who six months ago fashioned himself a Republican reformer bent on hobbling entrenched Democratic institutions, is not just tolerating positions generally associated with liberal candidates. Rather, he is using them as the centerpiece of his re-election campaign, marking the first time in a generation that a Republican governor here has clung to the left during a re-election fight.

The strategy is not unique to Mr. Schwarzenegger's campaign. Across the nation's 36 races for governor, Republican candidates in states heavy with moderate or Democratic voters are playing up their liberal positions on issues including stem cell research, abortion and the environment, while remaining true to their party's platform on taxes and streamlining government.

In Massachusetts, Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey, who is seeking to fill the seat that will be vacated by Gov. Mitt Romney, has openly split with Mr. Romney on abortion rights and stem cell research; her views are shared by the Republican candidate for governor in Illinois, Judy Baar Topinka, who also supports civil unions for same-sex couples.

In Maryland, the Republican incumbent, Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., is pushing for increasing state aid for programs for the disabled and imposing tighter restrictions on coal-fired plants; the Republican governor of Hawaii, Linda Lingle, opposes the death penalty. In Connecticut, Gov. M. Jodi Rell also parts ways with the Republican Party on civil unions and financing for stem cell research.

Governing Republican and campaigning Democratic is not a new technique; George E. Pataki, the New York governor, has made a career winning elections as a Republican in a mostly Democratic state. But political experts say that the strategy is particularly pervasive this year, as Republicans seek to distance themselves from an unpopular president and to respond to what is widely recognized as polarization fatigue among many voters.

"The conservative side of Republican party has been so dominant in recent years that we haven't seen a lot of this phenomenon at work until this year," said Bruce E. Cain, the director of the Institute of Governmental Studies at the University of California, Berkeley.

Now, Mr. Cain said, the easiest way for Republicans to "stay competitive is to take deviations from the standard G.O.P. lines."

In many ways, the strategy reflects the dynamics of local contests, in which voters are willing to overlook the party affiliation of a candidate if they believe he stands with them on one or two important issues, or pushes through policies that are inherently nonpartisan and that will improve their daily lives.

"The ideology that binds Republican governors is getting things done for their constituents," said Philip A. Musser, the executive director of the Republican Governors Association. "From the broadest perspective, voters in these races go into the booth caring less if governor is pro life or pro choice and more about whether he is going to reduce their property taxes or make their life easier at the D.M.V."

Unlike other campaign seasons, when a popular president has been an asset to local politicians, many candidates this year are trying to distance themselves from President Bush, either by staking out ground in contrast to him or, as is the case with Mr. Schwarzenegger, treating the president like a communicable disease.

Democratic candidates across the country have responded by constantly reminding voters of their opponents' conservative leanings, wherever they exist, and trying to tie them as much as possible to the White House.

In recent months, Mr. Schwarzenegger has gone out of his way to point out where he differs with the president — stem cell research and the role of large companies in creating heat-trapping gases like carbon dioxide — and to openly criticize the White House order to police the Mexican border with National Guard troops.

When Mr. Bush visited California last spring, the governor made sure they were scarcely seen together.

With the Legislature, he signed off on laws imposing the country's most stringent controls on carbon-dioxide emissions, raising the minimum wage $1 — after vetoing a similar measure twice before — and helping low-income Medicare beneficiaries to pay for prescriptions.

His campaign manager, Steve Schmidt, suggested that this was business as usual for Mr. Schwarzenegger, who, he said, "doesn't rule out ideas just because they came from someone from another party.''

"In every poll across the country what voters say they yearn for is politicians in both parties to stop fighting,'' Mr. Schmidt said, "The one person in the country who is doing that is Governor Schwarzenegger."

The Democrat who wants to unseat the governor, Phil Angelides, has spent the better part of the last few months trying to remind voters that Mr. Schwarzenegger is a Republican through and through, who supported the war in Iraq, the president who ordered it and many right-of-center policies.

"Two months of pretending to be a Democrat doesn't make him a Democrat," said Amanda Crumley, the communications director for the Angelides campaign, with a certain amount of fury in her voice. "Just like he has done for the last three years, if he is re-elected, which he won't be, he will continue to govern like the Bush Republican that he is."

While Mr. Schwarzenegger's behavior may seem like pure survival tactics in the deep woods of one of the nation's bluest states, other recent Republican governors in California have sought to accentuate their conservative leanings.

Pete Wilson, who was governor for most of the 1990's, supported a ban barring state services for illegal immigrants, capitalizing on anger over illegal immigration to win re-election, and his predecessor, George Deukmejian, won the ardor of suburban voters by presenting himself as tough as nails on crime.

Each state race has its own quirks and circumstances, but the song remains the same in many of them. In the Republican primary in Illinois, Ms. Baar Topinka, the state treasurer, was criticized by opponents for her support of same-sex unions. She nonetheless prevailed in that race.

In some states, however, it is a matter of survival.

Mr. Ehrlich of Maryland has not had much success with his legislature, and he talks openly about his more liberal positions.

"He is a centrist Republican running in a state with heavy Democratic majority," said James G. Gimpel, a professor at the University of Maryland. "So the reality of re-election suggests that he has to do that. There aren't enough Republicans to elect him in this state even if they all turned out."

Ex-Clinton Official Wins Mass. Governor Primary (USAT)

By From Wire Reports

USA Today, September 20, 2006

BOSTON — A former Clinton administration official won the Democratic nomination for governor Tuesday in a state where the Republicans have held the top seat for nearly 16 years.

Deval Patrick, 50, who headed the Justice Department's civil rights division under President Clinton, will face Republican nominee Lt. Gov. Kerry Healy in November. If he wins, he would become the state's first black governor.

Meanwhile, in Washington state, Democratic Sen. Maria Cantwell faced opponents who charged that her vote for the Iraq war should disqualify her from nomination.

Patrick defeated venture capitalist Chris Gabrieli, 46, who spent more than $8 million of his own fortune on the campaign, and state Attorney General Tom Reilly. The candidates had sparred over the state's economy, education, and how to implement the state's ambitious new health care law. The law requires those who do not have health insurance to buy it from the state.

With most precincts reporting, Patrick had 48%, Gabrieli had 28% and Reilly had 23%.

"It has been not just my campaign, but yours, and it won't be just my victory, God willing, it will be yours," Patrick told a rally.

Reilly portrayed Patrick and Gabrieli as out-of-touch millionaires. He told a working-class crowd in Dorchester: "We're not rich and we're not poor, but we get up every day and we work hard. … We are the heart and soul of this state."

One of the most divisive issues was whether to cut the state's income-tax rate from 5.3% to 5%. Patrick opposes a cut; Reilly and Gabrieli supported it.

The three have also sparred on allowing the children of illegal immigrants to pay the same lower tuition rate at state colleges as other residents. Patrick and Reilly supported the proposal; Gabrieli opposed it.

If Patrick wins in November he would be the second black elected governor in the country, after Douglas Wilder of Virginia in 1989. No Democrat has been elected governor here since Michael Dukakis in 1986.

Healey faced no opposition for the Republican gubernatorial nomination. Republican Gov. Mitt Romney decided not to run and is considering a run for president.

In Washington, Cantwell, like Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman, faced a revolt from Democrats who oppose the Iraq war. One candidate, lawyer Hong Tran, advocated a withdrawal of troops and likened Cantwell's stance on the war to Lieberman's. Cantwell distanced herself from her vote for the war, saying she might vote differently today.

Cantwell faced accusations that she helped arrange more than $11 million in federal money for projects benefiting a lobbyist friend. She has denied any wrongdoing.

Gray World (WSJ)

By Jeremy J. Siegel

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

The United States and the rest of the developed world stand at a precipice. Over the next two decades, tens of millions of Americans, Europeans and Japanese -- members of the prosperous "baby boom" generation that was born following the Second World War -- will leave the labor force. Many are expecting a long and comfortable retirement by relying on government and private pension plans as well as tax-supported medical services.

But unless we can exploit the dramatic demographic and economic changes that are before us, our future will be much poorer. Instead of stepping into an easy retirement, many retirees will tumble into a future marked by bankrupt government social programs and declining asset values that will quickly deplete their cherished nest eggs.

This forecast is not based on an unpredictable future, but on events that have already transpired. Aside from immigration, we know almost exactly how many people over the next 20 years are going to reach the working age of 20 and the retirement age of 65. "Demography," as the great management sage Peter Drucker once remarked, "is the future that already happened."

Demography is Destiny: The latest data from the U.N. Demographic Commission, displayed in the accompanying chart, clearly show the aging of the developed world. In the U.S. in 1950 there were seven people of working age (20-65) for every retiree, and even today, there are almost five. But by 2030, when the last of the baby boom generation retires, that ratio will fall by nearly one-half, down below 3 to 1.

The aging of the population in Europe and Japan is even more extreme than in the U.S. In Japan by mid-century, the ratio of workers aged 20-65 to retirees will fall to just over one-for-one. At that time the most populated five-year age segment in Japan will be those aged 75-80. The same will be true in Italy, Spain, Greece and other European countries. The demands of the retirees from Europe and Japan will raise the prices of goods bought and sold in international markets, so there is no way the U.S., despite its younger population, can shield itself from the demands arising from the aging populations abroad.

The Bankruptcy of Government and Private Pension Systems: Although it is widely known that our Social Security and Medicare Programs are threatened by these demographic trends, there are many who believe that they have accumulated sufficient private wealth to fund their retirement.

But this may not be so. The same crisis that strikes the public pension programs can overwhelm private pensions as well. Since there will not be enough workers earning income, there will not be enough savings generated to purchase the assets the retirees must sell to finance their retirement.

The reasons why retirees cannot turn their savings into consumption is because wealth can only be transformed into goods and services if they are sold to those willing to defer their consumption. In a modern economy, wealth does not represent "stored consumption," such as a cache of acorns that squirrels bury to bide them through a long winter. You cannot consume your stock certificates, but must sell them to someone else who wants a chance to consume at a later date. If there is a shortage of these savers, this may cause a long and painful bear market in stocks, bonds and real estate that will leave retirees with insufficient assets to enjoy retirement.

There are some who maintain that so much wealth in stock is passed on through bequests that the lack of demand from future workers will not have much impact. But the heirs and foundations who are bequeathed these fortunes often spend their wealth far faster than did their wealthy benefactors, and this spending often requires the sale of substantial stock. Furthermore, the large volume of bank accounts, bonds and other fixed income securities that must be liquidated to finance the retirements of ordinary retirees could sharply raise interest rates and depress equity prices.

Reversal of a Century-long Trend: Depressed asset prices are just one reason why the long-standing trend to an earlier retirement will be halted dead in its tracks. When Social Security was passed in 1935, the average retirement age was 69. That age fell to 67 by 1950, and to 62 today. In 2003, for the first time, more Americans chose the reduced Social Security benefits at age 62 than the full benefit that starts at 65. Despite improving health, surveys indicate that the bulk of Americans and Europeans want to retire earlier, not later.

Because of our aging population, I calculate that the average retirement age will have to rise by 10 years or more for workers to produce enough goods and services to provide for a comfortable retirement. This increase will greatly exceed the expected increase in life expectancy and lead -- for the first time in history -- to an absolute reduction in the number of years in retirement.

The Global Solution: There is no easy way out of this crisis. To be sure, rising productivity brings higher income, but it also brings higher benefits, since benefits are based on income. Immigration of high-income workers would ease the situation, but the numbers would need to be prodigious to keep the retirement age from rising.

But there is a solution that can help aging economies. The developing world has a much younger age profile than the developed world. This difference in age establishes an opportunity to make a trade: Goods produced by the younger developing world can be exchanged for assets of the older developed world. This trade is not new. The transfer of goods for assets has taken place throughout history, first between family members (parents giving to children in exchange for old-age support), and then extending to clans, communities and, finally, whole nations. Soon it can be done on a worldwide basis. The developing world has the capability of simultaneously providing us with goods and acquiring our assets, filling the gap left by our aging workers.

I call this the "global solution to the age wave" and it relies on huge global capital flows to be effective. My studies show the inflow of goods and services produced abroad in exchange for capital can have dramatic effects, reducing the projected retirement age in the U.S. from the mid-70s to the upper 60s. * * *

Why would the developing world wish to acquire our capital when their countries are expanding so rapidly? One of the first lessons one learns from studying international capital markets is that the best returns are rarely found in countries that are growing the fastest. Witness China's dismal returns despite being the fastest growing country in the last 20 years. Investors can often find better returns in slow-growing countries and industries

To that end, U.S. capital markets have many attractive attributes. Our country is still viewed as the fountainhead of innovation, discovery, invention and entertainment, and our institutions of higher education are second to none. Our capital markets are deep, and easy to access, and willing to provide capital to those who wish to innovate. Equally important is that many U.S. brand names have great appeal world-wide so the growth of consumer markets abroad holds high promise for many U.S. firms.

For these capital movements to occur, we must be far more receptive to international capital. Although there has already been a large number of cross-country mergers, there has also been increasing opposition, witness Cnooc's bid for Unocal and the Dubai Ports fiasco. But if we rebuff goods or capital originating abroad, our growth will decline since we will be forced to rely only on our own dwindling supply of savings.

We cannot escape from our demographic realities. But we can take actions that will lead to a much brighter outcome. The integration of the world's economies and capital markets is the key to our future well-being. If we shun this path, our future will in no way be as bright as our past.

Presidents Spar Over Iran's Aims And U.S. Power (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg And Helene Cooper

DOJ_NMG_0065975

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 19 — President Bush and President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran, separated by several hours and oceans of perspective, clashed at the United Nations on Tuesday over Iran's nuclear ambitions and each other's place in the world.

The two leaders bookended a long day of speeches at the opening of the General Assembly, but seemed to speak past each other as European and American diplomats continued the delicate work of setting terms for talks with Iran over its uranium enrichment program.

Speaking near the prime time of television viewing, Mr. Ahmadinejad, tieless in his trademark off-white sport jacket, accused the United States — while for the most part avoiding naming it directly — of hegemony and hypocrisy, and said it did not seem to have the political will or ability to halt violence in Iraq.

He said that his nation was pursuing only a peaceful nuclear program, and that it was the United States that was using its nuclear weapons to intimidate the world. He said repeatedly that the United Nations Security Council was too beholden to the United States to control it.

"Excellencies, the question needs to be asked, if the governments of the United States or the United Kingdom, who are permanent members of the Security Council, commit aggression, occupation and violation of international law, which of the organs of the U.N. can take them to account?" Mr. Ahmadinejad said.

Speaking in the morning, Mr. Bush made a direct appeal to the Iranian people from the United Nations, telling them their leaders were misleading them about the United States' intentions while using their national treasury to sponsor terrorists and build nuclear weapons.

"You deserve an opportunity to determine your own future," Mr. Bush said during a roughly 20-minute address during the opening session of the General Assembly. "The greatest obstacle to this future is that your rulers have chosen to deny you liberty and to use your nation's resources to fund terrorism and fuel extremism and pursue nuclear weapons."

It was a rare moment of diplomatic theater between Mr. Bush and his leading Middle Eastern nemesis, a man whose nation is increasingly asserting itself in the region that lies at the heart of Mr. Bush's foreign policy, and whose nuclear program is a subject of deep concern to the American, European, Chinese and Russian officials trying to rein it in.

Mr. Ahmadinejad had kept a low profile throughout the day, lending a sense of anticipation and buildup to an address that placed him, at least for a night, on an equal platform with President Bush.

Mr. Ahmadinejad, who saw his speech last year as a defining moment on the world stage, has called the Holocaust a myth and regularly inveighs against Israel and Jews. His country is in violation of a United Nations deadline to halt its uranium enrichment program.

His repeated references to what he called a lack of "legitimacy" at the Security Council appeared to set the stage for Iran to argue that the Security Council has no authority to impose sanctions against Tehran.

He referred to the United States as "the occupiers" when speaking of Iraq, "the big powers" when referring to the Security Council and "masters and rulers of the entire world" when referring to what he said was an imbalance between world powers and other countries.

He criticized America for not calling for a cease-fire during the Israel-Hezbollah war in Lebanon this summer. "Apparently the Security Council can only be used to ensure the rights of the big powers," the Iranian president said. "When the oppressed" are targeted, he said, "the Security Council must remain aloof and not even call for a cease-fire."

Despite anticipation that Mr. Ahmadinejad and Mr. Bush would perhaps have a chance encounter inside the United Nations complex, Mr. Ahmadinejad was not in the building for Mr. Bush's address and did not attend a luncheon given by the secretary general, Kofi Annan.

Mr. Bush made his remarks hours before Mr. Ahmadinejad addressed the General Assembly himself, creating an expectation of a robust war of words by day's end.

In an address tailored for both international and domestic consumption, Mr. Bush reiterated his demand that Iran suspend its uranium enrichment but added, "Despite what the regime tells you, we have no objection to Iran's pursuit of a truly peaceful nuclear power program."

It was unclear how many of Mr. Ahmadinejad's constituents were in a position to hear Mr. Bush's message, given tight state controls on media in Iran. Many residents have satellite dishes, but the government recently began a campaign to confiscate them; many also have access to the Persian-language broadcasts of Voice of America.

Mr. Bush also defended his foreign policy, exhorting the world leaders in attendance to join with him in his goal of transforming the Middle East by pushing for democracy there.

"From Beirut to Baghdad, people are making the choice for freedom," Mr. Bush said. "And the nations gathered in this chamber must make a choice, as well: will we support the moderates and reformers who are working for change across the Middle East, or will we yield the future to the terrorists and extremists?

Aides said the speech was in essence a capstone to the series of addresses Mr. Bush has given over the last two weeks intended to refocus the nation's attention on the threats of terrorism and the administration's efforts to fight it.

Speaking to what he called "the broader Middle East," Mr. Bush said, "Extremists in your midst spread propaganda claiming that the West is engaged in a war against Islam. This propaganda is false, and its purpose is to confuse you and justify acts of terror."

Mr. Bush also met with President Jacques Chirac of France, and they pledged to continue working together on Iran. Mr. Chirac played down comments he made Monday that were interpreted as a sharp break with Mr. Bush, when he indicated that talks with Iran could begin at the same time as the suspension of uranium enrichment, something the United States demands as a precondition for talks.

Still, in a sign of the uphill battle that is facing the United States as it tries to hold together its coalition seeking to curtail Iran's nuclear ambitions, there was little talk of sanctions. Senior Bush officials had initially predicted a breakthrough on a sanctions resolution this week.

Mr. Chirac did not utter the word sanctions during his speech to the General Assembly, repeatedly emphasizing the need for continued talk as Iran continues to resist calls to suspend its program.

United States officials said they were willing to agree to a compromise in which a drive for sanctions at the Security Council would end at the same time the Iranians would end their enrichment program. But a senior Bush official cautioned Tuesday that it is far from certain whether Iran would agree.

"We believe there's a debate going on within Iran," the official said, requesting anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly.

Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, was supposed to arrive in New York for talks with the European Union's foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, on Sunday, and had still not arrived late Tuesday night.

In his remarks, Mr. Bush did not mention Mr. Ahmadinejad by name, directing his criticism at Iran's "leaders" in general. White House officials disputed any suggestion that Mr. Bush had avoided using the Iranian president's name so as not to inflame the situation.

At U.N., Iran President Defends Nuclear Activity (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

UNITED NATIONS -- Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad defended his country's nuclear activities as "transparent, peaceful and under the watchful eye" of international inspectors, and blasted what he described as a U.S. stranglehold over the U.N. aimed at punishing Iran.

The Iranian leader's remarks before the U.N. General Assembly gave no sign that Tehran was ready to suspend its uranium-enrichment work or to join international talks on its nuclear program. Instead, in his second U.N. address since his election last year, he criticized an international system that he said gives all rights to "the great powers," who have turned the U.N. Security Council into a body "of threat and coercion."

His remarks came just hours after President Bush, in his address to the same body, sought to reach out to the Iranian people while demanding that Tehran "abandon its nuclear-weapons ambitions." Mr. Bush also backed off his long-held stance that Iran should be hit with sanctions over its nuclear program, expressing support for a European-led effort to engage Tehran in yet another round of talks.

Facing increased political attacks heading into midterm elections that could be a referendum on his war policies, Mr. Bush used his annual U.N. address to say that the U.S. would continue to champion democracy in the Muslim world instead of falling for the "mirage" of some perceived stability. His tone was far more muted and conciliatory than in previous U.N. addresses, though, including the 2002 speech in which he began to make the case for military action against Iraq.

Mr. Ahmadinejad's presence in New York this week illustrates how large he will loom over Mr. Bush's last years in office as the face-off with Iran becomes perhaps Washington's most vexing challenge.

After meeting in the morning with French President Jacques Chirac, Mr. Bush endorsed a European Union effort to coax the Iranians to the negotiating table, despite a July U.N. resolution that gave Tehran until Aug. 31 to suspend its uranium-enrichment work or face U.N. sanctions. If the Iranians continue to stall, Mr. Bush said that the major U.N. powers would "then discuss the consequences of their stalling. And one of those consequences, of course, would be some kind of sanction program."

The Bush administration now appears to be scrambling to salvage some form of pressure on Iran as Russia, China, France and other key countries back away from any strong threat of international economic sanctions.

With the opening of the annual U.N. General Assembly, the president and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice are wrestling with a number of other pressing concerns, including the rising violence in the Darfur region of Sudan and the need to bolster the international force in Lebanon. Mr. Bush's speech forms part of a dual strategy to muster international support for the diplomatic face-off with Iran and other challenges while trying to beat back critics at home who argue that the Iraq war has made the U.S. less secure.

Mr. Bush said he was speaking directly to the people of the Middle East when he cautioned that "extremists in your midst spread propaganda claiming that the West is engaged in a war against Islam." Instead, he insisted that the U.S. "desires peace," but will also "protect our people from those who pervert Islam to sow death and destruction."

Mr. Bush shot back at critics who claim that democratic changes in the Middle East are destabilizing the region. "This argument rests on a false assumption, that the Middle East was stable to begin with," he said. "The reality is that the stability we thought we saw in the Middle East was a mirage ... and a breeding ground for extremism."

With the elections seven weeks away, his remarks drew unusual fire from Democratic leaders. Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware, the senior Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said Mr. Bush had "no strategy for success in Iraq" and was on the verge there "of trading a dictator for chaos."

Iran Blames US For 'global Injustice' (FT)

By Guy Dinmore, Mark Turner And Najmeh Bozorgmehr

Financial Times, September 20, 2006

Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad, Iran's president, on Tuesday night took his diplomatic battle with the US right to the heart of the United Nations, challenging the legitimacy of the Security Council where some of its veto-wielding members – namely the US and UK – "commit aggression, occupation and violation of international law".

In a speech to the annual UN General Assembly, the Iranian president accused the West of exploiting the Council for its own ends, including the recent conflict in Lebanon and the invasion of Iraq.

He called on the General Assembly to "rescue" the Security Council, proposing that the Non-Aligned Movement, the Organisation of the Islamic Conference and Africa each appoint a veto-wielding member to the 15-nation group.

Addressing the chamber, that included the empty seats of the US and Israeli delegations, Mr Ahmadi-Nejad questioned the right of the UN to impose sanctions on Iran over its "transparent, peaceful" nuclear programme when the nuclear powers "proudly announce their production of second and third generation weapons".

"The abuse of the Security Council, as an instrument of threat and coercion, is indeed a source of grave concern," he said. However, he made no reference to the ongoing attempts to restart nuclear talks with the European powers and reiterated Iran's commitment to the Nuclear non-Proliferation Treaty, an indication that Iran is not about to follow the example of North Korea and abandon international co-operation.

Earlier, George W. Bush agreed in talks with France's Jacques Chirac to put on hold a push for UN sanctions against Iran in order to give the Europeans more time to persuade Iran to suspend uranium enrichment and resume negotiations over its nuclear programme.

Mr Bush set out a series of events that could lead to the US joining high level negotiations with Iran for the first time since the 1979 Islamic revolution. He said the EU3 of France, Germany and the UK would continue to talk to the Iranians so they would verifiably suspend their uranium enrichment programme and then the US "will come to the table".

The US had come to the General Assembly with the intention of pressing ahead with a sanctions resolution. Iran was to have been punished for defying a UN resolution demanding that it halt its controversial uranium enrichment programme by August 31.

Diplomats said the US made the limited concession out of recognition that there was a possibility Iran would agree to suspend its work while negotiations over its whole nuclear programme took place. China and Russia were also resisting US efforts to isolate Iran.

Mr Bush indicated he was not prepared to let Iran "stall" for much longer before the US went ahead with its proposals for graduated sanctions. "Time is of the essence," Mr Bush said.

In Washington, a senior US official indicated Iran had another week. Diplomats suggested the process might take longer.

In U.N. Speech, Bush Softens Tone On Iran (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Colum Lynch

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 19 -- President Bush sought to assure the Iranian people that he wants a diplomatic solution to the impasse over their country's nuclear activities but warned that their leaders are obstructing progress by funding terrorism and pursuing nuclear weapons.

Striking a more conciliatory tone than in previous addresses on the subject, Bush said Tuesday that the United States has no objections to Iran achieving a "truly peaceful nuclear power program" and told the Iranians that he looks forward "to the day when you can live in freedom, and America and Iran can be good friends and close partners in the cause of peace."

The comments on Iran were only a small part of the president's 20-minute address to the U.N. General Assembly, which was devoted to urging the world to support the forces of moderation and reform in the greater Middle East. Bush said he wanted to speak directly to people in the region, assuring Iraqis, Lebanese and Afghans of continued U.S. support for their efforts to build new democracies while telling Syrians that their government's support of Hamas and Hezbollah is "turning your country into a tool of Iran."

Bush also urged the United Nations to act quickly to deploy a robust peacekeeping force to the war-ravaged Darfur region of Sudan, apparently over the objections of the Sudanese government. Speaking to the people of Darfur, he said, "Your lives and the credibility of the United Nations is at stake."

But the dispute over Iran's nuclear program assumed center stage at the opening of the annual General Assembly session, which drew dozens of heads of state and foreign ministers and once again snarled Midtown Manhattan in traffic jams and widespread security precautions. On the sidelines of the session, Bush and U.S. diplomats continued to try to shore up support for new sanctions on Iran for its refusal to abide by a Security Council resolution insisting it halt uranium enrichment, a possible step toward building nuclear weapons.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad addressed the General Assembly several hours after Bush, and he accused the United States of rigging the United Nations to advance its own military and economic dominance and to oppress its weaker adversaries.

In his second such address to the world body, the Iranian leader charged that U.S. policies throughout the Middle East, including its support for Israel and the occupation of Iraq, have furthered human suffering in the region. He said the U.S. nuclear program poses a greater threat to international peace and security than Iran's program does.

Ahmadinejad dismissed assertions by Bush that Iran is seeking nuclear weapons. "All our nuclear activities are transparent, peaceful and under the watchful eyes of IAEA inspectors," he said, referring to the International Atomic Energy Agency.

There had been considerable speculation at the United Nations about the possibility of a chance meeting between Bush and Ahmadinejad, but there were no encounters. The Iranian president did not appear in the General Assembly hall when Bush spoke, and he declined an invitation to appear at U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan's annual luncheon of world leaders, which Bush attended. Diplomats said the Iranian leader does not appear at events at which alcohol is served.

For Bush, Tuesday's remarks seemed a different kind of exercise than his recent speeches on terrorism and Islamic radicalism in the Middle East. While he has used previous speeches to paint an alarming portrait of Iran -- he called it a "grave threat" to the world just two weeks ago in Salt Lake City -- on Tuesday he emphasized painting a more benign picture of U.S. intentions. Whether the effort will succeed is uncertain, given the long history of bitter feelings in Iran over past American interference in Iranian affairs, including the overthrow of an elected prime minister in 1953.

To the people of Iran, Bush said in his speech, "the United States respects you; we respect your country. We admire your rich history, your vibrant culture and your many contributions to civilization. You deserve an opportunity to determine your own future."

He added: "The greatest obstacle to this future is that your rulers have chosen to deny you liberty and to use your nation's resources to fund terrorism and fuel extremism and pursue nuclear weapons."

Speaking generally to people across the Middle East, Bush sought to combat what he described as "propaganda" being spread by extremists "claiming that the West is engaged in a war against Islam. This propaganda is false, and its purpose is to confuse you and justify acts of terror. We respect Islam, but we will protect our people from those who pervert Islam to sow death and destruction."

Bush's address drew polite applause from the hundreds of officials gathered in the cavernous General Assembly hall, though there was clearly unease with U.S. policies. In Annan's address, his last before the opening of a General Assembly session, he took a swipe at the Bush administration's counterterrorism strategy, saying that the "necessary and legitimate struggle" against terrorism has been used as a "pretext to abridge and abrogate fundamental human rights, thereby ceding more moral ground to the terrorists and helping them find recruits."

Outside of the speech, a key focus of U.S. activity at the U.N. session is the continuing two-track effort to bring Iran into negotiations over its nuclear activities while securing sanctions if it does not suspend enrichment of uranium. Iran says it is pursuing nuclear activities only to develop new sources of energy, while Bush said flatly Tuesday that Tehran is seeking a nuclear weapon.

U.S. diplomatic efforts were thrown into some disarray Monday when French President Jacques Chirac said in a radio interview that he did not like the idea of sanctions and that talks might begin before Iran halts uranium enrichment -- an apparent reversal of the original U.S.-European position.

But on Tuesday, emerging from a meeting at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, Bush and Chirac insisted that there is no daylight between the two countries on how to proceed.

Bush told reporters after meeting with Chirac that European powers are continuing to try to bring Iran to the negotiating table, and that if Iran agrees to suspend uranium enrichment, the United States will join those talks. "Time is of the essence," Bush said. "Should they continue to stall, we will then discuss the consequences."

At his news conference with Bush, Chirac said he sees "eye to eye" with Bush on how to deal with Iran. But a few hours later, at his own press conference, the French president seemed to muddy the waters again by describing a different timetable. He said that the United States, European leaders, Russia and China should agree quickly on an agenda for talks, and that as a "goodwill gesture" the drive for sanctions would then be put on hold, and Iranians would suspend enrichment.

One senior administration official, who was not authorized to speak publicly about the discussions, said the discrepancies are "differences in emphasis, not differences in substance. That's a big difference and could [prove] useful in pursuing a diplomatic solution."

By Deb Riechmann

AP, September 20, 2006

President Bush sought to blunt anti-Americanism across the Middle East on Tuesday, asserting that extremists are trying to justify their violence by falsely claiming the U.S. is waging war on Islam. He singled out Iran and Syria as sponsors of terrorism.

Bush, in an address to world leaders at the U.N. General Assembly, tried to advance his campaign for democracy in the Middle East against a backdrop of turmoil in Iraq, Afghanistan and other nations that have embraced the very changes he seeks for the region.

Solidly aligned with Israel, the United States is viewed with anger and suspicion by Muslims across the Middle East.

Addressing that hostility, Bush said, "My country desires peace. Extremists in your midst spread propaganda claiming that the West is engaged in a war against Islam. This propaganda is false and its purpose is to confuse you and justify acts of terror. We respect Islam."

Hours after Bush spoke, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad told the General Assembly that the U.S. and Britain were abusing the U.N. Security Council to achieve their own ends. He described Iran's disputed nuclear activities as "transparent, peaceful and under the watchful eye" of U.N. inspectors.

Ahmadinejad was also critical of the U.S.-led war in Iraq, declaring that "the occupiers are incapable of establishing security in Iraq" and that every day hundreds of people are killed "in cold blood."

Bush's address earlier in the day was the latest in a series of speeches on the war on terror, linked to last week's fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks and aimed at setting the tone for the final weeks of U.S. elections that will determine control of Congress.

Bush said past stability in the Middle East has been achieved at the expense of freedom, and he disputed critics who claim his push for democracy has destabilized the region.

"The reality is that the stability we thought we saw in the Middle East was a mirage," Bush told the more than 80 prime ministers and presidents assembled in the cavernous hall of the U.N. headquarters.

"For decades, millions of men and women in the region have been trapped in oppression and hopelessness. And these conditions left a generation disillusioned and made this region a breeding ground for extremism."

While praising Bush's freedom refrain, Madeleine Albright, secretary of state under President Clinton, said in an interview that the U.S.-led war in Iraq, not democratic reform, has destabilized the Middle East.

Albright said the Bush administration has not carried out its democratic initiative with uniformity. It denounces autocratic nations that are unfriendly toward the United States, then casts a blind eye to autocratic nations that are allies, she said. She mentioned Kazakhstan, whose leader will be honored at the White House Sept. 29, and Egypt.

On the sidelines of the meeting, Bush firmly denounced Iran for defying U.N. Security Council demands to freeze its uranium enrichment work and engage in talks to resolve the standoff over its nuclear weapons ambitions.

"Should they continue to stall, we will then discuss the consequences of their stalling," Bush said in an apparent reference to possible U.N. sanctions.

In his speech, Bush spoke directly to the people of Iran, not the government of Ahmadinejad, who did not attend the address. Bush said America respects Islam, the Iranian nation's rich history and culture and that he looks to a day when the two peoples "can be good friends and close partners in the cause of peace." That's very different from 2002 when Bush said Iran was part of an "axis of evil."

Bush made spreading democracy across the Middle East a cornerstone of his foreign policy after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. "When people have a voice in their future, they are less likely to blow themselves up in suicide attacks," he said Tuesday.

He recited a list of nations where he said the seeds of democracy are taking root:

_The United Arab Emirates recently announced that half the seats in its Federal National Council will be chosen through elections.

_For the first time, women have been allowed to vote and run for office in Kuwait.

_Citizens have voted in municipal elections in Saudi Arabia, in parliamentary elections in Jordan and Bahrain, and in multiparty presidential elections in Yemen and Egypt.

Bush praised Lebanon for driving out Syria — a nation the president said is a "crossroad for terrorism." Lebanon's fragile, democratic government, however, has proved too weak, so far, to check the Islamic militant group Hezbollah, which attacked neighboring Israel with rockets.

He championed the toppling of former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein and the new democratic government in Baghdad. Yet democracy there is being threatened by bloody sectarian violence in the four-year-old war that is becoming increasingly unpopular at the U.S. as well as abroad. About a dozen demonstrators outside the United Nations chanted "Bush is a criminal. No war on Iraq," but inside the world leaders gave Bush a polite reception.

Bush also trumpeted democratic change in Afghanistan. But five years after the U.S.-led invasion ousted the Taliban from political power, the militant Islamic group is proving a resilient enemy for NATO forces in the south, and Afghan President Hamid Karzai has little control outside Kabul.

In some cases, democratic change in the Middle East has not seemed to be in the U.S. interest.

In free elections in March, the Palestinian people voted the Islamic militant group Hamas into power. The United States lists Hamas as a terrorist group, and has been working to support Mahmoud Abbas, the moderate Palestinian president who meets with Bush on Wednesday.

At U.N., Bush Urges Reform In Middle East (LAT)

By Maggie Farley And Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2006

UNITED NATIONS — President Bush on Tuesday called for Muslims and other residents of the Middle East to reject extremism and empower "voices of moderation," offering the latest defense of his "freedom agenda" that has rankled allies abroad and drawn criticism from Democrats at home.

In a speech at the opening of the annual U.N. General Assembly debate, Bush singled out Iran, Syria and militant groups such as Hezbollah and Hamas as obstacles to reform and supporters of terrorism, stating again that Iran must not be allowed to pursue nuclear weapons.

Bush addressed a crowd left skeptical by the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, launched without U.N. endorsement, and Washington's hard line on Iran. Brazil's President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva told the assembled diplomats that "billions and billions" of dollars spent in Iraq could have been used to lessen hunger and poverty around the world.

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan criticized Bush's policies for fighting terrorism, particularly his administration's controversial practices of secret detention and transferring prisoners to other countries for interrogation, which the White House refers to as "extraordinary rendition."

Without naming the United States, Annan condemned the way the fight against terrorism was "used as a pretext to abridge or abrogate fundamental human rights, thereby ceding moral ground to the terrorists and helping them find new recruits."

Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, in a speech Tuesday evening, fiercely denounced the U.S. and Israel, accusing both nations of using the Security Council as an instrument of "oppression."

Neither Bush nor Ahmadinejad was present for the other's speech. Ahmadinejad condemned the U.S. for acting as "judge, jury and executioner" on Iran's nuclear program, which he defended as "transparent, peaceful and under the watchful eyes" of U.N. inspectors.

Sudanese President Omar Hassan Ahmed Bashir confounded hopes for a breakthrough on Darfur, repeating his objections to allowing U.N. peacekeepers to protect civilians there.

In a rare international news conference, Bashir accused aid groups of hyping the crisis as a ruse to raise funds, and blamed "Zionist Jewish organizations" for orchestrating recent demonstrations in the United States that called for peacekeepers.

The U.N. and aid groups have estimated that nearly 200,000 people have been killed in Darfur. The Security Council will vote Thursday on whether to expand a U.N. peacekeeping operation to allow it to operate in Darfur.

Bashir rejected the idea, but said that he would accept more African Union forces to join the 7,000 overextended troops in the region.

Bush's speech focused heavily on the Middle East, and in contrast with some of his more hawkish appearances here, such as his promise to "disarm" then-Iraqi President Saddam Hussein with or without support from the U.N., Tuesday's address accentuated diplomacy.

He pledged to make a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian dispute "one of the great objectives of my presidency," and appealed to the people of Iran, Syria, Iraq and Lebanon to reject anti-U.S. "propaganda" that he said was designed to mislead them about his intentions.

"Freedom, by its nature, cannot be imposed; it must be chosen," Bush said. "From Beirut to Baghdad, people are making the choice for freedom. And the nations gathered in this chamber must make a choice, as well: Will we support the moderates and reformers who are working for change across the Middle East, or will we yield the future to the terrorists and extremists?

"America has made its choice. We will stand with the moderates and reformers."

Bush's 20-minute address came at a time of strain between the United States and its allies over several tenets of his foreign policy.

He told Iranians that, "despite what the regime tells you, we have no objection to Iran's pursuit of a truly peaceful nuclear power program."

Bush also singled out Syria, calling it a "crossroad for terrorism," and said that the Damascus government's alliances with Hamas and Hezbollah were turning it into a "tool of Iran."

The president's address was one of his broadest foreign policy speeches since his second inauguration last year. But unlike that address, when he spoke of spreading democracy, Bush's words and tone Tuesday reflected the trouble he had faced enacting his agenda.

Acknowledging that change can be slow, Bush held up the new Hamas-led government in the Palestinian territories as a test for whether democracy would prevail over extremism.

"The leaders of Hamas campaigned on a platform of ending corruption and improving the lives of the Palestinian people, and they prevailed," he said. "The world is waiting to see whether the Hamas government will follow through on its promises, or pursue an extremist agenda."

Annan also focused on the Middle East in his final address to the assembly, and said that solving the long-standing discord between Israelis and Palestinians is the key to stability in the region and to credibility for the U.N.

"As long as the Security Council is unable to end this conflict, so long will respect for the United Nations continue to decline," he said.

Annan's speech had a tone of melancholy, as he lamented that during his 10-year tenure, he had watched the world grow more globalized, yet more divided. He expressed concern that the spreading conflicts threatened the ability of U.N. member states to work collectively to solve disputes.

"The events of the last 10 years have sharpened, not resolved, the key conflicts dividing the world," he said. "The only answer to this divided world is a truly United Nations."

Throughout the day, presidents and prime ministers brought their grievances and hopes to the world stage, and held tightly timed private meetings in luxury hotel suites. Many criticized Security Council paralysis on Iran, Sudan and the Middle East, but also acknowledged that the U.N. was at times the only institution that could address such problems.

Jan Egeland, the U.N.'s humanitarian chief, lauded Bush's speech and said he hoped it would spur progress on "stalled" issues such as the Middle East peace process and the crisis in Darfur. "It shows the United States really wants the U.N. to succeed and understands how vital the U.N. is," he said.

The assembled world leaders also discussed Tuesday's military coup in Thailand, and the sudden absence of the Thai prime minister, Thaksin Shinawatra. Thaksin canceled his speech, declared a state of emergency in his country and retreated to his hotel to plan a swift departure.

Iran's Ahmadinejad, who skipped the General Assembly luncheon because alcohol was served, which conflicted with his religious beliefs, spent the afternoon giving a television interview to NBC.

At the lunch of beef tournedos and potatoes, worries about the world's problems and conflicts were temporarily suspended as Bush and Annan traded toasts.

Noting that Annan would soon retire, Bush offered a tribute to his compassion and hard work.

"We need to raise our glasses to 10 years of extraordinary service and be thankful that a man such as Kofi Annan was willing to stand up and serve the cause of justice and peace," Bush said.

At U.N., Bush Tells Iranians They Deserve Better (USAT)

By David Jackson And Barbara Slavin

USA Today, September 20, 2006

UNITED NATIONS — Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad delivered a defiant speech Tuesday night before the United Nations, saying his country's nuclear program is "transparent, peaceful and under the watchful eye" of international inspectors.

His speech came hours after President Bush addressed the General Assembly, saying Iran's government has denied its people freedom.

Bush urged people across the Middle East to ignore "extremists in your midst" as he assured them the United States is not at war with Islam. "This propaganda is false, and its purpose is to confuse you and justify acts of terror," Bush said.

The United States and Iran are locked in a diplomatic battle over Iran's nuclear program. Iran says the program is peaceful. The United States says Iran is pursuing a bomb.

The United States is pushing the U.N. Security Council to impose sanctions on Iran after Tehran refused to suspend its uranium enrichment program.

The two leaders avoided running into each other during U.N. meetings Tuesday and offered no conciliatory gestures in their speeches, sticking closely to their public positions.

Ahmadinejad lashed out at the United States and Israel, accusing the Bush administration of trying to dominate the world and calling the creation of Israel "a great tragedy with hardly a precedent in history."

Ahmadinejad accused Britain and the United States of distorting the international system through their power to veto resolutions in the U.N. Security Council. He also accused the United States and Britain of acting as "prosecutor, judge and executioner" of nations with which they have differences and said the U.N. system should be changed to give greater influence to the developing world.

The General Assembly, packed for Bush's speech earlier in the day, was half empty when the Iranian addressed the chamber shortly after 7:30 p.m.

In his speech, the U.S. president told Iranians they deserved better than the theocratic government that has ruled them since a 1979 revolution overthrew the U.S.-backed shah.

"The greatest obstacle … is that your rulers have chosen to deny you liberty and to use your nation's resources to fund terrorism and fuel extremism and pursue nuclear weapons," he said.

Bush spoke broadly of efforts to spread democracy in the Middle East. Speaking directly to citizens of individual countries, Bush outlined his hopes for peace and praised democratic efforts in places such as Iraq.

He criticized Syria as becoming "a crossroad for terrorism," noting the country's alliances with Hamas and Hezbollah militants. The president warned the people of Syria that "your government is turning your country into a tool of Iran."

Bush applauded new democracies in Afghanistan and Iraq. He also cited elections held or planned in Algeria, the United Arab Emirates, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Bahrain, Yemen and Egypt.

Bush also told the assembly that he is sending Andrew Natsios, a former director of the U.S. Agency for International Development, as his envoy to the war-torn Darfur region of Sudan.

Outside the United Nations, several hundred people demonstrated hours before Ahmadinejad spoke. Some held placards saying, "No to terrorist Ahmadinejad."

Earlier Tuesday, thousands of Iraq war protesters marched to the United Nations, chanting and waving anti-Bush signs.

Bush, Iranian Leader Engage In War Of Words (MCT)

UNITED NATIONS - President Bush and Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad engaged in a unabashed war of words here Tuesday, each pointing to the other as the prime cause of instability in the Middle East and beyond.

Bush, addressing the opening session of the U.N. General Assembly, sought to assure the Muslim world that the United States isn't waging a war on Islam. But he singled out Iran and its proxies as standing in the way of the spread of democracy across the Middle East.

Bush restated his demand that Iran abandon its suspected drive for nuclear weapons. Striving to speak directly to the Iranian people, he said the Tehran government is stifling the country's "tremendous potential."

"The greatest obstacle to this future is that your rulers have chosen to deny you liberty and to use your nation's resources to fund terrorism and fuel extremism and pursue nuclear weapons," Bush said. "Despite what the regime tells you, we have no objection to Iran's pursuit of a truly peaceful nuclear power program."

Eight hours later, Ahmadinejad stood before the same podium in the General Assembly hall and denounced the United States - without naming it - for occupying Iraq, backing Israel and using democracy as a pretext for trying to dominate the globe.

The controversial Iranian leader, who has previously questioned the Holocaust and called for Israel's elimination, seemed to reject demands that Iran halt enrichment of uranium, which Tehran insists is for civil power generation.

"All our nuclear activities are transparent, peaceful and under the watchful eyes of the IAEA inspectors," he said, referring to the International Atomic Energy Agency. "Why then are there objections to our legally recognized rights?"

The tough talk underscored the growing tension between the United States and an increasingly confident Iran, which appears to be expanding its sway across the Persian Gulf.

Bush's comments on Iran, while tough, were more restrained than in recent weeks. Last month he called Iran a "grave threat" in a speech to the American Legion. That helped fuel speculation that some sort of U.S. military action against Iran might be coming.

But while the president spoke publicly in softer tones, he and other administration officials continued to work behind the scenes to forge consensus among U.S. allies for eventual sanctions against Tehran.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met with counterparts from Europe, Russia and China over dinner Tuesday evening to chart strategy.

Earlier, Bush met with French President Jacques Chirac and the two leaders appeared in sync on how to handle Iran, one day after Chirac appeared to suggest that negotiations with Iran should begin even before Tehran suspends enriching uranium that could be used for nuclear weapons.

Bush said that three European Union nations - Britain, France and Germany - would continue talks with Iran aimed at getting Iran to verifiably suspend its uranium enrichment. Once Iran does that, Washington would join negotiations. If Iran fails to suspend, then the Western powers would "discuss the consequences ... and one of the consequences, of course, would be some kind of sanction program," Bush said.

A French diplomat, speaking on condition of anonymity to describe the leaders' private talk, said Chirac had reaffirmed that while preparatory talks with Iran can take place now, no real negotiations can start until Iran halts enrichment.

"Let me take this opportunity once again to say that the present views of the United States and I again see eye to eye on this one," Chirac said. "I totally agree with President Bush. We both are determined to push forward on this one, to move ahead in a constructive manner."

Ahmadinejad, who in his speech appeared to again question Israel's right to exist, has been the subject of ridicule and the butt of jokes this week in New York's tabloid press and on Capitol Hill. Sen. George Voinovich, R-Ohio, compared him on Tuesday to Adolf Hitler and poked fun at his name.

"Ahmadinejad - I call him Ahmad-in-a-head - I think he's a Hitler type of person," Voinovich said during a Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing. "He's made it clear that he wants to destroy Israel. He has made it clear that he doesn't believe in the Holocaust. He's a, he's a ... we all know what he is."

Bush didn't mention Ahmadinejad specifically in his speech. Instead, he denounced the Tehran government and leaders of other governments and terrorist groups that are hampering the White House's push to expand democracy in the region.

He blasted Hezbollah for launching "unprovoked attacks on Israel," lashed out at Hamas for "working to destabilize the region," and accused Syria's government of turning Syria "into a tool of Iran."

However, Bush went to great lengths to stress that his disagreements aren't with the people of the Middle East.

"My country desires peace," Bush said. "Extremists in your midst spread propaganda claiming that the West is engaged in a war against Islam. This propaganda is false and its purpose is to confuse you and justify acts or terror. We respect Islam."

Bush's speech was a rare attempt to reach out directly to foreign audiences, according to Jon Alterman, head of the Middle East programs at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a center-right think tank in Washington.

But Alterman said the speech might not be effective.

"What the world is waiting for is a sense of humility and an acknowledgement of lessons learned," he said, referring to the invasion of Iraq and other perceived U.S. missteps in the region.

Some experts on the region said Bush's speech was more for domestic consumption than a foreign audience.

"This speech is intended to raise the prospects for Republican candidates for the fall," said Stephen Schlesinger, director of World Policy Institute at the New School in New York. "It's an attempt to shape public opinion."

"Today we heard more of the same rhetoric from a desperate President Bush who is worried more about his party's political prospects this November than about how to protect and fight and win the real war on terror," Dean said in a written statement.

Iran Leader Says U.S. Abusing U.N. Power (AP)

By Scheherezade Faramarzi

AP, September 20, 2006

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad took aim at U.S. policies in Iraq and Lebanon on Tuesday, and accused Washington of abusing its power in the U.N. Security Council to punish others while protecting its own interests and allies.

He addressed the annual U.N. General Assembly hours after President Bush spoke to the same forum. But while Ahmadinejad harshly criticized the United States, Bush directed his remarks to the Iranian people in a clear insult to the hard-line government.

In his speech, Bush pointed to the Iranian government's rejection of a Security Council demand to stop enriching uranium by Aug. 31 or face sanctions.

"The greatest obstacle to this future is that your rulers have chosen to deny you liberty and to use your nation's resources to fund terrorism and fuel extremism and pursue nuclear weapons," the U.S. leader said.

"Iran must abandon its nuclear weapons ambitions," he said. "Despite what the regime tells you, we have no objection to Iran's pursuit of a truly peaceful nuclear power program."

He also said he hoped to see "the day when you can live in freedom, and America and Iran can be good friends and close partners in the cause of peace."

Ahmadinejad insisted that his nation's nuclear activities are "transparent, peaceful and under the watchful eye" of inspectors from the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N. nuclear watchdog. He also reiterated his nation's commitment to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

Earlier this month, Ahmadinejad proposed a debate with Bush at the General Assembly's ministerial meeting after the White House dismissed a previous TV debate proposal as a "diversion" from serious concerns over Iran's nuclear program.

But even though the two leaders were addressing the same forum, they skipped each other's speeches and managed to avoid direct contact during the ministerial meeting.

Ahmadinejad also accused the United States and Britain of using their veto power on the Security Council to further their own interests and he said it had become an "instrument of threat and coercion."

"If they have differences with a nation or state, they drag it to the Security Council," and assign themselves the roles of "prosecutor, judge and executioner," Ahmadinejad said. "Is this a just order?"

The U.S. and Britain played central roles in helping craft a U.N. Security Council resolution passed in July that gave Iran until Aug. 31 to suspend uranium enrichment and asked the IAEA to report on Tehran's compliance, dangling the threat of sanctions if Iran refused. Tehran made clear even before the deadline expired that it had no intention of suspending uranium enrichment.

The IAEA last week rejected a recent American report on Iran's nuclear capability, saying the Islamic republic has produced material only in small quantities that is far below the level that can be used in nuclear arms.

Ahmadinejad also criticized the Security Council for failing to call for an immediate cease-fire after war broke out between Israel and the Islamic militant group Hezbollah in Lebanon. A truce was only reached on Aug. 14 to end the 34-day conflict.

"The Security Council sat idly by for so many days, witnessing the cruel scenes of atrocities against the Lebanese ... Why?" asked Ahmadinejad, whose government is one of Hezbollah's main backers.

He said the answer is self-evident: "When the power behind the hostilities is itself a permanent member of the Security Council, how then can this council fulfill its responsibilities."

The United States and Britain refused to call for a cease-fire during the monthlong war between Israel and Hezbollah, declaring it part of war on terror. Only after Israel's failure to defeat Hezbollah and the deaths of nearly 1,000 Lebanese civilians did Washington and London agree to push for a truce by the U.N. Security Council.

The Iranian leader had harsh words about U.S. efforts in Iraq, saying "the occupiers are incapable of establishing security in Iraq" and every day hundreds of people get killed "in cold blood."

Ahmadinejad claimed that numerous terrorists apprehended by the Iraqi government were "let loose under various pretexts by the occupiers."

Domestically, Ahmadinejad, who doesn't enjoy widespread popularity among his people, has been able to use America's uncompromising stand against Iran's nuclear program to his own benefit. Many Iranians, including those who are against the president's domestic policies, support him in his showdown with the United States on the nuclear issue.

In an interview with "NBC Nightly News," Ahmadinejad was asked about Bush's appeal to the Iranian people.

"We have the same desire ... to be together for the cause of world peace," he said through a translator.

"We think that the American people are like our people. They're good people, they support peace, equality and brotherhood," he said.

He said his issue was with the U.S. administration.

"I explicitly say that I am against the policies chosen by the U.S. government to run the world because these policies are moving the world toward war," he said.

Bush Says U.S. Will Keep Pressing Spread Of Democracy (Update7) (BLOOM)

By Brendan Murray And Roger Runningen

Bloomberg, September 20, 2006

By Brendan Murray and Roger Runningen

Sept. 19 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush told world leaders the U.S. won't leave Iraq until the country's transformation to a peaceful democracy is complete and pledged to give diplomacy a chance to resolve a dispute with Iran over its nuclear development program.

In an address to the United Nations General Assembly in New York today, Bush said the progress of democracy in the world, particularly the Middle East, is real and sometimes dramatic, even if it is gradual.

Bush used the UN stage to speak directly to the citizens of countries whose governments are at odds with the U.S. and he sought to end concerns of some Muslims that the American war against terrorism is an attack on Islam.

``From Beirut to Baghdad, people are making the choice for freedom and the nations here in this chamber must make a choice as well," Bush said in the 20-minute speech. ``Will we support the moderates and the reformers who are working for change across the Middle East, or will we yield the future to the terrorists and the extremists?"

The U.S. ``has made its choice," Bush said.

Addressing the citizens of the Middle East, Bush said the U.S. doesn't have a dispute with Muslims, as some militant leaders contend. ``This propaganda is false and its purpose is to confuse you and justify acts of terror," he said.

Assisting Democracy

To Iraqis, Bush pledged to ``help your democracy succeed," and he said to Afghanistan's citizens that the U.S. will help them extend ``democratic gains." He pledged to assist the emerging democracy in Lebanon.

Identifying Iran and Syria as sponsors of terrorist movements, he told Iranians and Syrians that their governments were holding them back from prosperity and peace by using resources ``to fund terrorism and fuel extremists."

He said the Iranian government's pursuit of nuclear technology and support for terrorism are the ``greatest obstacle" to peace and prosperity for the country's 69 million citizens. Economic output per person in Iran was $8,300 last year, ranking it 94th among other countries and tied with Thailand, according to U.S. government estimates.

Bush's speech comes amid two days of talks with world leaders, as the fallout from the war in Iraq limits U.S. diplomatic leverage to block the nuclear ambitions of Iran and North Korea. The U.S. suspects Iran and North Korea, both part of what Bush in 2002 called an ``axis of evil," are developing atomic weapons and could supply them to terrorist groups.

Iran's Plans

``Iran must abandon its nuclear weapons ambitions," Bush said. Directing remarks to the Iranian people, he said, ``Despite what the regime tells you, we have no objection to Iran's pursuing of a truly peaceful nuclear power program. We are working toward a diplomatic solution to this crisis."

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, in an address to the General Assembly today, said the U.S., Israel and their allies are responsible for injustice and violence around the world.

Ahmadinejad, pronounced ah-ma-deen-ah-ZHAD, reaffirmed his country's determination to develop nuclear power, saying the program is for peaceful purposes. The U.S. is using the Security Council as an ``instrument of threat and coercion" over the issue, he said.

While Bush hasn't ruled out military action to block Iran and North Korea from developing nuclear weapons, the U.S., with more than 140,000 troops dealing with increasing unrest in Iraq, is constrained from a unilateral use of force. The invasion of Iraq began in March 2003 without UN authorization and the U.S. never unearthed the weapons of mass destruction program that Bush said justified going to war.

Agreement on Strategy

Bush and French President Jacques Chirac emerged from a meeting earlier today and said they agreed on an approach to Iran. Chirac said ``the American administration and the French government see eye-to-eye" on Iran. Bush said that while the U.S. wants a diplomatic solution, ``time is of the essence" for Iran to suspend uranium enrichment or face ``some kind of sanction program."

In his own speech to the General Assembly, Chirac proposed an international conference to advance efforts to reach peace between Israel and the Palestinians. Such a conference ought to ``pave the way for a new future in the Middle East," he said.

Bush's address showed the U.S. ``really wants the UN to succeed," UN emergency relief coordinator Jan Egeland said. ``It was a speech that really tried to bring the UN forward in many of the issues where we have been stalling, like Darfur and the Middle east," Egeland said.

Diplomatic Effort

Bush said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will lead a diplomatic effort to work with moderate leaders in the Middle East to reestablish a path toward peace.

``Some have argued that the democratic changes we are seeing in the Middle East are destabilizing the region," Bush said. ``The reality is that the stability we thought we saw in the Middle East was a mirage."

The president is facing difficulty getting world leaders to back a more aggressive stance because of the conflict in Iraq.

``The Iraq war, both in its initiation and its aftermath, has obviously soured the global response," said James M. McCormick, a professor of American foreign policy at Iowa State University in Ames. Iraq ``has become the shorthand summary of all American foreign policy," McCormick said.

While in New York, Bush also met with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani to discuss measures being taken by the Iraqi government on security and the economy.

`Tough Choices'

Bush said after the session that while he is optimistic about Iraq's eventual success, he ``made it very clear'' that Talabani's government can't shrink from tough decisions.

``America stands with them, so long as the government continues to make the tough choices necessary,'' Bush said.

Talabani praised the U.S. for delivering Iraq ``from the worst kind of dictatorship,'' and that he was working to include all factions in the government.

Bush planned a meeting tomorrow with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas to discuss the formation of a coalition government with the Islamic Hamas movement.

In his speech to the UN today, Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf said the U.S. should give up using the threat of force to get Iran to halt uranium enrichment and must adopt a new strategy to combat terrorism.

``The confrontation over Iran's nuclear program threatens further instability in this already inflamed region,'' said Musharraf, a key ally of the U.S. in the war against terrorism.

Turning to another trouble spot confronting the world body, Bush said he is appointing Andrew Natsios, director of the U.S. Agency for International Development during the president's first term, as a special envoy to deal with the crisis in the Darfur area of Sudan.

Using rhetoric similar to that he's employed in recent weeks while campaigning for fellow Republicans, Bush said the world was engaged in a ``great ideological struggle'' and he said he looked forward to a future where ``the voices of moderation are in power and where the extremists are marginalized by the peaceful majority.''

Bush Warns Iranians Of 'Liberty' Denied (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 20, 2006

NEW YORK -- President Bush yesterday told Iranians they deserve a better government than they are getting, and he told Muslims worldwide to ignore radical "propaganda and conspiracy theories" that incite them to killing and terrorism.

But just hours later, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad told the U.N. General Assembly that the world's conflicts are the result of aggression by the U.S., Israel and other wealthy nations, and said the set-up of the United Nations is fundamentally unfair.

The biggest security crisis in the world took center stage as the two leaders spoke in the diplomatic version of the Lincoln-Douglas debates. Mr. Ahmadinejad called out the U.S. and Britain by name, and taunted Mr. Bush, saying "the occupiers are incapable of establishing security in Iraq."

For his part Mr. Bush talked around the Iranian leader, using his 20-minute noontime address in the General Assembly's cavernous green chamber to "speak directly to the people across the broader Middle East."

"Extremists in your midst spread propaganda claiming that the West is engaged in a war against Islam," he said. "This propaganda is false, and its purpose is to confuse you and justify acts of terror."

The speech was the last of a series Mr. Bush has been delivering over the past three weeks on the war on terror. In the earlier speeches, he challenged Congress and U.S. voters to give him the tools he wants to fight Islamic terrorists, but in yesterday's speech he made clear he expects other countries to join the U.S. fight worldwide.

"Will we support the moderates and reformers who are working for change across the Middle East -- or will we yield the future to the terrorists and extremists? America has made its choice: We will stand with the moderates and reformers," he said.

He mentioned three U.N. resolutions -- on disarming Hezbollah in Lebanon, calling on Iran to end its nuclear-weapons program, and on expanding the peacekeeping force in the Darfur region of Sudan -- and said the world body must now meet its commitments.

Mr. Bush had specific words for the people of Afghanistan, Iraq, Lebanon and Darfur. He also warned Syrians their "rulers have allowed your country to become a crossroad for terrorism." But he saved his harshest words for Iran's leaders, telling

Iranians that Americans respect them and their culture but "your rulers have chosen to deny you liberty and to use your nation's resources to fund terrorism, and fuel extremism, and pursue nuclear weapons."

He spoke to a full chamber, while the chamber was mostly empty for Mr. Ahmadinejad. The two leaders never crossed paths, as the Iranian missed yesterday's leaders' lunch, and Mr. Bush hosted a closed reception during the Iranian's speech.

Mr. Ahmadinejad questioned the fairness of the United Nations, saying the Security Council had failed the Palestinians for years, and failed Lebanon this year.

"The Security Council sat idly by for so many days," he said, adding that the reason is clear. "When the power behind the hostility is itself a permanent member of the Security Council, how then could this council fulfill its responsibilities?"

Iran has defied a U.N. Security Council resolution that imposed an Aug. 31 deadline for suspending its uranium-enrichment program. But the six nations leading the effort to block Iran's program have not been able to agree on what the next step should be.

In his speech, Mr. Ahmadinejad insisted Iran's nuclear activities were "transparent, peaceful and under the watchful eye" of U.N. inspectors and accused the U.S. of a double standard in criticizing his country's program while maintaining its own nuclear weapons arsenal.

At home, Mr. Bush is facing a slightly better political environment seven weeks before the congressional elections. A Gallup-USA Today poll released yesterday showed him with a 44 percent approval rating, and found that likely voters are now as likely to support a Republican as a Democrat for Congress in November. Both numbers are substantial improvements for Republicans.

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean yesterday said that Mr. Bush's speech sounded "worried more about his party's political prospects this November than about how to protect America and fight and win the real war on terror."

He said if other nations are wary of joining Mr. Bush's calls for action on Sudan and Iran it's the president's fault. And House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said Mr. Bush's speech spoke "in broad, general terms," but didn't show a commitment to the hard work of diplomacy in the Middle East.

In Washington, Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns, the U.S. point man in the Iran sanctions negotiations, told Congress yesterday he was convinced the international coalition was ready to impose sanctions if Tehran balks.

"We must pass the sanctions resolution, or else the credibility of the U.N. Security Council on the leading issue of our day -- and we consider it the leading security issue -- is going to be called into question," he told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Still, a senior White House official said sanctions will not happen unless European nations fail in their bid to get Tehran to the negotiating table in exchange for a suspension of moves toward U.N. sanctions. Judy Ansley, senior director for European affairs on the National Security Council, said European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana is trying "right now" to persuade Iran to engage in talks on that basis.

"You start the negotiations, the Iranians agree to suspend their enrichment activities, and in exchange, the United Nations will agree to suspend activities at the Security Council as negotiations go forward," she said, adding that "sanctions will be only if that fails."

Chirac Doesn't Want New Iran Deadline (AP)

By Angela Charlton

AP, September 19, 2006

French President Jacques Chirac said Tuesday that he does not want to set a new deadline for Iran to suspend nuclear activities, which could be used to develop atomic weapons, despite Tehran's defiance of U.N. Security Council demands.

Speaking at the United Nations, Chirac also appeared to soften an earlier proposal to drop talk of sanctions against Iran over its uranium enrichment, an issue high on the agenda at this year's U.N. General Assembly.

"We are committed to negotiations and therefore to dialogue. So we're not going to start by setting deadlines that are a few hours long," Chirac told reporters. "This is a process that is under way and I hope it will run its course."

This summer, world powers signed on to the principle that Iran would face at least mild initial sanctions if it blew an Aug. 31 deadline to suspend uranium enrichment. With the deadline elapsed and Iran offering no concessions, the nations have been holding talks on what the consequences should be.

Iran insists its nuclear program is intended for peaceful purposes only.

While the United States has consistently pushed to punish Iran for defying Security Council demands, Chirac spoke out Monday against sanctions.

The French president has sought out the spotlight on this trip to New York as part of a larger bid to carve out a lasting legacy on world affairs. It is likely his last such performance — while Chirac has been secretive about his career plans, most assume he will step down next year after 12 years in power.

On Monday, Chirac shook up diplomatic circles with a compromise proposal to kickstart talks between Iran and the international community by suspending the threat of U.N. sanctions if Tehran suspends uranium enrichment at the same time. Such a proposal is unlikely to win the support of Washington.

On Tuesday, President Bush, after sideline talks with Chirac at the United Nations, pressed Iran again to immediately begin negotiations, warning that any delay on the part of Tehran would bring consequences — including sanctions.

Chirac insisted that his compromise proposal was just a reiteration of France's position. He said he and Bush see "eye-to-eye" on Iran and insisted U.S.-French relations were close and friendly.

But then, in his speech to the General Assembly, he avoided mention of sanctions, saying only: "Our goal is not to call regimes into question."

"Dialogue must prevail," Chirac said. "The international community must stand firm and united."

U.S. Tries To Save Its Iran Plan (AP-Y)

By Anne Gearan

AP, September 20, 2006

The United States tried Tuesday to salvage its plan to punish Iran with sanctions if it won't back down in a nuclear standoff with the West, even as President Bush told Iranians he hopes that one day "America and Iran can be good friends."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice convened nations that have offered Iran a bargain to head off what the United States and others fear is a drive to build a bomb. The United States had hoped to use the gathering to move decisively toward political and economic sanctions on Iran now that it has missed a U.N. deadline to shelve disputed nuclear activities, but cold feet among allies this month made that impossible.

The dinner meeting produced little consensus about the next step, and no announced deadline for when world powers expect further word from Iran. Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns said the diplomatic effort to counter Iran was in "extra innings."

Earlier, Rice warned that the world will have a credibility problem if it does not act. She also acknowledged that talks are already under way between the European Union and Tehran without conditions.

That is a concession for the United States, which has led a drive to force Iran to choose between looming U.N. sanctions or talks that could reward it for scaling back its nuclear program.

"Those talks are going on now," Rice said on the CBS "Early Show," referring to discussions between the European Union's foreign policy chief and Iran's nuclear negotiator. "But we are still pursuing the path of sanctions should Iran not follow the U.N. Security Council resolution" demanding a temporary end to its uranium enrichment program. The deadline had been set for Aug. 31.

Bush and Iran's unpredictable hard-line president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, addressed the United Nations on the same day, and the White House tried to make sure the two did not cross paths.

"Iran must abandon its nuclear weapons ambitions," Bush told the annual U.N. opening session. He added a direct appeal to the Iranian people, telling them to look past what their leaders say about the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0065991

For his part, Ahmadinejad told the U.N. General Assembly that Iran's nuclear activities were "transparent, peaceful and under the watchful eye" of U.N. inspectors. He accused the U.S. and Britain of abusing the U.N. Security Council to achieve their own ends, and he also criticized the U.S.-led war in Iraq.

The Bush administration saw the diplomatic ground shift beneath it this month as Iran maneuvered to avoid sanctions that even close U.S. allies such as France were never keen to impose.

Two members of the coalition, France and Russia, cast doubt on the idea of sanctions over the past week, and Rice and her aides have been lowering expectations for action this week.

French President Jacques Chirac proposed a compromise on Monday. The world would suspend the threat of sanctions, he suggested, if Tehran agreed to halt uranium enrichment and return to negotiations.

After a meeting with Bush on Tuesday, however, Chirac said twice that the two leaders see "eye to eye" on Iran. Bush said he and Chirac "share the same objective and we're going to continue to strategize together."

Interviewed on morning news shows Tuesday, Rice stressed that the United States will not join any negotiations until Iran has at least temporarily stopped its accelerated uranium program.

"I would meet anywhere with my counterpart at any time," once Iran has met that precondition, Rice said on ABC's "Good Morning America."

Enriched uranium can be used to make nuclear energy, as Iran claims it wants to do. It can also fuel nuclear weapons, as the United States claims Iran intends.

Any face-to-face discussions between Iran and the United States would be the most significant warming of relations in nearly three decades of estrangement.

The United States has had extensive unilateral economic sanctions against Iran since shortly after the 1979 revolution and the storming of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran.

Although the U.S. remains Iran's main adversary because of America's military, political, cultural and economic dominance, Washington has little economic leverage against Tehran on its own. The U.S. needs Europe, at least, to impose any meaningful economic penalty on Iran, but tough sanctions on the oil exporter would hurt America's international partners as well as Iran.

The prospect of U.S.-Iran talks was meant to be a powerful lure for Iran, but Rice also dangled the offer of talks earlier this year as a means to shore up a shaky international coalition against Iran.

It worked, at least for awhile. This summer, world powers signed on to the principle that Iran would face at least mild initial sanctions if it blew the August deadline.

Iran responded by hinting that it might be willing to shelve uranium enrichment, without ever saying so directly. That was enough to sow new division in the U.S.-build coalition, with the likely result that sanctions are either a dead letter or a long way off.

U.S. Policy On Iran Evolves Toward Diplomacy (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, September 20, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 19 -- Before the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, U.S. officials confidently predicted that the toppling of Saddam Hussein would lead to renewed momentum on the Israeli-Palestinian peace track. "The road to Jerusalem leads through Baghdad" was a common refrain.

President Bush's speech Tuesday to the U.N. General Assembly showed how much that diplomatic calculation has changed in Bush's second term. With the United States ensnarled in an increasingly difficult campaign in Iraq, war is no longer a viable option. Instead, the administration is struggling with the difficult and messy business of diplomacy. That often means accommodating the interests and demands of other countries, even backtracking on what had been firm positions.

Slowly but surely, the White House has muddied what were once clear lines in pursuit of diplomacy. As recently as a month ago, the administration firmly demanded that Iran must first suspend its nuclear activities before the United States would join negotiations on the nuclear programs, but now U.S. officials have quietly acquiesced in a European-led effort to find a face-saving way for the talks to begin.

U.S. officials are still pursuing the possibility of sanctions, and in fact they have drafted a sanctions resolution to be offered at the U.N. Security Council. But with allies balking, negotiations appear more likely than punishment. Bush, in his speech, used notably mild language when he discussed Iran, suggesting that the two countries one day will "be good friends and close partners in the cause of peace."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice hosted a dinner last night at the Waldorf-Astoria hotel with her counterparts from Russia, China, France, Britain, Germany and Italy. Under the original schedule, the session was supposed to reach decisions on a sanctions resolution. Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns, in briefing reporters last night, said the foreign ministers expressed "very strong support" for the European Union negotiations with Iran. "We are seeking a diplomatic solution," he said, adding that the diplomacy was "in extra innings."

Bush, in his speech, also emphasized that U.S. officials "have no objection to Iran's pursuit of a truly peaceful nuclear power program." This is a reversal from the policy in the first term, when U.S. officials loudly proclaimed that a country with such vast oil and gas reserves had no need for a nuclear program. Under pressure from Europeans, the administration dropped that argument late last year.

On the Middle East, Bush pushed his notion that greater democracy will bring stability to the region. But many foreign officials instead argue that stability can only be achieved if there is peace between Israelis and Palestinians.

To that end, Bush appeared to announce a new initiative, saying he had "directed Secretary of State Rice to lead a diplomatic effort to engage moderate leaders across the region, to help the Palestinians reform their security services and support Israeli and Palestinian leaders in their efforts" to resolve differences.

But U.S. officials said Bush was not announcing something new, but rather highlighting an evolving effort to take advantage of the growing anger among Palestinians at the Hamas-led government. The militant group won legislative elections earlier this year, leading to a broad cutoff of international aid because Hamas refuses to renounce its stated goal of destroying Israel.

Rice might travel to the Middle East after the U.N. General Assembly meeting ends, though plans are not firm, officials said. To a large extent, the administration is reacting to pressure from Europeans and Arabs to do more on the Palestinian issue. British Prime Minister Tony Blair recently visited the Middle East and is trying to foster political reconciliation among various Palestinian factions, while French President Jacques Chirac on Tuesday called here for an international peace conference to "define in advance the guarantees we are prepared to provide to the parties as soon as they reach an agreement." Both Israeli and U.S. officials regard Chirac's idea as a nonstarter.

One of Rice's most senior aides, counselor Philip D. Zelikow, last Friday made a speech to a Washington think tank in which he appeared to link progress on Middle East peace to securing greater diplomatic cooperation in the struggle against Iran.

"For the Arab moderates and for the Europeans, some sense of progress and momentum on the Arab-Israeli dispute is just a sine qua non for their ability to cooperate actively with the United States on a lot of other things that we care about," Zelikow said. "We can rail against that belief; we can find it completely justifiable, but it's fact. That means an active policy on the Arab-Israeli dispute is an essential ingredient to forging a coalition that deals with the most dangerous problems."

Zelikow's comments alarmed Israelis, who fear becoming a pawn in American diplomatic calculations, and U.S. officials said they were misinterpreted. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack even posted a statement on Power Line, a right-wing blog, saying there is no change in policy.

But Zelikow may have been stating the obvious: The administration has learned that building coalitions for peace, not war, is hard work.

Embargo Politics Nations' Rich Trade With Iran Is Hurdle For Sanctions Plan (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr. And Marc Champion

One reason the U.S. is having a hard time winning global sanctions on Iran over its nuclear work is evident at a company in Tehran called Iran Khodro Co., a big vehicle manufacturer.

The company is cutting deals in China, France, Germany and Russia -- key players in the tussle over what to do about Iran's nuclear ambitions. In February the company, called IKCO, agreed to buy 10,000 trucks from a Chinese maker in a $350 million deal. This month, IKCO said it will start selling to Russia cars that it builds in Iran in cooperation with France's PSA Peugeot-Citroën.

This web of business ties helps explain why the U.S. is alone, among the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council, in being enthusiastic about imposing sweeping sanctions on Iran. The U.S. is the only one that has little to lose.

With world leaders in New York for the U.N. General Assembly, diplomats say it is possible the Security Council, plus Germany, could as early as this week begin to weigh some narrowly targeted sanctions on Iran. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad defended his country's right to conduct nuclear research in an emotional speech to the U.N. last evening. Such work, he contended, is strictly for peaceful purposes, not to build a nuclear bomb, and he called the activities "transparent, peaceful and under the watchful eye" of U.N. inspectors. The U.S. favors sanctions to pressure the Iranians to drop their enrichment plan, because it doesn't trust the peaceful assurances.

With other countries backing off the sanctions threat in favor of more diplomacy, the U.S., too, has had to soften its stance in recent days. President Bush yesterday threw his support behind yet another European-led effort to talk Iran into suspending its enrichment work as a precursor to wide-ranging negotiations. If Iran continues to stall, Mr. Bush told reporters, then the Security Council would proceed with "some kind of sanction program."(See related article1.)

America severed political and most commercial ties with Iran 26 years ago, after it let a mob hold U.S. diplomats hostage for more than a year. Through July of this year, the U.S. imported a minuscule $99 million of goods from Iran, mostly rugs, nuts and juice, while shipping to Iran $55 million of goods, nearly all of it cigarettes, pharmaceuticals and wood pulp. The other Security Council members have seen their business with Iran increase. Their total trade with Iran is on track to top $22 billion this year, up from $18 billion in 2005.

While part of the growth reflects the higher cost of Iran's oil, the trade is broader: Iran buys German steel, French cars, Russian armaments and Chinese air conditioners. The European Union accounts for more than a third of Iran's total trade with the world. China's exports to Iran have tripled in four years.

U.S. officials say Iran's commercial ties, especially its clout as holder of the second-largest oil reserves after Saudi Arabia, put a built-in limit on how far industrial powers will go. "Anything that really restricts trade will be hard, if not impossible, to get," says a senior U.S. official.

European, Russian and Chinese diplomats acknowledge that business ties matter when weighing how to proceed on the sanctions issue but deny that mercantile interests drive their diplomacy. "Of course our trade with Iran is important," said a French diplomat, "but it is also reflective of a larger familiarity with Iran that the U.S. now lacks. We are there, and the Americans are not."

Deep Misgivings

European diplomats cite deep misgivings about economic sanctions based on more than a decade of experience with Iraq, which was marked by black markets and oil-for-food-program cheating by the Saddam Hussein regime. The diplomats worry that sanctions wouldn't achieve their goal and might destabilize the region and drive oil higher. Some say they worry, too, that the U.S. might use the sanctions push as a step toward military action against Iran.

"People fear that once you are on the sanctions route there is no getting off it. They remember Iraq and think it's deja vu," said one European diplomat involved in the process.

This diplomat, however, also cited successful instances of U.N. sanctions, such as a 1992 embargo on air travel and sales of arms and oil equipment to Libya. That step was designed to push Libya to hand over suspects in the 1988 bombing of a Pan American airliner over Lockerbie, Scotland. In 2003, the U.N. lifted the sanctions after Libya gave up two suspects for trial, agreed to compensate families of the 270 victims and said it would dismantle its nuclear-weapons program.

Iran is unquestionably a promising market. It is the region's largest economy after Saudi Arabia, it is flush with oil wealth and many of its 68 million people yearn for consumer goods largely unavailable for decades. Germany exported more than $5 billion of goods to Iran last year. The Chinese get around 18% of their crude oil from Iran and have many other business relations with the country. The European Union is backing plans for a natural-gas pipeline through Turkey that could collect gas from Iran.

"This is a factor, a real factor," says Nicholas Burns, the State Department's undersecretary for political affairs and a top U.S. diplomat on the Iran issue. He maintains nonetheless that like the U.S., its allies "understand that sanctions may very well be necessary to counter Iran's drive for a nuclear weapons capability."

Investors recently appear to be playing down the chance of hard-hitting economic sanctions. Earlier this year, tensions over Iran's nuclear program hit trade and investment flows. Exports to Iran dipped, and tens of billions of dollars of capital was moved out of Iran. Iran's stock and real-estate markets suffered. Amir Cyrus Razzaghi, whose Tehran consultancy advises foreign investors, says he found many putting their expansion plans on hold because of concerns about where the nuclear standoff with the West was headed.

Investor confidence has rebounded slightly in recent weeks. "I have several multibillion-dollar clients from Europe who are coming back to Iran this week to re-look at the market," Mr. Razzaghi says, "because now they see no chance of any military attack on Iran and very little chance of serious sanctions."

A Longstanding Preference

Europe's preference for avoiding U.N. sanctions on the Iran nuclear issue is longstanding. Just months after U.S.-led forces invaded Iraq in March 2003, Britain, France and Germany combined to begin negotiations with Tehran over its recently revealed program to enrich uranium. The trio told Iran it could avoid a referral to the Security Council and obtain talks on a package of trade and investment benefits -- including in its civilian nuclear industry -- if it suspended its nuclear-fuel enrichment program.

The talks stumbled, and they effectively ended in January, when Iran said it had restarted its enrichment centrifuges. That led the Europeans to join the U.S. in threatening Iran with U.N. sanctions. By June, the U.S. had persuaded other major U.N. powers to back a resolution that would give Iran an ultimatum: Suspend enrichment or face sanctions under a resolution declaring Iran a threat to international peace and security.

The Security Council in July gave Iran until Aug. 31 to act. Iran dismissed it, while hinting it might suspend enrichment temporarily to open the way for international negotiations. As recently as last week, EU foreign-policy representative Javier Solana reported progress in continuing talks with his Iranian counterpart.

The Bush administration now wants to push ahead on the sanctions track, pressing first for a modest resolution that would ban sales of nuclear-related products and bar certain Iranian officials from international travel. The U.S. hope is that the Security Council will proceed with increasingly tough resolutions that bite deeper into Iran's economy and finally persuade its leaders to give up the uranium enrichment. President Bush has described Iran as "a grave threat" and said it must face "consequences" if it persists in enrichment.

While the U.S. would face little economic loss from sanctions on Iran, the cost would be far higher for other major powers. This year, China's exports to Iran are up 25%. Chinese companies shipped nearly $400 million of air conditioners, engines, washing machines and other such machinery to Iran in the first six months of 2006, as well as $300 million in tractors, trucks and other vehicles. Dozens of Chinese construction companies are engaged in Iran, on work ranging from Tehran's transit system and power plants to merchant ships.

Meanwhile, in the first half of this year, energy-hungry China imported $5.16 billion of oil from Iran, a 56% increase from the pace of imports in 2005. "This is just the start. China's energy dependence on Iran is going to deepen considerably," says Ilan Berman, a vice president at the American Foreign Policy Council who has studied China's ties to Iran.

German and French exports to Iran slipped slightly in the first half, but remain large. Germany is Iran's largest supplier of foreign goods, with exports last year of more than $5.4 billion. German engineering giant Siemens AG is providing huge generators for a power plant. Auto maker DaimlerChrysler AG is moving ahead on plans to build Mercedes-Benzes in Iran, in partnership with IKCO.

This month, Germany's chamber of commerce released an estimate that blanket sanctions on Iran could cost Germany 10,000 jobs. It was an effort at a "wake-up call" about what is at stake, said spokesman Felix Neugart, who added that chamber officials meet regularly with the government on the issue.

French exports to Iran totaled $2.33 billion last year. Auto makers Renault SA and Peugeot-Citroën are heavily involved through local partners. Auto imports to Iran now are falling sharply because Western companies build more cars in Iran, to feed a fast-growing market.

Besides the Peugeot 206, the jointly built car that IKCO plans to export to Russia, IKCO and other Iranian vehicle makers have agreed with Renault to build 250,000 cars a year for both domestic sale and export. Meanwhile, IKCO plans to build its Samand, which is based on a Peugeot model, in Venezuela and China. IKCO also is producing the Samand in Belarus, with Russian support.

Strategic Deals

Russia's trade with Iran is smaller than that of big European powers and China, but it is strategic. Russia is building Iran's first nuclear power plant, about a $1 billion project that is mostly paid for. In December, Moscow agreed to sell Iran 29 Tor-M1 air-defense missile systems, a $700 million transaction that the U.S. tried to nix.

"It is clear that Moscow will not support any meaningful resolution that would interfere with Russia's trade with Iran," says Dimitri Simes, president of the Nixon Center think tank in Washington. "Restrictions on travel and equipment for nuclear technology, yes, but only if narrowly defined to assure that it wouldn't interfere with Russia's existing nuclear contracts." Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov said Friday that sanctions should be imposed only "when international peace and security are really under threat."

U.S. officials acknowledge the sanctions push at the U.N. could peter out and are rewing up a campaign to get European and other companies to pull away from Iran on their own. Treasury and State Department officials have been working quietly for nearly a year to persuade banks to crimp commercial lending to Iran.

The Justice Department has stepped up enforcement of longstanding U.S. sanction laws on Iran. The laws generally bar U.S. banks from lending to Iran and U.S. companies from trading with that nation, though some companies maintain a presence in Iran trade through foreign-registered subsidiaries. A slight opening in the law in 1999 permitted Iran to send to the U.S. carpets and food items while U.S. exporters could send certain items such as food and drugs.

Several large U.S. energy firms, including Baker Hughes Inc. and ConocoPhillips, both of Houston, have pulled out of Iranian work. So has Britain's BP PLC. This year, ABN Amro Holding NV of the Netherlands and UBS AG of Switzerland said they were breaking off work with Iran.

American, Iranian Presidents Skip Each Other's Talks (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin And David Jackson

USA Today, September 20, 2006

UNITED NATIONS — The presidents of Iran and the United States managed to avoid each other Tuesday when the two gave speeches hours apart at the United Nations.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad skipped President Bush's speech to the annual General Assembly meeting. He also avoided a heads-of-state lunch, where wine was served. Iranian leaders generally boycott such events because observant Muslims don't drink alcohol.

Bush and his top advisers in turn shunned Ahmadinejad's address. The White House held a reception for heads of state at about the same time the Iranian leader spoke Tuesday evening.

Frederick Jones, a spokesman for the National Security Council, said there was nothing suspect about the timing. The president hosts the reception every year on the first night of the General Assembly.

“No one is concerned about when the president of Iran speaks,” Jones said.

Rick Grennell, spokesman for the U.S. delegation to the United Nations, said one U.S. note taker would be present for Ahmadinejad's address.

Paul Kennedy, professor of international history at Yale University, said Bush has nothing to gain by meeting Ahmadinejad. “The president of the United States would lose a lot of his dignity,” Kennedy said. “The president's staff must be saying, ‘We're not going down into the mud bath with this guy.' ”

Michael Kozak, a National Security Council official, said the president “doesn't sit around and obsess about” Ahmadinejad.

"It's the other way around," Kozak said.

Gail Bindley-Taylor Sainte, a spokeswoman for the General Assembly, said that by tradition, the president of Brazil is the first head of state to speak (because a Brazilian was the first speaker at the first special session of the assembly in 1947), followed by the U.S. president. Otherwise, world leaders get to address the General Assembly on a "first come, first served basis," she said, depending on how early they put in requests.

The United States and Tehran are locked in a disagreement over Iran's nuclear program. The Bush administration claims Iran is trying to build nuclear arms. Tehran says its program is designed for peaceful purposes.

Bush, who is known to size up a foreign leader's character with a handshake and meeting, has a personal dislike of Ahmadinejad, according to Stanley Renshon, a political psychologist at the City University of New York.

Bush has never met the Iranian president. Ahmadinejad has called for Israel to be "wiped off the map" and denied that 6 million Jews died in the Holocaust. "There is a chemistry between them, and the correct term is 'revulsion,' " Renshon said. "Ahmadinejad stands for everything Bush is worried about."

Clinton Sees Hope Of Fresh Mideast Initiative (FT)

By Chrystia Freeland And Edward Luce

Financial Times, September 20, 2006

The situation in the Middle East has become so bad that a fresh peace initiative is a strong likelihood within the next two months, Bill Clinton, the former US president, said in an interview with the Financial Times.

President Clinton, whose annual conference, the Clinton Global Initiative, begins in New York on Wednesday, said the deteriorating situation in Iraq and Afghanistan and the aftermath of the war in Lebanon had created the conditions for "some kind of positive movement to take place."

While emphasising that he had no "insider knowledge", President Clinton said: "All these bad news stories have created a sense that if we don't want further disintegration to occur then we had better come up with a strategy that goes forward in creating a new sense of order that enables everybody to live together. I'm not sure you won't see some positive things come out of the Middle East in the next 60 days."

"It is time to think about what we can do to break out of this, otherwise we have three choices. We can say: "We know who our adversaries are and we can accelerate the confrontation, or we can kick the can down the road and hope the underlying realities change, or we can try to rearrange the pieces and players and try to put a puzzle together". It seems to me the latter course is the best…It wouldn't surprise me to see some fairly interesting things come out."

In a wide-ranging interview, President Clinton offered a subtle but cogently-presented rebuttal of the Bush administration's approach to foreign policy saying that rising global resentment towards the US could mostly be overcome by a change in the US administration's attitude towards those feeling the resentment. President Clinton said that people around the world could disagree with particular policies the US pursued but still feel goodwill towards America if they felt it held their ultimate interests at heart.

"If you run a big country that has to make controversial decisions - people can't possibly agree with your decisions all the time, then you must bend over backwards to make sure they feel that at least you care about them, you know about their concerns and that you're pulling for them. Policy is important. But attitude is also important."

The former president, who would be a key electoral asset and advisor to his wife, Hillary Clinton, the New York senator, if she decided to seek the Democratic Party's nomination to run for the presidency in 2008, also said that much of the global hatred of the US could be neutralised by a change of policies – either before or after the next US presidential election.

Among the policy changes President Clinton recommended were a new peace initiative in the Middle East, proper funding of global millennium development goals that were proclaimed in 2000 (towards the end of his second presidential term), and greater US involvement in relief and development initiatives in countries such as Indonesia and Pakistan.

"There are a few people who hate Americans and our way of life but most people just disagree with what we are doing now and think we don't care very much about them," he said. "So this [anti-American sentiment] is not the end of the world – it is real but it could be changed quickly either before or after the next election….. Since you cannot defeat or occupy all your enemies in an interdependent world you have to keep working for more friends and fewer enemies. I don't think it is as complicated as sometimes it's made out to be."

Most of the former president's focus nowadays is on the global human development goals that he is pursuing through the Clinton foundation and through the second annual Clinton Global Initiative conference that one participant recently dubbed "Davos with a conscience". Many of President Clinton's objectives - for which he raised pledges of $2bn last year from companies such as Coca Cola, Deutsche Bank, Goldman Sachs and Starbucks - also coincide with his diagnosis of where US foreign policy should be focusing its resources.

He cited the example of parents in Pakistan who say they send their children to non-fee paying madrasas because they cannot afford mainstream schools. "We have given huge sums to Pakistan for military aid – particularly during the cold war, but also since then," he said. "But it seems to me we haven't helped to develop a good state education system in Pakistan. That is one example of many…It [funding the millennium development goals] would be far less expensive then our Iraq war costs and the return on investment would be enormous, truly enormous."

He continued: "One of the reasons I do this work is that if you look at the anti-poverty stuff, the global health stuff and the orientation we have on global climate change, in every case a modest – compared to the size of the tax cuts and the defence build-ups – a very modest increase from the haves to the have-nots, in the right way, that is empowering and not patronising, almost certainly has significant political benefits."

When asked how he would sell such an approach to a sceptical American electorate in the upcoming US mid-term elections, which take place on 7 November, President Clinton discarded his carefully modulated criticisms of the Bush administration for more strident language.

He said the Republicans, whom polls indicate are on course to lose control of one or possibly both houses of Congress in November, were running the 2006 election "in same way as in 2002 and 2004" by focusing principally on the Democratic Party's alleged weakness on national security.

President Clinton said that the objections of three prominent Republican senators - John McCain, Lindsey Graham and John Warner – to Mr Bush's proposals for setting out in law the permissible interrogation techniques for alleged terrorists under the Geneva Conventions had "confused" the Republican strategy. "Their strategy has been complicated by the fact that [these senators] believe in the rule of law, you know, it's kind of confusing, it's made life a bit tough," he said laughing.

President Clinton offered clear advice for Democratic candidates seeking to counter Republican arguments on national security. He said it did not matter if Democratic candidates recommended differing strategies for how to change course in Iraq - whether it was setting a deadline for withdrawal of US troops, as some, such as John Kerry, the losing 2004 presidential candidate had proposed, or altering the military and civil reconstruction strategy in Iraq without setting a deadline for pulling out, as President Clinton has argued.

"The point is that Americans will tolerate Democratic differences on Iraq because the current situation has not worked," he said."The Democrats can have differences on this but they won't win the election just by criticising Iraq."

President Clinton said the Democrats should push for four things that taken together would present a credible alternative to the Republican national security agenda. These included winning the war in Afghanistan: "We cannot lose what is a moderate Muslim democracy that is a bulwark not only against the Taliban but also against the return of Osama bin Laden," he said.

Second, it meant fully implementing the recommendations of the 9/11 commission to strengthen homeland security. "I think it is wrong to give wealthy people like Bill Clinton continuing tax cuts which is much more expensive than implementing the homeland security provisions," he said.

Third, the Democrats should commit to pursuing energy independence for the US. "We can enhance our national security by committing to energy independence with a clean energy policy that will create jobs, fight global warming and make our country more secure," he said.

Finally, the US should win over the developing world by committing between $25bn to $30bn a year to achieving the development goals agreed by the group of eight leading global economies in 2000. "We have to recognise – as we have learned in Iraq – that even a country as big and powerful as America cannot handle these problems alone. We need allies, we need friends, we need more partners and fewer enemies.

"Since we have spent so much money in Iraq – more than $300bn - we need to spend more money to get kids into schools, to keep healthy people fighting HIV, tuberculosis and malaria and to provide sensible economic strategies to help people lift themselves out of poverty. These would cost a fraction of the war in Iraq and dramatically enhance our security as well as fulfil our moral responsibility to help other people fulfil their dreams."

The U.S. Vs. Iran (WSJ)

By Michael Rubin

The Iranian government continues to enrich uranium despite Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's generous package of incentives -- and in defiance of the U.N.'s Aug. 31 deadline. Still, European officials hold out hope for the success of diplomacy. On Sept. 15, Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, said, "We are really making progress. Never before have we had a level of engagement . . . as we have now." Diplomats will look for any hopeful sign from Iranian President's Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's forthcoming U.N. speech. But can talk work? Successful diplomacy requires that both sides negotiate in good faith and honor commitments. That Tehran's track record undercuts confidence should not surprise. From its very inception, the Islamic Republic has eschewed diplomatic norms.

On Nov. 4, 1979, Iranian students seized the U.S. embassy in Tehran, holding 52 hostages for 444 days. Warren Christopher, deputy secretary of state during the crisis, called the Iranian move a "flagrant violation" of the 1961 Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations and the 1963 Vienna Convention on Consular Relations. But Iranian officials endorsed the seizure. Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini praised the students. His successor as supreme leader, Ali Khamenei, showed support with a visit to the embassy soon after its seizure. Ironically, while the Iranian leadership often demands apologies for transgressions both real and imagined, it continues to uphold the righteousness of hostage seizure, underscoring official contempt for diplomatic convention.

Still, the embassy seizure might be long forgotten had Tehran's disdain for diplomatic norms been the exception rather than the rule. In 1986, former U.S. national security advisor Robert McFarlane's traveled to Tehran. While the Iran-Contra Affair is remembered today for the Reagan administration's attempts to circumvent Congressional prohibition of funding of the Nicaraguan resistance, it also illustrates the inadvisability of trusting Tehran. President Reagan sought to win the release of American hostages in Lebanon but, as soon as Washington compensated Tehran for its bad behavior, its militias accelerated hostage seizure. Diplomatic enticement -- bribery by another name -- backfired. But diplomacy is not just about incentives; it is also about trust. What could have been just a failed initiative turned to scandal when, on the seventh anniversary of the embassy seizure, Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, today the chairman of the Expediency Council, broke a pledge of secrecy and revealed the meetings to the international press.

Iranian authorities showed diplomatic duplicity once again after Khomeini issued a declaration calling for author Salman Rushdie's death. Four months before Khomeini's death, then-president Khamenei demanded that Mr. Rushdie apologize in exchange for cancellation of a religious edict ordering his murder. Mr. Rushdie apologized, but the Iranian government nevertheless kept the bounty in place. President Khamenei was insincere, his diplomacy was a tactic. By winning an apology, he confirmed Mr. Rushdie's guilt.

Iranian lying should not surprise; what should is how often Western governments fall prey to it. The British government demanded that Tehran lift the bounty on Mr. Rushdie's head as a precondition to re-establish relations. On Sept. 24, 1998, the Iranian government said it would do nothing to harm Mr. Rushdie. No sooner had London and Tehran exchanged ambassadors, than Iranian authorities once again reversed themselves.

For U.S. forces in Afghanistan and Iraq, the cost of Iranian lying is high. While Iranian diplomats pledged not to destabilize Afghanistan and, indeed, cooperate in its reconstruction, the Islamic Revolutionary Guards Corps sent in operatives disguised as school teachers to further instability. As Afghan President Hamid Karzai struggled to wrest control away from warlords, Afghan commanders intercepted a dozen Iranian agents and proxies organizing armed resistance.

In Iraq, too, Iranian diplomacy has been duplicitous. Prior to the Iraq war, Iranian Foreign Minister Kamal Kharrazi and U.N. Ambassador Mohammad Javad Zarif, pledged Iranian noninterference to British Foreign Secretary Robin Cook and Zalmay

Khalilzad, then President George W. Bush's envoy to the free Iraqis. But, Iranian journalists now describe how, days after Saddam's fall, the Iranian leadership dispatched 2,000 Revolutionary Guards replete with radio transmitters, money, and supplies. On Nov. 18, 2003, Mr. Kharrazi again pledged good behavior. He lied outright; his promise coincided with a new deployment of Iranian intelligence across Iraq. The Revolutionary Guard stepped up its training of Muqtada al-Sadr's militia. Hasan Kazemi Qomi, previously Iran's liaison to Hezbollah in southern Lebanon, became Tehran's top diplomat in Baghdad. Mr. Qomi assured diplomats that "Iran will not accept anything that destabilizes Iraq." Four months later, Iraqi forces captured 30 Iranians fighting alongside Sadr's militia. * * *

Earlier this month, I traveled to the Middle East to meet Shiite tribal leaders and urban notables from southern Iraq. They described how Iran has transformed its consulates in Karbala and Basra into distribution points for everything from money to shaped charges. That Tehran uses diplomatic pouches and protocols to safeguard its network reflects their insincerity. While the West approaches diplomacy with sincerity, the Islamic Republic mocks diplomatic convention to shield subversion.

Iran's nuclear program raises the stakes of its deceit to U.S. national security. There is little doubt that Tehran's nuclear program is not peaceful. On Feb. 14, 2005, Ayatollah Mohammad Baqer Kharrazi, secretary-general of Iranian Hezbollah, promised, "We are able to produce atomic bombs and we will do that." In February 2006, Mohsen Gharavian, a Qom theologian well-connected to the Islamic Republic's staunchest ideologues, called Iran's possession of nuclear weapons "natural."

Iran's nuclear program has advanced through the trust of diplomats and their willingness to provide hard currency in the name of dialogue and engagement. Between 2000 and 2005, European Union trade with Iran almost tripled. Tehran invested much of this money in arms and nuclear infrastructure. For more than a decade, through both the Rafsanjani and Khatami administrations, Iranian authorities hid the existence of a uranium enrichment plant at Natanz and a heavy water plant at Khondab. That Western diplomats label Mr. Rafsanjani a pragmatist and Mr. Khatami a reformer underscores the danger of judging Iranian officials by style rather than action.

In February 2003, the Iranian authorities opened the secret plants to International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) inspectors. Their subsequent report was damning: Not only had the Iranian government designed the Natanz facility to house at least 50,000 centrifuges, but Tehran had the import of almost a ton of uranium from China, and could not account for missing processed uranium. During subsequent inspections, Iranian authorities repeatedly changed their stories when asked about the origin of weapons-grade uranium traces. Subsequent inspections exposed other lies. Finally, on Sept. 24, 2004, the IAEA Board of Governors, after recalling a litany of Iranian mistruths, found Iran in breach of its Non-Proliferation Treaty Safeguards Agreement. While Iranian officials have made many subsequent pledges to cooperate, their actions belie their words. They have yet to abide by the Additional Protocol's inspection standards and, earlier this year, turned away IAEA inspectors from Natanz in violation of the NPT.

While diplomacy necessarily involves talking to adversaries, Washington should not assume that the ayatollahs operate from the same set of ground rules. During his long exile in Najaf, Khomeini endorsed taqiya, religiously sanctioned dissembling. From his perspective and that of his followers, the ends justify the means. Hence, Khomeini saw nothing wrong when he told the Guardian newspaper, just months before his return to Iran, "I don't want to have the power of government in my hand; I am not interested in personal power." Tehran may still conduct diplomacy to fish for incentive and reward but, at its core, Iranian diplomacy is insincere. The Iranian leadership will say anything and do anything to buy the time necessary to acquire nuclear capability. That Foggy Bottom still advises against any strategy that might undercut the possibility of some illusionary breakthrough signals triumph not of realism but of negligence. Diplomacy cannot succeed if one side is playing for real and the other only for time.

Hostage To Iran Again? (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

It was galling to be lectured on ethics, truth, justice, virtue and respect for human rights by a Holocaust-denying, Iraq-meddling, American-hating pipsqueak. A guy who showed up to address the United Nations without bothering to wear a tie, so casual in a disco-looking cream suit and open-necked pink shirt he looked like he would kick back later in Chelsea.

If President Bush was bland, oblique and condescending in his U.N. remarks, bypassing President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to speak directly to the people of Iran, the Iranian leader was more blunt — referring to America and Britain disdainfully as "the occupiers." "Not a day goes by without hundreds of people getting killed in cold blood," he said.

Iranian leaders love nothing more than taunting American presidents, as we learned when Jimmy Carter was emasculated during the hostage crisis. And so it was with Mr. Ahmadinejad, who took W. and Dick Cheney's refrain about how Republicans are needed to stiffen America's will and threw it back at them.

"There is no indication,'' he needled, "that the occupiers have the necessary political will to eliminate the sources of instability."

All day the White House team went through gyrations not to run into the Iranian leader, fearful to be caught in the same frame, perhaps haunted by memories of that picture of a smiling Rummy shaking Saddam's hand in 1983. It seemed a little silly, given what a tough guy W. acts like. If he ran into the punk, he could have just told him to quit processing uranium, and moved on. Bush aides assured reporters with asperity that they were not studying the Iranian president's route or bathroom schedule, that such a fixation would only build up a foe they were trying to cut down to size.

But it's a little late for that, with Mr. Ahmadinejad staring from the cover of Time with a story on "What War With Iran Would Look Like," and with Senator George Voinovich calling him "Ah-mad-in-a-head'' and "a Hitler type of person'' at a Senate committee hearing yesterday. (Can't pols just have little Post-its on their microphones reminding them not to compare anything to the Nazis?)

Mr. Bush played down Osama for five years, while he focused on Iraq. But his ill-fated detour into Baghdad just ended up magnifying another enemy and giving Mr. Ahmadinejad a huge strategic opportunity to stoke the growing fundamentalist and radical Shiite surge unleashed by the bungled occupation. Because W. blew off diplomacy with Iraq, he is now hostage to diplomacy with Iran.

The Iranian president sounded more scornful of the U.N. than Mr. Cheney does. "If the governments of the United States or the United Kingdom, who are permanent members of the Security Council, commit aggression, occupation and violation of international law, which of the organs of the U.N. can take them to account?'' he said, complaining that they "arrogate to themselves simultaneously the roles of prosecutor, judge and executioner."

With their usual cultural tone-deafness, W. and Vice failed to appreciate the shrewdness of the nemesis they won't talk to, and continued to arrogantly act as though everything were going along great in their clash of civilizations.

W. went through a gauzy litany of progress on democratizing the Middle East, and speaking to auto dealers yesterday morning, Vice applied a Harry Truman phrase about the cold war, calling the war against terrorists a "war of nerves."

Vice said this is "a test of our character,'' and then went on to defend all the administration's attempts to put itself above the law on the wiretapping, torture and detention programs that have undermined America's moral repute in the world.

John McCain seems untroubled with those who say that his stand on torture might hurt him with the Republican base in 2008. After making nice with his former rival, W., for so long, the war hero probably enjoys getting in National Guard boy's face a little on an issue of principle.

W. has now put so many bad actors in the terror stew — some of whom hate each other — and has justified so many sketchy programs under the war-on-terror rubric, that the word "terror" is losing all meaning and just becoming a marketing slogan. Even the Republican columnist Peggy Noonan says that W. can be "a historical drama queen."

If our pursuit of terrorists who harmed us and want to hurt us again gets too diffuse, it's pointless, counterproductive and endless. The president's refusal to understand what's at stake in the torture debate is itself a kind of torture for Americans who don't want our moral power — and our pursuit of Al Qaeda — diluted.

First Lady Is Playing A Major Role On The World Stage (WP)

New York Events on Literacy, Burma Reflect Laura Bush's More Public Persona

NEW YORK -- On Monday, Laura Bush convened an international conference on literacy. Tuesday, she hosted a roundtable aimed at prodding the United Nations into action on the humanitarian crisis in Burma. Wednesday, she will address the Clinton Global Initiative. And Thursday, she is to receive a major international award.

By any measure, it is a busy week. It is particularly so for a first lady praised by some admirers as the "anti-Hillary" for her seeming preference for eschewing controversy and for embracing a more traditional role as first lady.

"Any one of those events on their own for a first lady is significant," said Anita McBride, Laura Bush's chief of staff. "Together, they are profound."

Laura Bush has proved to be a popular and comforting presence during the nearly six years that her husband has served as president. But she has mostly steered clear of a sustained public policy role, even as she has quietly championed issues close to her heart, including literacy, education, combating HIV and the rights of women.

Her portfolio is no different -- or more controversial -- this week. But her sustained presence at the center of the world stage is unprecedented, which White House aides are promoting in the belief that her emerging profile can only help bolster President Bush's sagging popularity.

Meanwhile, the first lady, once a reluctant campaigner, has established herself as a fundraising force for the GOP. In the current election cycle, she has appeared at 33 political events, raising nearly $12.4 million -- a substantial increase over 2002, according to the Republican National Committee.

The president has been a polarizing political presence both at home and abroad, but his wife remains popular. A Gallup-USA Today poll in June found that 69 percent of Americans had a favorable view of the first lady, much higher than the president's approval rating of 40 percent.

"I think she is the most popular Republican in the country right now," said Myra G. Gutin, a first-lady historian at Rider University in Lawrenceville, N.J. "I think the public relations value is tremendous. It's not out of the ordinary for the first lady to be called upon when her popularity exceeds that of her husband."

Along with her expanding political role, Laura Bush is becoming a high-profile ambassador for the social and humanitarian portions of the president's agenda. In the nearly two years since the start of his second term, she has embarked on seven solo international trips -- three more than she took during the entire first term. Many of them have given her an up-close view of the AIDS crisis, human rights abuses and the repression that women encounter in many corners of the globe.

"She's been the face of, as far as the public face of, the U.S. government commitment on AIDS, on human rights, on democracy," McBride said. "So I think he's seen what all of you have seen -- she's been a voice for the commitments that the U.S. government is making on these issues."

This all represents a long journey for a former teacher and librarian who asked her future husband to promise never to ask her to give a political speech. Her relative silence on policy issues is far different from that of her predecessor, Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Hillary Clinton maintained an office in the West Wing of the White House, which is populated by top presidential policymakers, and she was the chief architect of the Clinton administration's failed effort to restructure the nation's health-care system.

Laura Bush works out of an office in the East Wing, where some shelves are reserved for children's books. Still, she is hardly lacking in opinions, even if she is careful to ensure that they rarely eclipse those of her husband.

A casually elegant woman with a penetrating gaze, Bush often wears a Cheshire-cat smile that admirers say both conceals and protects her independence. She proved to be a steadying hand for the nation after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, by going on national television with advice for parents on how to help their children cope with the disaster. Aides say she has strong views on women's and educational issues but makes them known selectively within the administration.

Peter Smith, assistant director general for UNESCO, met with her twice in planning for a literacy conference and was impressed. "She is a person of enormous passion on literacy," he said. "It is not that she jumps up or shouts about things. Her passion has an enduring, no-nonsense quality to it."

"I don't bake cookies," she said during a 2004 White House interview with the Chicago Tribune in 2004. Protesting that the press is often eager to put the first lady in a box, she added: "The people who have lived here are more complicated than that."

During a visit to Africa last year, she surprised the president by telling reporters he should consider a woman to replace retiring Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Later, when the president nominated little-known White House counsel Harriet E. Miers for the post, provoking a revolt among some in the right wing of the GOP that eventually forced Miers's withdrawal, Bush speculated that some of the opposition to Miers may have been motivated by sexism. She has publicly lamented that some politicians have made a campaign issue of same-sex marriage -- even as her husband reaffirmed his support of a constitutional amendment to ban such unions.

The first lady delivered a presidential radio address in November 2001 on the plight of women in Afghanistan under the repressive Taliban regime. And she also pressed to visit that country, a wish that was fulfilled last year.

"Those are the things that she says she has always had an interest in -- it's just now she's expanding that interest," said Susan Whitson, her press secretary.

Her work has taken center stage this week in New York. During the global literacy conference, whose participants included first ladies from 32 nations, she was clear in her conviction that literacy is a cornerstone of liberty and self-sufficiency. Two-thirds of the world's 771 million illiterate adults are women, Bush said.

"By investing in literacy and education, governments build their economies," she said in the meeting's opening remarks.

During a meeting at the United Nations Tuesday, Bush sat at the head of a semicircular table as half a dozen health experts and officials from relief organizations briefed her on the drug trade and sex trafficking and on the horrific health and human rights problems in Burma, which is also known as Myanmar.

In remarks before the meeting, Bush said she has taken an interest in Aung San Suu Kyi, the democracy activist and Nobel laureate who remains under house arrest in Burma.

"Her example of her life actually calls attention to the situation in her country," Bush said. "And because of the attention that she gets from people around the world, we also now look at Burma and we want to see what we can do -- is there anything we can do to make sure she, as well as all the other political prisoners, are released, and that her country can reconcile."

First Lady Urges Swift Action On Myanmar (AP)

By Foster Klug

AP, September 19, 2006

First lady Laura Bush on Tuesday called for Myanmar's military rulers to release imprisoned pro-democracy leader Aung San Suu Kyi and urged the U.N. Security Council to issue a swift resolution condemning the junta.

"The United States will work very hard with other members of the Security Council to get a good resolution about Burma," Mrs. Bush told a panel of diplomats and Myanmar experts on the sidelines of the U.N. General Assembly meeting of world leaders. "The sooner the better."

The Security Council recently placed Myanmar, also known as Burma, on its agenda — something the United States has been pushing for, despite opposition from some of Myanmar's neighbors.

"It's really important for Burma's neighbors to speak with one voice," the first lady said. While the United States believes strong sanctions are the best way to force change in the country, others favor discussions with the generals.

U.S. officials also want the United Nations to call on Myanmar to release Suu Kyi, who has been in detention for much of the last 17 years. She is among some 1,100 political prisoners.

"We want to see what we can do — is there anything we can do to make sure she as well as all the other political prisoners are released," Bush said of Suu Kyi.

The U.N. Security Council held a rare briefing last year on political and social deterioration in Myanmar, but U.S. lawmakers want more done. They argue that isolating the junta should not be solely an American effort and have urged pressure be ramped up from China, Thailand and India, which they criticize for their economic ties with Myanmar's generals.

In August, President Bush approved a renewal of sanctions against Myanmar, extending for a year import restrictions.

Zaid Ibrahim, a member of Malaysia's parliament and the head of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations' Inter-Parliamentary Myanmar Caucus, said governments in the region are fed up with junta.

"The only way we can hope for real change is when this regime cracks," Ibrahim said. "Pressure works, although some people question that."

U.N. Undersecretary-General for Political Affairs Ibrahim Gambari, who was allowed to visit Myanmar earlier this year and meet with Suu Kyi, said he hoped to return and see if any progress has been made since his last visit.

Clinton, Gingrich Both Defend The Pope (AP)

By Devlin Barrett

AP, September 19, 2006

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, longtime foes in American politics, forcefully defended Pope Benedict XVI on Tuesday against a wave of Muslim criticism over a speech last week.

When asked about the controversy prior to her speech at an American Cancer Society event, Clinton, D-N.Y., said the pope's follow-up statement should have been enough to settle the matter.

"It's just outrageous and offensive that people would be threatening violence against him based on what he said, especially when there is so much they should be working on together," Clinton said.

The former first lady has a huge lead in her Senate re-election bid this year. Her opponent, Republican John Spencer, had criticized her Tuesday for not speaking out in the pope's defense.

After appearing onstage with Clinton at the cancer event, Gingrich was even more outspoken about the religious tension.

"I think what he said in his entire speech ... is that Islam has to come to grips with having a genuine dialogue of mutual respect," said Gingrich, a Georgia Republican when he was in the House. "Everything you've seen of the viciousness and the evil that has been said since then by fanatics reinforces the pope's speech."

Both Clinton and Gingrich, who as House speaker sparred for years with President Clinton, are considered potential presidential candidates in 2008.

Benedict angered much of the Muslim world with a speech that cited a Medieval text that characterized some of the teachings of the Prophet Muhammad as "evil and inhuman," particularly "his command to spread by the sword the faith." He later said he was "deeply sorry" if Muslims were offended, but some Muslims demanded a more forceful apology.

The comments led to mass protests in several Muslim countries. In Somalia, a Catholic nun was slain, a shooting that may have been motivated by anger at the pope's remarks.

"I think it's amazing that a 65-year-old nun who's serving as a nurse in Somalia can be killed over words, and people aren't outraged by the vicious barbarians that killed her," Gingrich said.

Tough-Talking Pope Has History With Muslims, Refuses To Give In (WT)

By Julia Duin

The Washington Times, September 20, 2006

Known for his toughness on matters of Catholic doctrine, Pope Benedict XVI gives no quarter when it comes to questions about Islam.

Unlike his predecessor, Pope John Paul II, Benedict has never drawn flak for saying that Muslims and Christians pray to the same God or been accused of waffling on whether Christianity is superior to the religion of prophet Muhammad.

Still, he has dialogued with Muslims for years and, just after his installation as pope 17 months ago, specifically mentioned them in an address to members of other religions.

But, during a lecture Sept. 12 in Regensburg, Germany, he quoted a 14th-century Byzantine emperor, Manuel II Paleologos, as saying, "Show me just what Muhammad brought that was new, and there you will find things only evil and inhuman, such as his command to spread by the sword the faith he preached."

Even though the pope described the quote as "marginal" and "brusque," Muslims around the world have called for the pontiff's death, churches in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip were firebombed over the weekend, and a nun was killed Sunday in Somalia, in an apparently related attack.

Still, "challenging Islam is not Benedict's priority," says David Gibson, author of the just-released book "The Rule of Benedict." "He doesn't want to see this as a debate between equals. There's no theological parity between the two. He's not there to compromise on that.

"One of the reasons he was elected last year was the cardinals felt he'd be much more confrontational with Islam. Benedict has voiced real doubts about Islam's ability to reform itself."

Benedict has studied Islam extensively and, in a 1997 interview with German journalist Peter Seewald, dealt generously with the religion.

"There is a noble Islam, embodied, for example, by the King of Morocco, and there is also the extremist, terrorist Islam, which, again, one must not identify with Islam as a whole, which would do it an injustice," the then-Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger said.

Still, he added, Islam does not fit in with Western civilization.

"Islam has a total organization of life that is completely different from ours; it embraces simply everything," he said. "There is a very marked subordination of woman to man; there is a very tightly knit criminal law, indeed, a law regulating all areas of life, that is opposed to our modern ideas about society. One has to have a clear understanding that it is not simply a denomination that can be included in the free realm of a pluralistic society."

He has refused to alter his conviction that Islam's propensity to live by the power of the sword must be moderated.

"Certainly, it has elements that favor peace, as it has other elements," he told Italian journalists in July 2005. "We always have to seek to find the best elements that help."

Unlike John Paul, who visited a mosque in Damascus, Syria, in 2001, Benedict is loath to mix religions. Last year, while in Cologne, Germany, for World Youth Day, he turned down a request by Muslim leaders to visit a mosque there, in a city known as a European base for the radical Muslim Brotherhood.

But he did meet with Muslim leaders, who he said are viewed "with respect" by Catholics.

"We must seek paths of reconciliation and learn to live with respect for each other's identity," he added. "The defense of religious freedom, in this sense, is a permanent imperative, and respect for minorities is a clear sign of true civilization."

In March, the pope summoned 179 cardinals to Rome to discuss Islam, said John L. Allen Jr., author of "The Rise of Benedict XVI." At issue was increasing persecution of Christians in Islamic countries, he said in an interview

"He feels that if we have dialogue, we need to talk about things," Mr. Allen said of the pope, "and not just be nice to each other. When he said on Sunday that he wants a 'frank and sincere dialogue,' he meant that we have to put actual issues on the table.

"The great challenge is if he can find the vocabulary to raise these issues. And can he find a conversation partner? Are there credible forces within Islam who can engage in a discussion based on reason?"

Muslim Anger At Pope Shows Signs Of Easing (NYT)

By Ian Fisher And Peter Kiefer

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

ROME, Sept. 19 — President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran suggested today that Pope Benedict XVI had satisfactorily “modified” his remarks on Islam, one sign of an apparent easing of anger since the pope issued an apology on Sunday for the reaction to his words.

“We respect the pope and all those interested in peace and justice,” Mr. Ahmadinejad, a devout Muslim and hardliner against the West, told reporters before leaving Venezuela. “I understand that he has modified the remarks he made.”

On Sunday, Pope Benedict said he was “very sorry” for the anger and protests that erupted around the Muslim world since he gave a speech a week ago, citing a medieval text describing Islam as “evil and inhuman.” Several churches were attacked the West Bank and Gaza, and a Catholic nun was killed in Somalia, although it is not certain the slaying came in reaction to the pope’s remarks.

Since the pope issued his apology on Sunday, some Muslims have said he did not go far enough: While he did say that he did not agree with the description of Islam, he did not apologize for having using the quotes. Today, some Muslims continued to demand a fuller apology.

"Either apologize or don't come," read banners at a protest today in Turkey, where the pope's scheduled trip in November has come under criticism since he made the speech. Officials from both the Turkish government and the Vatican said they expected the trip still to go forward.

In Libya on Monday, a son of the nation's leader, Col. Muammar el-Qaddafi, said he did not accept the apology and suggested instead that that pope convert to Islam.

"If this person were really someone reasonable, he would not agree to remain at his post one minute but would convert to Islam immediately," the son, Mohammed Qaddafi, said at an awards ceremony, according to news agencies.

But today, many more Muslims echoed the sentiments of the top imam in Rome, who said the pope had "stepped back" from his original comments.

"We are always ready for dialogue, always ready for co habitation, anywhere, even in those moments when we are wounded," the imam, Sami Salem, said after an inter-religious meeting here which also Jews and Catholics.

But he said: "Dialogue is not an empty word, it should be a fact. The word is not enough."

Also at the meeting, which had been planned before the pope's speech, was the Vatican's top official on inter-religious dialogue, Cardinal Paul Poupard. He echoed the imam's call for greater dialogue among religions, although Benedict has been more skeptical about talk for its own sake and has not yet sketched out practical vision for dialogue.

"The alternative road other than terrorism and violence is dialogue and this road passes through the recognition of differences in this difficult moment our presence here means an invitation to an authentic dialogue between those who believe in one God," he said.

Today, the pope issued condolences to the nun, Sister Leonella Sgorbati, shot to death in Somalia with her bodyguard. He did so through his new secretary of state, Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, who said the nun was killed "barbarically."

"In repeating a firm condemnation of all forms of violence, his holiness the pope hopes that the blood shed by such a faithful follower of the Gospel will become a seed of hope to build an authentic brotherhood between peoples, in a spirit of mutual respect for each other's religious convictions," a Vatican statement said.

The Pope's Act Of Contrition (NYT)

Now that Pope Benedict XVI has expressed regret for offending Muslims in remarks he made last week, we hope Catholic s and Muslims alike will put aside the pontiff's ill-considered comments and move forward in a conciliatory spirit.

Muslim leaders need to condemn the specific acts of violence that followed the pope's speech. Even more important, they must work against the nurturing of grievance that magnifies and politicizes insults, giving them a destructive dynamic.

There are hopeful examples of such leadership. Muhammad Habash, head of the center for Islamic studies in Damascus, acknowledged Muslims' shock at the pope's remarks but said that now "it is our turn to call for calming the situation." The top Islamic cleric in Turkey, Ali Bardakoglu, who had sharply criticized the pope, accepted the apology. He said Benedict's "expression of sadness is a sign that he would work for world peace."

The pope and the Vatican can also do more. For the past two years, Benedict has been a no-show at interfaith gatherings in Assisi, begun 20 years ago by his predecessor, John Paul II. Last year, he issued an edict revoking the autonom y of Assisi's Franciscan monks, a move that was seen as a reaction against the monks' interfaith activism. On the occasion of this year's gathering, he issued a statement about religion and peace that was read by an envoy, but his absence spoke louder than his words.

The pope also recently reassigned the Vatican's former head of interreligious dialogue, Archbishop Michael Fitzgerald, an expert on Arab affairs, to a diplomatic post in Egypt. According to a report in The Times by Ian Fisher, the move was inte rpreted by some church experts as reflecting Benedict's skepticism of dialogue with Muslims. As his unfortunate comments show, the pope needs high-level experts on Islam to help guide him.

In offering his regrets, the pope said that in its totality, his speech was intended as "an invitation to frank and sincere dialogue, with great mutual respect." In living up to that, he and other top Vatican officials will have to accept that genuine communication cannot occur on their terms only.

Israel To Pull Last Lebanon Troops By Weekend (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

JERUSALEM, Sept. 19 — Israel hopes to pull its last troops out of Lebanon by sundown on Friday, which marks the beginning of the Jewish new year, the chief of the Israeli military, Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, said today.

"If all goes without a hitch, to the satisfaction of all sides, the working assumption is that the I.D.F. will leave all the areas it controls by the Jewish New Year holiday," General Halutz told a parliamentary committee, according to a parliamentary spokesman.

If not, General Halutz said, the Israeli withdrawal "would be delayed another week." But he said that Hezbollah had respected the cease-fire ending the 34-day war that began on July 12.

The United Nations said today that the number of foreign peacekeepers in Lebanon had reached 4,950, which Secretary General Kofi Annan has said is sufficient to allow Israel to leave. The number is considerably short of the maximum number of 15,000 foreseen in the Security Council resolution that ended the hostilities.

But however thin on the ground the United Nations forces may be, Israel is clearly reluctant to stay much longer in southern Lebanon, where an unknown number of Israeli troops are vulnerable to attack. Earlier, Israel said it had already withdrawn from some 80 percent of the Lebanese territory it occupied, ceding its positions to the Lebanese Army and United Nations troops.

General Halutz also said, however, that the Hezbollah militia has fully abided by the United Nations cease-fire. He said that Hezbollah fighters were not wearing uniforms or carrying weapons, and that Israel had detected no significant resupply of weapons and missiles to Hezbollah from sponsors Syria and Iran.

The Hezbollah leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, has said that his militia would obey the cease-fire, and that if he had foreseen the harsh Israeli response to the Hezbollah raid into Israel in July 12 that captured two soldiers, he would not have ordered the attack.

Israel is hoping that the two soldiers — and a third, captured near Gaza by Palestinian militants in late June — will be released by the Jewish holiday.

In Beirut today, the United Nations humanitarian coordinator, David Shearer, said that Israel had scattered at least 350,000 unexploded cluster bomblets over south Lebanon toward the end of the war. "The outrageous fact is that nearly all of these munitions were fired in the last three to four days of the war," Mr. Shearer said.

He said that the number was based on Israeli estimates and excluded cluster bombs dropped by aircraft, and noted that three Lebanese a day had been killed or wounded by the munitions since the war ended. Israeli officials have said that cluster munitions are legal and were not fired indiscriminately.

In Gaza today, Palestinian gunmen broke into the office of WAFA, a prominent Palestinian news agency under the control of President Mahmoud Abbas. The gunmen beat up a reporter, who was taken to the hospital, and vandalized equipment, the news agency said. The gunmen accused WAFA of favoring Fatah in its news coverage.

Mr. Abbas is in New York at the United Nations General Assembly, where he met on Monday with Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni of Israel. Ms. Livni said that Israel wants to reopen a dialogue with Mr. Abbas, who said that the two "talked about everything" in what he called "a very, very positive meeting."

Mr. Abbas is trying to convince Israel and the United States that a proposed national-unity government with Hamas will satisfy Western demands that Hamas recognize the right of Israel to exist, forswear violence and accept prior Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

But a draft political program for a new government, published by the Palestinian Media Network in Gaza, does not mention Israel at all. It does speak of Palestinians achieving the goal of a sovereign state on all territories occupied by Israel in 1967 "using all legitimate means and methods," recognizes the Palestine Liberation Organization as the "sole and legitimate representative of the Palestinian people" and says that the government "shall respect the agreements signed by the P.L.O." but "in a manner that protects and safeguards the higher interests and the rights of the Palestinian people."

The program notes that the government should promote its goals based on an Arab initiative that called for peace with Israel on 1967 lines but it adds, "without affecting any rights of the Palestinian people."

Such phrases, and another emphasizing "the right of return" of Palestinian refugees, are seen by Israeli as only a conditional acceptance of a two-state solution and thus falling short of international demands.

In Gaza, The Rule By The Gun Draws Many Competitors (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

GAZA, Sept. 12 — Nabil Shaath, one of the most prominent Palestinian officials and a close adviser to the president, Mahmoud Abbas, had his own taste of Gazan chaos the other day. At sunset, on a crowded city street, his green BMW was carjacked at gunpoint.

Mr. Shaath was not in the car, only his driver, who had to be treated at a hospital. But the boldness of the gang that carried out the theft was the talk of Gaza.

As Mr. Abbas tries to assemble a national unity government that might enable Israeli and Western funds to flow back to the Palestinian Authority, the battling between gunmen affiliated with his Fatah faction and those of Hamas, the radical Islamist party which came to power after January's legislative elections, continues apace.

The fighting is part of a struggle for power in the one part of the Palestinian territories that Israel has largely abandoned. The rivalry has been visible in the murders of prominent officials, in clashes on street corners and in the creation, against the express orders of Mr. Abbas, of a Hamas-run "Executive Force," a separate police force dressed in camouflage pants, black shirts and, invariably, beards.

Even in the strikes by civil servants against the Hamas government led by Prime Minister Ismail Haniya — strikes orchestrated by Fatah, but rooted in genuine anger over nonpayment of salaries — there is an element of armed menace.

On a recent day, Fatah-affiliated policemen of the preventive security forces, loyal to Muhammad Dahlan, their former commander and a local Fatah leader, marched boldly in the streets over their pay. Those close to Hamas have at different times tried to kill Mr. Dahlan, who as the preventive security director, on the orders of the late Yasir Arafat, carried out a crackdown on Hamas in Gaza in 1995, jailing as many as 2,000 of its members. Hamas prisoners had their beards cut and some — including the current foreign minister, Mahmoud Zahar — were reportedly tortured.

As the policemen marched recently, they chanted in rhyming Arabic: "You Zahar, tell Haniya, we're going to go back to era of the bottle," a reference to one means of torture, when prisoners were sodomized with a soda bottle.

[On Monday, Mr. Haniya had to cancel a parliamentary briefing on the prospects for a new government when hundreds of protesters, most striking over unpaid wages, blocked his motorcade. Some jumped on his car and scuffled with his bodyguards, who fired shots into the air. On Monday night, there was a large Hamas counterdemonstration.]

Such clashes are compounded by the criminal activities of various gangs and clans, or hamullas, that engage in racketeering, carjacking and kidnapping. And those clans and gangs, with relatively defined territories, are represented in the security forces and armed groups of all factions.

One Gaza kidnapping that received significant attention was of two Fox News journalists, Steve Centanni and his cameraman, Olaf Wiig. For nearly two weeks last month, they were held by a mysterious group which first demanded that all Muslim prisoners in American jails be released. In the end, the group insisted that the two men pay a ransom, convert to Islam or be murdered.

Here, the kidnapping is viewed as the work of the Dagmush clan of northern Gaza City. It is regarded as highly professional, with links to criminal enterprises and various militant factions, including Hamas and the Popular Resistance Committees. The head of the latter, Jamal Abu Samahdana, himself part of a big Palestinian clan, had been appointed by Hamas as leader of the Executive Force and was killed by Israel; some Gazan analysts saw the Fox kidnapping as a way for the clan leader Mumtaz Dagmush to press to be appointed his successor.

If true, the kidnapping was another indication of the close connections among crime, militants and the rival official security forces — the kind of connections that make political leadership in Gaza seem so weak and, at times, irrelevant.

"Hamas and Fatah are shooting each other and we, the Palestinian people, are in the middle," said Ghazi Abu Shaban, 59, a math teacher at the Bashir El Rayes High School for girls. In the disorder of Gaza, the school is immaculate, refurbished with the help of German aid. Mr. Shaban has taught here for 34 years, and has seen the students go from loose hair and tight clothing to the long black cloaks and white head scarves in favor today.

Mr. Shaban and the school's headmistress, Nadra Bseisso, joined a brief teachers' strike called by their union over the failure to pay salaries, and then resented it when so-called volunteers were sent by the Hamas government to teach in their place. "We feel abused and manipulated by the president and the government competing against one another," Mr. Shaban said.

Still, he and Ms. Bseisso have worked hard to keep politics out of the school and have nothing but praise for the Executive Force, which guards the street by the school and shoos away flocks of young men who used to come to harass and flirt with the students. "They also help prevent theft," Ms. Bseisso said. "The problem is that some gunmen from Fatah will come and taunt them, and we worry about clashes."

Hamdi Shaqqura, a director at the Palestinian Center for Human Rights, said: "The main issue in Gaza is the security chaos — the attacks on people, on internationals, on journalists. Crime is everywhere, and 90 percent of the attacks come from those in the security forces, with no punishment. So as an ordinary citizen, I see this and take the law into my own hands."

Not far away, on a street near parliament, is a store that has been sold by its owners, two sisters, to raise cash. But a young nephew is angry because he wanted the store for himself. To put pressure on his aunts, he recently brought over four men from the Hassanain clan, dressed in black, with long beards and M-16's. They came in two glinting silver Mercedes-Benzes, with no license plates.

Later, neighbors said, the aunts called Hamas, which sent some men with their own guns and beards. They whispered to the gunmen, who drove away. But the Hassanain gunmen returned the next day — not only with their guns and cars, but with a lion they stole from the zoo.

Not far away from the store is a house on a plot of land. The owner died recently, and his son lives abroad. An armed member of another clan came by, neighbors said, to claim the house. He is a member of Mr. Abbas's presidential guard, and the neighbors expect him to move in any day now.

Israel And The Quartet Must Seize The Moment (FT)

By Gareth Evans

Financial Times, September 20, 2006

If there is to be any chance of forging new momentum for a comprehensive Arab-Israeli peace settlement out of the ashes of the past several months, it will have to begin with acceptance of the leadership chosen by the Palestinians as a legitimate partner by Israel and the Quartet (America, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations).

That was not possible so long as Hamas made up the whole of the Palestinian government and refused to accept the Quartet's three conditions: that it renounce violence, recognise Israel and abide by past Israeli-Palestinian accords. But things are about to change. An understanding has been reached between Mahmoud Abbas, Fatah's Palestinian president, and Ismail Haniya, the prime minister from Hamas, on establishing a government of national unity. Its political programme will, on current indications, go a significant way towards meeting international concerns, accepting two of the three criteria in practice and one in principle.

The new government is expected to commit itself to honouring international accords the Palestine Liberation Organisation signed with Israel, and to achieving a mutual ceasefire. There will be an implicit recognition of Israel, both through acceptance of past agreements and the endorsement of the 2002 Arab peace initiative, which ties normal relations with Israel to a full withdrawal from occupied territory and resolution of the refugee question. More-over, negotiations will be conducted by Mr Abbas, who accepts all three criteria without reservation, significantly enhancing his authority and guaranteeing both Israel and the international community an interlocutor they claim to respect.

The Quartet members, when they meet in New York, should acknowledge all this as a significant turning point. But there is a serious risk they will not. While there have been encouraging signs from the other Quartet members, the door of the US has remained shut.

That is a mistake. Hamas cannot be eliminated by denial and has earned the democratic right to a place in government. As the Quartet announced in its first post-election statement, all parties should respect the results.

Moreover, since then Hamas leaders have displayed some ideological flexibility, making clear that they are ready to share power with Fatah and to yield the negotiating mandate to the leader of the PLO. These developments are all the more remarkable when judged against the background of a raging conflict in Gaza and a fiscal crisis artificially stimulated through a financial and trade embargo. Amid this maelstrom there will still be a Palestinian government committed to a negotiated settlement, led by the two prime factions whose rivalry hitherto undermined peace efforts.

There are undeniably problems. The understanding is peppered with caveats. But cooler heads should regard these as opt-in rather than opt-out provisions, designed to ensure the broadest possible Palestinian buy-in. If the bar is raised any higher, the numbers of dissenting factions baying at the gates of the waning Palestinian Authority could grow to dangerous proportions. Hardest to accept will be no explicit recognition of Israel. But Israel engages warmly with many governments in the region that do not formally recognise it. The two Arab states which did so – Egypt and Jordan – acted only after their conflict over borders was resolved.

The Quartet should welcome the formation of a national unity government and then focus on what really matters: whether it is prepared to transform its words into action by enforcing a real ceasefire on all Palestinian factions. To give the government vital breathing space, the Quartet should lift its financial boycott and support the lifting of the Israeli siege by returning its monitors to the Rafah passenger crossing and stationing fresh ones at the Karni goods crossing. And it should help the PA rebuild its institutional capacity.

One further step is required. Without Israeli reciprocity, no agreement can hold. The Quartet must now ask Israel to honour agreements such as the roadmap; to transfer outstanding tax revenues; agree to a mutual cessation of violence by ending assassinations, incursions and bombardment; and resume bilateral negotiations in good faith. The Quartet should also establish an effective monitoring presence on the ground to verify both sides' implementation of these steps. After six years without a political process, it is time for the casuistry to stop and serious negotiations to begin.

Bush Buries The Lead (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2006

WHEN A REPORTER DOESN'T get to the most newsworthy information until the middle of his story, an editor will complain that he's "burying the lead." That's what President Bush may have done Tuesday in his address to the United Nations General Assembly — but nobody should complain. The buried lead in Bush's U.N. remarks about the democratization of the Middle East was his announcement of a potentially significant U.S. initiative for peace between Israel and the Palestinians.

Bush addressed what he called "peace in the Holy Land" only after taking the delegates through a tour of developments in the region — including in Afghanistan and Iraq — and throwing U.S. support behind a peacekeeping force in Sudan. But when Bush did get to the Israeli-Palestinian issue, what he said was consistent with — and different from — his earlier remarks about the spread of democracy in the region.

Surprisingly, Bush linked elections in the Palestinian territories to the expansion of the franchise elsewhere in the Arab world. Referring to Hamas, the rejectionist Islamic party with which Israel rightly refuses to negotiate, Bush said: "The leaders of Hamas campaigned on a platform of ending corruption and improving the lives of the Palestinian people, and they prevailed. The world is waiting to see whether the Hamas government will follow through on its promises or pursue an extremist agenda."

The implication is that Palestinians who voted for Hamas did so despite, not because of, the movement's antipathy toward Israel. The truth, as Bush surely knows, is more complicated. Bush also spoke with a new urgency about the need for negotiations to achieve a two-state solution for Israelis and Palestinians. He reaffirmed U.S. support for the "road map" for Israeli-

Palestinian negotiations agreed on in 2002 by the U.S., the U.N., Russia and the European Union. And he said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice would lead a renewed diplomatic effort in the region.

Again, while this might sound like diplomatic boilerplate, it amounts to a subtle change in direction. In May, Bush seemed receptive to Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's proposals for unilateral Israeli withdrawal from parts of the West Bank, a plan predicated on the idea that the road map had become irrelevant. Now the president has unfolded the map again and invited Palestinians to take advantage of it. Hamas should "serve the interests of the Palestinian people," Bush said. "Abandon terror, recognize Israel's right to exist, honor agreements and work for peace." That may sound like a stern injunction, but it also offers Hamas a route to respectability.

Buried as they were in his speech, Bush's comments about the Arab-Israeli conflict were notable because they fit awkwardly into his main theme of democracy as the solution to tensions in the region. Democracy is important, but so are security for Israel and independence for the Palestinians.

Yemen moves along volatile path to democracy (CSM)

By Ginny Hill

The Christian Science Monitor, September 20, 2006

Nine million voters are set to go to the polls here Wednesday in combined presidential and local elections, concluding a heated and sometimes deadly month-long campaign.

Some 90,000 police and troops will deploy in an attempt to minimize the violence that has claimed at least seven lives in clashes between supporters of rival candidates in this country where small arms are freely available and gun ownership is the norm.

President Ali Abdullah Saleh, who in June reversed his earlier decision to step down after nearly three decades in power, is seeking a mandate for another seven-year term. His reelection is almost certain, observers say, raising questions about the pace of progress toward democracy, 15 years after Yemen became the first country to introduce to universal suffrage to the Arabian Peninsula.

"The prospect of replacing [President] Saleh probably scares a lot of people, because it would bring uncertainty and changes to the settled order," says Paul Harris, director of IFES, a prodemocracy organization based in Washington that will take part in monitoring the election. "But the constitution now limits the president to serving two elected terms in office, which - if he wins this year - would set Saleh's retirement date for his 70s."

Yemen has been an ally to the US in the global fight against terror. But critics maintain that corruption is rife here and the government is largely forced to rule through tribal proxies outside the capital Sanaa. And Yemen has long had a reputation for cultivating and exporting terrorism. The main challenger for the presidency, Faisal bin Shamlan, has been embroiled in election-eve allegations that his bodyguard was a senior Al Qaeda militant planning attacks against US interests in Sanaa.

Saleh, president of North Yemen and commander-in-chief of the armed forces prior to unification in 1990, emerged as Yemen's leader when the end of the cold war led to the collapse of the Socialist government in South Yemen and concluded more than a decade of conflict. During 28 years at the top, he has had to manage a complex network of tribal loyalties and military interests that run parallel to and often override party politics and parliamentary structures.

Hamoud Munasser, a Yemeni journalist, says this is an important election for the development of democracy "because, for the first time, there is real competition between the ruling party and the opposition coalition.

"We used to get only one choice, but we have many choices now - both for president and at the local level," he says.

Yemen's month-long election campaign has shown all the signs of popular participation, with extensive media coverage and mass rallies in every major city.

Half-a-million people turned out on Monday to hear Saleh's final speech in Sanaa. He was dressed in a Western-style suit and surrounded by traditional Yemeni displays of horse-riding and dancing to create a spectacular piece of political theater.

By contrast, Shamlan's finale attracted fewer than 80,000 people. Supporters complained that police were preventing them from reaching the stadium. But people in the crowd were adamant that their man would bring the about changes that Yemen needs.

"I'm voting for bin Shamlan because he's an honest man. I believe he'll eradicate the corruption that dominates our government and institutions," says Sheikh Faisal bin Ali al-Gabri.

Away from the throng, others are more cynical about the prospects for the future. "Nothing will change as a result of this election," says one retired clerk, who has no intention of voting Wednesday. "There is no such thing as an Arab democracy. It's just an illusion."

Hafez al-Bukari, director of the Yemen Polling Center, says the opposition coalition is not competing on a level playing field.

"The GPC is the dominant party, both in terms of resources and control of media coverage," he says. "After decades of the status quo, people don't distinguish between the GPC and the state. They think that all benefits arising from the state are actually coming from the president's party."

During parliamentary elections in 2003, the National Democratic Institute (NDI) expressed concerns that the vote had been undermined by political intimidation, vote-buying, underage voting, and inappropriate behavior by the security forces.

On Wednesday, a 100-strong team of observers from the European Union will assess procedures in every governorate in the country in Yemen's largest monitoring operation to date.

Whatever the outcome of the vote, Yemen must eventually move toward its first peaceful transfer of power, observers say, even if turns out to be in-house affair. The front-runner for succession is currently Saleh's son, Ahmed, who is head of the Republican Guard and Special Forces.

With widespread poverty, rapid population growth, and a weak economy reliant on modest oil reserves that are less than a decade from running out, the challenges facing the country at the next elections in 2013 will only worsen unless substantial and effective reforms are introduced in the new presidential term.

Somalia Leader Survives Attack (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 19, 2006

A car bombing, a rarity in the nation, kills eight outside parliament. Some fingers point to Islamist council, which denies involvement.

MOGADISHU, Somalia — The transitional president of Somalia narrowly escaped assassination Monday when a car bomb exploded as he left a converted grain silo that serves as the nation's makeshift parliament.

President Abdullahi Yusuf was unharmed. However, eight other people, including his brother and several security guards, were killed by the blast in Baidoa, the nation's provisional capital.

The attack marked the second consecutive day of bloodshed in the Horn of Africa nation, which has been without a functioning government since 1991. On Sunday, gunmen in Mogadishu shot to death an Italian nun and her bodyguard outside a children's hospital.

Despite years of instability and violence, car bombs have been rare in Somalia, and local officials quickly blamed foreign militants. One government minister described the bombing as an "Al Qaeda-type" attack. No one immediately claimed responsibility.

"We hear about this type of thing in Iraq, but not Somalia," said Abdul Fatah Ibrahim Rasheed, a member of parliament. "This is something that is very new for us."

The blast came at a particularly sensitive time for the government. Yusuf's administration is attempting to negotiate a power-sharing agreement with the Conservative Council of Islamic Courts, which seized control of Mogadishu earlier this year. Some officials in Baidoa accused the group of participating in the attack.

DOJ_NMG_0066012

"It will jeopardize the peace process if it becomes very obvious that the Islamists are behind this terrorist act," Foreign Minister Ismail Hurre Buba Hurre said during a visit to Nairobi, the Kenyan capital.

Islamist officials denied any knowledge of the attack.

"We know nothing about it, but we are very sorry for anything that hurts the security of Somalia," said Sheik Mukhtar Robow, deputy security chief for the courts council, an alliance of religious leaders formed in an attempt to bring order to Mogadishu.

Both sides are to meet again in Khartoum, the Sudanese capital, next month to continue negotiations.

Witnesses said the bomb, apparently hidden in a small car outside the parliament compound, detonated as the president's motorcade was leaving the facility. Yusuf had just addressed lawmakers, urging them to put aside their differences and endorse his newly reshuffled Cabinet.

There were conflicting reports about whether the car was parked or was driven by a suicide bomber. In a radio address Monday night, Yusuf said authorities had recovered the remains of a person they believed might have been the suicide driver.

The blast ignited at least seven other cars and flung wreckage more than 100 yards to the doorstep of the parliament building, witnesses said. Inside, panicked lawmakers screamed and fled the building. Security guards fired into the air, adding to the sense of chaos, witnesses said.

"We thought we were under attack," said Ahmed Omar Gagale, a member of parliament. "It sounded like mortars, especially when some of the other cars began to explode from the fire."

After its formation at an internationally sponsored conference in 2004, the transitional government opted to reside in Baidoa rather than Mogadishu because of violence in the nation's traditional capital.

Since Islamists drove out the warlords who had carved up control of the city, security in Mogadishu has improved dramatically, while bloodshed in Baidoa has been rising. In July, gunmen shot a government minister as he left a mosque in Baidoa.

"It's getting very scary there," said Asha Ahmed Abdalla, a member of parliament.

Author Could Face Prison If Convicted Of 'Insulting Turkishness' (USAT)

By Michael Kuser

USA Today, September 20, 2006

ISTANBUL — Turkish novelist Elif Shafak faces trial here Thursday on charges of "insulting Turkishness" through comments made by a fictional character in her latest novel, The Bastard of Istanbul.

Shafak, 34, who teaches Middle Eastern studies at the University of Arizona, splits her time between Tucson and Istanbul, where she is helping set up a master's program in American culture and literature at Bahcesehir University.

The charges against Shafak — the latest of at least 60 cases involving authors and journalists here — raise questions about Turkey's readiness to become a full member of the European Union, a move the United States supports as a way to bolster a secular, democratic Muslim state in a pivotal geographic and political position.

She could face up to three years in jail on charges she violated Article 301 of the Turkish Penal Code by having an Armenian character in the book say that "Turkish butchers" killed her family and that the deaths were "genocide."

Shafak — who delivered her first child, a girl, on Saturday — wants to appear in court when the trial starts, her husband, Eyup Can, said Tuesday.

Can, who is editor of a Turkish business daily, said, "Most probably she won't be able to go, due to her condition." He said Shafak's lawyer will ask for a one-month postponement.

Turkey has been making efforts to change its criminal and justice systems to meet European standards to qualify for full EU membership. That's the goal of negotiations that started last October and could take a decade.

The failure to remove restraints on freedom of speech has led to charges against writers including Shafak. Under the 2005 law, anyone who criticizes the state or denigrates Turkish identity in any form can be prosecuted.

Several writers have been convicted, though none has gone to jail. Instead, the courts have handed down fines. The maximum amount levied: $4,000.

The charges against Shafak are based on events that, although they took place nearly a century ago, remain a sore spot for Turks and Armenians.

Official Turkish history says the mainly Orthodox Christian Armenians sided with Russia in an attempt to carve out a chunk of territory from the crumbling Ottoman Empire. History books here say many Muslims were killed in the fighting and the Armenians paid the price for their losing bid.

It is a criminal act in Turkey to back the view that forced marches to the Syrian border that killed up to 1 million Armenians should be considered genocide.

Other taboo topics include the rights of Turkey's Kurdish minority and Turkey's justification for invading the now-divided island nation of Cyprus in 1974.

Many Turks support Article 301 because they fear dredging up the past will hurt Turkey's aspirations to join the EU. "Talking about Turks killing people will give people in Europe and America the wrong idea, for it started with the Armenian attacks," says Banu Aktac, 43, a tour guide in Istanbul.

International PEN, a London-based group that promotes free speech, says Article 301 fails to meet international standards that protect freedom of expression such as the European Convention on Human Rights, which Turkey has signed.

"The trial against Elif Shafak is another sign that the situation in Turkey has become stricter," says Eugene Schoulgin, a PEN board member who is in Istanbul to attend the trial. "It's basically a crackdown on writers and journalists and is a result of the country's paranoiac attitude toward honor."

The Bastard of Istanbul tells the story of two women connected by a family secret. In the novel, a woman whose Armenian grandmother was raised by a Turkish Muslim family after being orphaned says, "I am the grandchild of genocide survivors who lost all their relatives in the hands of Turkish butchers in 1915."

The themes of The Bastard of Istanbul — how memories differ from person to person — evolved from the author's previous work exploring mysticism, religion and nostalgia, among other subjects.

Born in Strasbourg and raised in France, Spain, Jordan and Turkey by a single mother who was a Turkish diplomat, Shafak began as a child to question her nationality and what it means to be a woman. "Only through my novels can I continue to explore the boundaries of identity," she says.

Shafak wrote The Bastard of Istanbul in English. She then wrote a translated version for the Turkish market. The novel was published here in March and has sold more than 60,000 copies. The English-language version will be out early next year.

University of Arizona officials sent letters to Turkey's foreign minister and to the Turkish ambassador in Washington to protest Shafak's prosecution, says Anne Betteridge, director of the school's Center for Middle Eastern Studies. Betteridge was not aware of any response.

The U.S. Embassy in Ankara has been closely following Shafak's case and others that involve free speech. "We have raised concerns about freedom of expression issues with Turkish authorities," embassy spokeswoman Kathryn Schalow says.

Among other writers who have been prosecuted under Article 301 is Hrant Dink. His six-month suspended sentence for "insulting Turkishness" in his newspaper, Agos, was upheld last month.

Shafak's case, dismissed by a lower court, was reinstated by another court in early July after Kemal Kerincsiz filed a complaint. The ultranationalist lawyer initiated many of the cases against writers who brought up the Armenian deportations through the 800-member Jurists Union, an independent, non-governmental organization he founded in 2002.

Kerincsiz says his campaign is a way to derail Turkey's negotiations to join the EU. He has called membership in the 25-nation bloc a form of slavery. He also dismisses writers' concerns about being put on trial. "What's the big deal with a trial? Orhan Pamuk became a prince," he says, referring to Turkey's leading writer, who also is on trial. "And now Elif will be a princess."

Shafak says hostility to EU membership is a troubling sign for relations with the West. "Anti-Turkish sentiment in Europe buttresses Turkish nationalism," she says, referring to European concerns about admitting the predominantly Muslim nation of 70 million to the EU. "I only fear a backlash because it gives foreigners the impression that Kemal Kerincsiz represents the majority, which I don't believe he does."

AP, September 20, 2006

WASHINGTON - Congress gave final approval Tuesday to a free trade agreement with Oman, ending months of debate over a deal that will have few economic effects but came to stand for growing differences over U.S. trade policy.

The 63-31 Senate vote gives the go-ahead to a trade pact that would immediately end all duties on industrial and consumer products sold between the United States and the Arabian Gulf state. Oman would remove duties on 87 percent of U.S. agricultural imports and eliminate all tariffs within 10 years.

Trade between the two countries totals less than $1.2 billion annually, but the administration pushed hard for the deal, stressing both Oman's long history as a strategic ally and the administration's goal of establishing a Middle East free trade area by 2013.

President Bush praised the congressional action, saying it would deliver economic benefits to both countries and protect U.S. national security interests "by strengthening our relations with a strategic friend and ally in the Middle East."

Oman, said Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, has been "a consistent ally where we need one very much, in an unstable part of the world."

U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab said the Oman agreement "builds on free trade agreements concluded with Israel, Jordan, Morocco and Bahrain" and that the proposed Middle East free trade area would spur economic growth and reform in an area of almost 350 million people.

But the agreement drew fire, mainly from Democrats who said it did too little to ensure that trade with Oman wouldn't come at the expense of worker rights and the environment. They also charged that the administration has negotiated trade deals without addressing their concerns, and that free trade deals too often result in growing trade deficits and the loss of American jobs.

"Every single incompetent trade agreement this country signs ends up dramatically increasing our federal deficits," said Sen. Byron Dorgan (news, bio, voting record), D-N.D. "We are choking on them."

Sen. Max Baucus (news, bio, voting record) of Montana, a pro-trade Democrat, said "the controversy over Oman reflects more general frustration with trade agreements."

The Senate originally passed the bill implementing the agreement last June on a 60-34 vote. The House, where opposition to free trade agreements is generally stronger, narrowly approved it in July on a 221-205 vote; the measure returned to the Senate for Tuesday's procedural confirmation of its previous vote.

The office of the U.S. Trade Representative, which negotiates trade agreements, is moving ahead with numerous other bilateral deals. Talks are under way with Panama, South Africa and Thailand, and discussions have begun with South Korea and Malaysia.

Japan Imposes Financial Sanctions On North Korea (MCT)

By Tim Johnson

McClatchy Newspapers, September 20, 2006

TOKYO - Japan on Tuesday froze some bank activity of a North Korean hospital that treats top officials and a state-run software company with extensive commercial contracts in Japan, joining Australia in tightening a financial noose around the Kim Jong Il regime.

In step with the United States, Japan and Australia imposed a series of financial sanctions on North Korea over its nuclear weapons development.

"This shows the resolve of the international community and Japan," said Chief Cabinet Secretary Shinzo Abe, who's likely to win the job as Japan's new prime minister in a party vote Wednesday.

Japan's actions restricted overseas remittances and bank withdrawals of 15 North Korean commercial entities and one Swiss individual, expanding existing U.S. sanctions to include three new companies. Australia targeted 11 companies and the Swiss man.

Abe said the actions were aimed at North Korea's weapons programs and were designed to force the nation to return to six-nation talks on dismantling its nuclear programs, which deadlocked last year.

"North Korea has to come back to the negotiating table as soon as possible," Foreign Ministry spokesman Tomohiko Taniguchi said.

The sanctions also appeared intended to hurt the health care of North Korea's senior officials and to pinch hard-currency earnings from at least one successful company.

Among the enterprises hit by Japan and as yet unaffected by U.S. sanctions were the Korea Tonghae Shipping Co. and Pyongyang Informatics Centre. Japan also froze accounts of the Ponghwa Hospital, Pyongyang's best-equipped clinic. Ponghwa treats Kim's immediate family and senior officials and appears to have overseas financial activity.

By targeting the Pyongyang Informatics Centre, Japan sought to cut off the foreign earnings of one of North Korea's few viable enterprises with operations abroad.

"It's a fairly high-quality software firm. They've done quite a few contracts in Japan," said Peter Hayes, a North Korea expert and the executive director of the Nautilus Institute, a research center that focuses partly on the dangers of nuclear war.

The company was set up in the mid-1980s with help from the U.N. Development Program and ethnic Koreans living in Japan. Thought to have around 200 staff members, it's designed management software for the publishing, shipping, insurance and hotel industries. Among its past clients reportedly is Nissan, the Japanese automaker.

Hayes said he thought the overseas contracts earned the company only "a few million dollars a year." He asserted that targeting the company will have "zero" impact on getting North Korea back to nuclear talks.

"It will just force them (the company executives) into informal networks and illegitimate forms of commerce," Hayes said, possibly including online gambling and pornography.

The new sanctions follow North Korea's tests of seven ballistic missiles July 5. Shortly after the tests, Japan banned a North Korean ferry from entering its ports for six months and barred North Korean officials from entering the country.

Australia, which maintains diplomatic relations with North Korea, unlike Japan, said in a Foreign Ministry statement that its measure complements "previous actions taken by the United States and sends a strong message to North Korea."

One Japanese expert on the Korea Peninsula, Hajime Izumi, cast doubt on whether the sanctions will have much impact on Pyongyang without broader support.

"If we want to stop (nuclear activity) by North Korea, all countries in the world have to take similar measures, especially South Korea and China, to halt the flow of money," Izumi told Japanese television.

Australia And Japan Impose New Sanctions On North Korea (NYT)

By Choe Sang-hun, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

SEOUL, South Korea, Sept. 19 — Australia and Japan imposed new financial sanctions on North Korea today, as the United States dismissed appeals from China and South Korea for a softer approach and rallied more international pressure on the North over its nuclear program.

Australia and Japan have little trade with North Korea, so the practical impact of the sanctions will be small, experts said. But they are a sign that Washington and its allies are intent on tightening a financial noose around the Communist North Korean regime and starving it of hard currency from abroad.

Though that strategy is already hurting the North, officials and experts in Beijing and Seoul expressed concern that mounting pressure might prompt the North's mercurial leaders to lash out defiantly by testing a nuclear weapon — and thereby touch off an arms race in Northeast Asia.

"The Chinese government has always held the position that the issue should be resolved through dialogue, and we are opposed to sanctions," Qin Gang, the spokesman for the Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman, said today.

In Seoul, Song Min Soon, the chief national security adviser to President Roh Moo Hyun, said that South Korea did not support imposing more sanctions on North Korea. President Roh and President George W. Bush discussed sanctions when they met in Washington five days ago, but they failed to reach any agreement; negotiators for the two countries are due to meet on the issue again on Wednesday.

"Our government position has been consistent," Mr. Song said. "The matter of sanctions must be considered in a way that helps resolve the nuclear problem."

In Japan, the new sanctions took the form of an order to Japanese financial institutions to block all transactions by 15 companies and one individual who are suspected of having links to North Korea's weapons programs. The steps were announced today by Shinzo Abe, the chief cabinet secretary, who is expected to win a party vote on Wednesday that will make him the next Japanese prime minister. Mr. Abe has advocated a hard line against North Korea.

Among the companies subject to the new freeze on transactions are Korean mining, shipping and trading companies and a Swiss manufacturer, Kohas, that has long been suspected of assisting North Korea's nuclear efforts. The individual named in the freeze order is Jakob Steiger, 65, the president of Kohas.

"By taking these measures, we have demonstrated the resolve of the international community," Mr. Abe said.

In Australia, the foreign minister, Alexander Downer, took similar steps against a list of companies and individuals that it said were involved in financing North Korea's reported attempts to build weapons of mass destruction.

"North Korea misguidedly believes that development of a W.M.D. capacity will enhance its security," Mr. Downer said in a statement. "This is patently untrue. We call on North Korea to recognize this, and to give up its W.M.D. ambitions." Australia established diplomatic relations with North Korea in 2000.

Today's sanctions come exactly a year after the United States, Japan, China, Russia and the two Koreas signed an agreement in Beijing, setting out a broad outline of how to phase out the North's nuclear weapons facilities in return for economic and diplomatic rewards.

That accord quickly disintegrated after the United States Treasury Department persuaded Banco Delta Asia, a bank based in Macao, to freeze the accounts that North Korean trading companies were suspected of using to channel profits from illicit trade. Since then, North Korea has refused to take part in further six-nation talks until the sanctions are lifted.

Far from lifting the freezes, Washington has worked to expand them, persuading banks in other Asian nations to shut down North Korean accounts as well. Experts say that the regime now relies on weapons sales and counterfeiting to finance weapons programs and a comfortable lifestyle for the elite inner circle in a country otherwise racked with poverty.

"The impact was far bigger than the U.S. officials had expected," Koh Yu Hwan, a North Korea expert at Dongguk University in Seoul, said of the efforts to isolate North Korea financially. "It was a tremendous blow to the regime."

The North tried in December to open accounts at South Korea's Woori Bank, which has a branch at a joint inter-Korean industrial park in a North Korean city, the bank said today. The request was rejected by the bank.

In an apparent attempt to force Washington to lift its sanctions, North Korea test-fired seven missiles on July 5. But the United States and Japan pushed a resolution through the United Nations Security Council that urged U.N. members to stop transactions that could aid the North's weapons programs.

"Now, word is that Iran is the only remaining client for North Korean missiles," said Cheong Seong Chang, a North Korea expert at Sejong Institute in Seoul. "The sanctions are hurting not only illegal but also legitimate financial transactions for the North."

Mr. Cheong said he would not rule out the possibility of a North Korean nuclear test now.

"When pressure continues, North Korea won't be left with room for a wise judgment," he said. "As was the case with the missile tests, it thinks it should react to a tough action with a tougher counteraction."

Sanctions By Japan Harden Stance On North Korea (WSJ)

By Sebastian Moffett And Evan Ramstad

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

With one week left before Junichiro Koizumi steps down as prime minister, Japan imposed sanctions on 15 groups and one individual with links to North Korea's weapons programs, a sign of the more assertive foreign policy Tokyo has crafted during Mr. Koizumi's five years in power.

The penalties -- which target North Korean companies as well as a Swiss company and its president -- are meant to increase pressure on the communist nation in the wake of its July missile tests. The penalties will also include tighter identification checks on people making suspicious financial transactions.

Until Mr. Koizumi took office, Japanese governments hoped that the way to avoid conflict with Pyongyang was to avoid offending the regime. When North Korea fired a test missile over Japan in 1998, Tokyo did little in response.

But Mr. Koizumi decided to engage, visiting Pyongyang in 2002 and again in 2004. While there, he obtained a written agreement, the Pyongyang Declaration, in which the North promised not to launch missiles. In addition, Japan has during the past few years passed laws enabling its government to respond more briskly to North Korea. These are mostly aimed at choking off the flow of money and goods from ethnic Koreans who live in Japan but are loyal to Pyongyang.

After North Korea test-fired seven missiles into the Sea of Japan on July 5, Japan immediately banned from its ports for six months a ferry that provides the only direct passenger link between the two countries. It also barred the entry of North Korean government officials and led calls for a United Nations Security Council resolution condemning the missile tests.

Tokyo's hard line complements that of the U.S., which would like to see North Korean leader Kim Jong Il's regime collapse, removing a threat to regional stability. In the past year, the U.S. has clamped down on banks in other countries that Washington believes assist North Korea in money laundering, counterfeiting and other illegal activities. Australia has joined the hawks, too, and yesterday it announced sanctions similar to Japan's. These restrict transactions involving, among others, North Korean chemical and machinery firms.

Despite its tougher line, Japan has been losing some leverage over North Korea, making any punishment it tries to mete out potentially less effective. Five years ago, Japan was North Korea's second-biggest trading partner after China, with $475 million in annual two-way volume. By 2005, that had declined to slightly below $200 million, and Japan trailed China, South Korea, Thailand and Russia in trade with the North. In addition, China and South Korea exert far more influence on Pyongyang via food and energy assistance.

The North is increasingly getting support from its old enemy, South Korea. Fearing that tight restrictions will lead to a collapse of the North and a massive rebuilding Seoul will have to pay for, South Korea advocates economic incentives to Pyongyang it believes will lead to a change that is manageable. Seoul cut some aid to the North after July's missile tests but is reluctant to go further.

Shortly after the missile tests, Japanese Chief Cabinet Secretary Shinzo Abe, who is almost certain to succeed Mr. Koizumi as prime minister, raised the question of whether Japan could consider a first strike against North Korea. Though Mr. Abe later said Japan would consider striking at North Korea's missile bases only if attacked, the comments drew a fierce response from South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun. "Japan's attitude may lead to a critical situation in the peace over Northeast Asia," he said.

China also opposes actions that might destabilize North Korea. Yesterday, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Qin Gang called for more dialogue. Without referring to Japan or Australia by name, he said, "We are opposed to sanctions."

US-Russia Effort To Contain Nuclear Experts Fades (CSM)

By Fred Weir And Mark Clayton

The Christian Science Monitor, September 20, 2006

MOSCOW AND BOSTON

At a Moscow conference in 2000 on stopping the global migration of nuclear-weapons know-how, a Russian security official revealed that Taliban envoys had tried to recruit a Russian nuclear expert.

That expert didn't go to work for the Afghan regime. But three of his colleagues did leave their institute for other nations - and Russian officials had no idea which ones, US experts say.

With the threat of nuclear terrorism looming large in a post-9/11 world, the brain drain of Russian nuclear expertise is an even more critical concern than it was six years ago, many say. Yet a unique 1998 US-Russian partnership to offer new opportunities and skills to destitute Russian nuclear specialists living in remote former-Soviet "science cities" is set to expire Friday unless last-minute diplomacy saves it.

A stronger Russian economy and growing wariness of US access to sensitive nuclear programs has dampened Moscow's enthusiasm for the Nuclear Cities Initiative (NCI) program, as has a three-year wrangle with Washington over legal liability issues, observers say.

"It will be a great pity if this program dies, because it really had an impact around here," says Yuri Yudin, a former atomic scientist who heads the Analytical Center for Nonproliferation in the closed city of Sarov, one of several NCI-funded projects. "The objective was to create nonmilitary businesses and new jobs that could become self-sustaining, and it had considerable success. But the task is far from finished."

Others say losing the program would be another "unsettling sign" of erosion in US-Russia nuclear security cooperation.

"If we eliminate this program we will be losing a major nonproliferation agreement," says Kenneth Luongo, executive director of the Russian-American Nuclear Security Advisory Council, a nuclear nonproliferation group in Washington.

Ten Russian cities - mainly linked to nuclear weapons and missile research - remain "closed" today, even to Russians who lack special permission. The closed nature of the cities became traps for some of the estimated 35,000 Russian scientists who needed work after the Soviet Union's collapse. For these scientists, who live under security surveillance, jobs needed to be created in the closed cities.

The tiny NCI program, which has helped 1,600 scientists in its existence, has been folded into a much larger DOE effort that employs more than 13,000 Russian scientists with grant funding. But NCI is unique in its focus on job creation in closed cities by converting existing nuclear complexes into other businesses, such as computer centers, US officials say.

"If you put the money through different channels, it's not the same," Mr. Luongo says. "The program's underpinnings and momentum ... are lost."

The head of Russia's nuclear agency RosAtom, Sergei Kiriyenko, is slated to meet US Department of Energy chief Samuel Bodman in Vienna this week in an eleventh-hour chance to save the program.

"It [NCI] has been definitely a useful tool, a unique way to work with Russian WMD scientists and engineers," says Bryan Wilkes, a spokesman for the National Nuclear Security Administration that administers NCI.

Not everyone agrees the program is still needed. Valentin Ivanov, a member of the Russian parliament's energy committee, says that while there's still plenty of room for US-Russian cooperation on nuclear disarmament, the problems of the closed cities are a "domestic matter" that Moscow now has the means to address.

"We thank the US for its help, which was greatly needed in the 1990s," he says. "But this is a new time, Russia has a budget surplus now, and [US help] is not necessary anymore."

Negotiators for RosAtom and DOE failed to renew the deal in 2003 after the US side demanded a blanket liability exemption for Americans working on NCI projects, and the Russians balked. Earlier this year, the US acquiesced to the Russians. But whether it will be enough to interest Moscow in extending the deal remains highly uncertain, US officials and other observers say.

Even before the legal dispute, Moscow complained that NCI budgets in the $20 million range were too low, that much of the money was being spent in the US, and that highly qualified scientists were being re-trained to do low-level jobs like computer programmer and paramedic.

But Russian security concerns may also have played a role.

"Access to closed cities was the biggest stumbling block. Russian secrecy paranoia still exists," says Gennady Pshakhin, an expert at the Institute for Physics and Power Engineering in the formerly closed city of Obninsk. He says if his institute - which specializes in civilian nuclear energy - invites a foreigner to visit, it must obtain clearance from President Vladimir Putin or Prime Minister Mikhail Fradkov.

Supporters say the NCI made a big difference in some places, and could have done much more if more time and resources had been devoted. In Sarov - Russia's Los Alamos - NCI helped to close down one of the ex-USSR's biggest nuclear warhead factories, and turn it into a computer center that's now used by firms like Intel and Motorola. About 1,000 new jobs were created, Mr. Yudin says.

"The program really helped to diversify Sarov's economy; it changed peoples' mentality and helped to prepare them for the market," says Alexei Golubov, a former nuclear researcher who now works as an information analyst. "It was like a small window that opened onto the world for us."

Impelling NCI and other such programs is evidence over the years that Russian scientists might be willing to shop their skills to rogue regimes. In one reported 1992 incident, a planeload of Russian scientists was stopped by police "on the tarmac" as they embarked for North Korea. In 1998, an arms expert in Sarov was arrested by the FSB security service for allegedly spying for Iraq.

A study last year by the Center for Strategic and International Studies and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology surveyed the attitudes of 602 Russian nuclear, biological, and chemical WMD scientists. The study found that the mean income for such scientists was about $110 a month, and that 21 percent were willing to move to a "rogue nation" to work. As for the impact of assistance programs like NCI, the survey found 12 percent of those with grant funding would consider work in a rogue state, versus 28 percent without funding.

However, it's doubtful that any atomic experts could illegally leave Russia now, Pshakhin says.

"A lot of nuclear scientists are still underemployed, but things are a bit better," he says. "Nuclear scientists are under very strong monitoring. We are not allowed to move freely. Any attempt by a foreign power to recruit Russian scientists would immediately come to the attention of the FSB."

RosAtom chief Mr. Kiriyenko has announced plans for a sweeping revival of Russia's civilian atomic power industry. Military leaders also talk of putting weapons experts back to work.

Vladimir Fortov, head of the department of energy for the Russian Academy of Sciences, says that while Russia is returning some scientists to their old jobs, the NCI training programs remain valuable.

"They aided Russian-American mutual understanding, and it will be very unfortunate if they are discontinued," he says.

$50 Million Offer Aims At Curbing Efforts To Make Nuclear Fuel (NYT)

By William J. Broad

New York Times, September 20, 2006

VIENNA, Sept. 19 — Warren E. Buffett, the billionaire investor and philanthropist, pledged $50 million on Tuesday to help set up an international nuclear fuel bank that aspiring powers could turn to for reactor fuel instead of making it on their own.

Mr. Buffett's aim is to curb the risks of nuclear proliferation by providing an alternative to the kind of indigenous production of nuclear fuel that Iran is embarking upon, and that countries like Argentina, Australia and South Africa have recently announced plans to pursue.

Nuclear experts say indigenous production carries with it the risk of military diversion for nuclear arms, and that the risk is rising as a growing number of countries around the world embrace atomic power or plan to expand their nuclear programs.

"This pledge is an investment in a safer world," Mr. Buffett said in a statement.

"The concept of a backup fuel reserve has been discussed for many years," he said. "Its creation is inherently a governmental responsibility, but I hope that this pledge of funds will support governments in taking action to get this concept off the ground."

His pledge came at an international conference here in Vienna where nations are exploring how to create multinational fuel banks as a way to aid nuclear development while avoiding new risks.

Mr. Buffett's pledge is meant to jump-start the creation of a reserve fuel bank run by the International Atomic Energy Agency, the global nuclear watchdog based in Vienna. He made it through the Nuclear Threat Initiative, a private group in Washington that he advises.

Sam Nunn, a former Democratic senator from Georgia and the group's chief executive, announced the $50 million pledge here, calling it a crucial step toward a new order that enhances peaceful aspects of atomic energy. "We are in a race between cooperation and catastrophe," he said, "and, at this moment, the outcome is unclear."

Mr. Nunn said a country's decision to import fuel, rather than make it indigenously, could pivot on whether the country can be guaranteed an assured supply.

"We believe that such a mechanism can be achieved," he said, "and that we must take urgent, practical steps to do so."

Mr. Buffett's pledge is contingent on two years of developments in which the nuclear agency moves to establish the fuel bank and one or more countries contribute an added $100 million or an equivalent amount in reactor fuel.

Mohamed ElBaradei, the director general of the international atomic agency, said Mr. Buffett's pledge "will provide urgent impetus to our efforts to establish mechanisms for nondiscriminatory, nonpolitical assurances of supply of fuel for nuclear power plants."

Laura Holgate, a vice president of the Nuclear Threat Initiative, said $150 million in fuel would represent less than 1 percent of that used globally each year, and would be enough to fuel a typical power reactor.

Buffett Offers $50 Million For Nuclear-Fuel Stockpile (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

WASHINGTON -- Billionaire investor Warren Buffett has offered to donate $50 million to help start a "last resort" international stockpile of nuclear-power-plant fuel for nations worried about sources of supply.

Mr. Buffett called it "an investment in a safer world" because it could encourage Iran and other nations to find alternatives to establishing their own expensive and risky uranium-enrichment programs. Enriching uranium to high levels produces an explosive metal that can be used to make nuclear weapons.

The proposal was welcomed by the head of the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna, the United Nations agency that would control the fuel stockpile. U.S. officials also supported the idea, which has been discussed since the U.S. launched its "Atoms for Peace" program in the early 1950s.

Former U.S. Sen. Sam Nunn, who announced the proposal and Mr. Buffett's financial backing in Vienna, said "we're at a stage now where a number of nations may be getting close to starting their own [nuclear] fuel cycles." The case of Iran is in the headlines, he noted, but other nations are worried about soaring costs of importing nuclear fuel for electricity generation and the possibility that political problems with supplier countries might shut down their nuclear-power plants.

Mr. Nunn said the terms of Mr. Buffett's donation require IAEA nations to contribute $100 million to help build the stockpile. The IAEA would set up and maintain the fuel reserve.

Uranium-enrichment programs are politically and strategically touchy. The process of enrichment, which concentrates the unstable uranium isotope U-235, can be used to make power-plant fuel, which is enriched to a level of about 4%. The same process, however, can also produce nuclear weapons materials if the enrichment goes above 90%.

Mohamed ElBaradei, director general of the IAEA, said he welcomed the "generosity" of Mr. Buffett. The reserve, he said, is "intended to be a mechanism of last resort" to assure nations that if they abide by their treaty obligations not to start nuclear-weapons programs, that they will always have access to nuclear fuel.

Currently, companies in the U.S. and five other nations supply the world's nuclear fuel. The international agency is also working with the companies on agreements that would provide buyer nations with an uninterrupted supply -- if they refrain from making nuclear weapons.

Group Pledges $50M For Nuclear Fuel (AP-Y)

By Ben Evans

AP, September 20, 2006

Billionaire investor Warren Buffett, CNN creator Ted Turner and former Sen. Sam Nunn pledged $50 million to the U.N.'s nuclear watchdog agency Tuesday to create a uranium stockpile.

The aim is to discourage countries from developing their own nuclear programs. The reserve would ensure supplies of low-grade fuel for nuclear power plants around the world. One example of a program they hope to discourage is in Iran, which critics fear is ultimately aimed at developing weapons.

The Washington-based Nuclear Threat Initiative is hoping its financial pledge to the International Atomic Energy Agency will prod governments into action on creating the stockpile. Buffett would provide the money, which is contingent on a $100 million match from IAEA member states.

"Under international law and under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, countries have the right to enrich nuclear fuel," Nunn, a Georgia Democratic senator from 1972 to 1996, said in a telephone interview from Vienna, where he announced the proposal at a 140-country IAEA annual conference. "If we have a lot more countries that do that — and we're on the threshold of that now — then it's going to be an extremely dangerous world."

"It's going to be very difficult to keep that weapons-grade material out of the hands of someone who might use it as a weapon, like a terrorist group," Nunn said.

Western leaders are currently locked in a standoff with Iran over its uranium enrichment, which the country says is for civilian power but that the United States and others warn is intended to make weapons.

Nunn said an international reserve might not have deterred Iran. But it would give the international community more leverage in addressing the situation, he said.

"It would certainly be a powerful tool in the hands of the international community, saying, 'You don't need your own nuclear fuel supply. You have this available,'" Nunn said.

Nunn, who founded the anti-proliferation group with Turner, said the State Department expressed support for the plan but that "there's a difference between welcoming it and putting up money." He acknowledged that rallying the international community around the proposal would be difficult.

A State Department spokeswoman said she could not immediately comment on the proposal.

With Premier At U.N., Thai Military Stages Coup (NYT)

By Seth Mydans And Thomas Fuller

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

BANGKOK, Wednesday, Sept. 20 — In Thailand's first coup in 15 years, military leaders seized control of Bangkok on Tuesday night, suspended the Constitution and declared martial law in the capital, effective immediately.

There were no reports of violence.

The moves came while Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra was in New York preparing to address the United Nations. He declared a state of emergency on Thai television, but was cut off in mid-speech. Later, he canceled his address to the General Assembly.

The coup, led by the army chief, Gen. Sondhi Boonyaratkalin, also "terminated" both houses of Parliament, the cabinet and the Constitutional Court.

The events on Tuesday returned Thailand to a time that most experts here thought was finally past, raising questions about the future of Thai democracy and the stability of a country that is a prime tourist destination with strong economic links to the West.

The coup came at the height of a drawn-out political crisis. In April, Mr. Thaksin was forced by huge street protests to step aside despite an overwhelming electoral mandate. In fact, though, he continued to lead the government and to wage political battles against his opponents.

After a long break, demonstrations against the prime minister had been due to resume this week, bringing with them the danger of violent clashes between his supporters and opponents.

Late Tuesday night, General Sondhi was shown on television in an audience with King Bhumibol Adulyadej, a clear indication that the highly revered constitutional monarch endorsed the move.

On a military-controlled television station, a general in civilian clothes said a "council of administrative reform" had seized power in the name of the king.

Speaking for General Sondhi, who has publicly feuded with the prime minister, Gen. Prapas Sakultanak said that the military did not intend to rule the country and that it would "hand power back to the people." He gave no timetable.

The military has a long history of political involvement, staging 18 coups since Thailand became a constitutional monarchy in 1932. The last one, in 1991, installed a military leader who was pushed from power by a popular uprising the next year.

Under heavy rain, tanks and armored personnel carriers took up positions blocking the entrance to the prime minister's office on Tuesday night. Other tanks arrived at government offices and major intersections. Witnesses reported that roadblocks had been set up on roads leading into the city. The streets were quiet, and even at the prime minister's office there was little tension. Some bystanders photographed one another standing near the tanks.

Kitichai Songkeattisi, 40, a commercial photographer, said: "The last time was much more intense. People were more afraid."

Mr. Thaksin is one of the most popular — and unpopular — prime ministers in recent Thai history. Thais' different viewpoints demonstrate a sharp social divide that he has played on during the crisis.

Mr. Thaksin's party, Thai Rak Thai, or Thais Love Thais, has won three elections by landslides, in 2001, 2005 and again in April. Because of his broad support among rural voters, he was widely expected to win any new election.

But as he has tightened his grip over much of the political scene, opposition to him has swelled among the elite, mostly in Bangkok. Public indignation rose after his family's tax-free sale of its $1.9 billion stake in a giant telecommunications company to a Singapore company.

On television, the military spokesman, General Prapas, accused Mr. Thaksin of corruption and constant interference with the legislature and the courts. He apologized to the public for any inconvenience caused by the coup.

In an effort to end the demonstrations and reassert control, Mr. Thaksin called an early election in April, which he won in a landslide. But the opposition boycotted the vote and a court annulled the result, in a severe setback for the prime minister.

An election commission loyal to Mr. Thaksin set a new vote for Oct. 15, but its members were removed and jailed by a court for malfeasance. A new commission has said that election would be delayed.

The televised announcement on Tuesday was made after reports of large-scale military movements around the capital. The military has been sharply divided between officers loyal to the prime minister — some of them his relatives — and others who oppose him.

There has been tension over an impending military shuffle that would determine which faction would dominate.

Interviewed in New York by CNN soon after early reports of a coup, Deputy Prime Minister Surakiart Sathirathai said, "We hope that the situation should return to normal soon because the prime minister is constitutionally and legally elected prime minister and this is an elected government, so we have to do everything we can to uphold the principle of democracy."

"The government's performance destroyed harmony in society," he said. "Everyone tried to win over each other, and the situation continued to worsen. Most people don't trust the government because there are many signs of corruption."

He said the prime minister had hobbled independent bodies created by the 1997 Constitution to provide checks and balances. A leading demand of the prime minister's opponents is the writing of a new constitution that would temper executive power.

General Prapas said many attempts had been made at compromise but had failed. "That is why we, the Party for the Reform of Governance under the Constitutional Democracy, which consists of the army commanders and national police commander, have to seize power."

He added: "We would like to insist that we have no intention of governing the country. We will return the power of constitutional monarchy back to Thai people as soon as possible to maintain peace and stability."

Thai Army Vows To Return Power To The People (FT)

By Amy Kazmin

Financial Times, September 20, 2006

Thai army chief General Sondhi Boonyaratkalin promised on Wednesday to return power to the people after the armed forces ousted Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra in a coup.

DOJ_NMG_0066023

"The council has no intention to run the country by ourselves and will return power under the constitutional monarchy to the people as soon as possible," said General Sondhi, who spoke on national television flanked by four other leaders of the Political Reform Council that seized power Tuesday night.

General Sondhi said the ousted government was tainted with corruption and cronyism.

"The reform council that consists of the Armed Forces Supreme Commander, the chiefs of the armed forces, and the chief of police jointly took the view that rule by the caretaker government created extreme divisions in the Thai society as never seen before," he said.

"The government's rule was widely tainted with corruption and to benefit cronies. Letting that situation continue could have hurt the nation's security and economy.''

General Sondhi sat beside military leaders including Supreme Commander Ruangroj Mahasaranon, Royal Thai Navy Chief Sathiraphan Keyanont, and Royal Thai Air Force Chief Chalit Pukbhasuk, as well as the country's police chief.

"We have seized power. The constitution, the Senate, the House of Representatives, the Cabinet and the Constitutional Court have all been terminated," the army chief said.

"We agreed that the caretaker prime minister has caused an unprecedented rift in society, widespread corruption, nepotism, and interfered in independent agencies, crippling them so they cannot function," he said. "If the caretaker government is allowed to govern it will hurt the country.

"They have also repeatedly insulted the king. Thus the council needed to seize power to control the situation, to restore normalcy and to create unity as soon as possible."

A military spokesman said earlier that General Sondhi, who is said to be close to the country's revered King Bhumibol Adulyadej, would serve as acting prime minister.

The dramatic developments marked the culmination of a year of political turmoil reflecting deep divisions in Thai society over the leadership of Mr Thaksin, a billionaire telecommunications tycoon who is revered by the rural poor but disliked by urban residents.

With Mr Thaksin in New York for the UN General Assembly, tanks surrounded Government House, took control of television stations and announced martial law – the latest in a long series of military intervention in Thai political life, but the first in 15 years. A military spokesman said troops had met no resistance, and the coup appeared to be bloodless.

From New York Mr Thaksin, who won a landslide re-election victory in 2005, had declared a state of emergency in Bangkok, after rumours of an imminent coup swept the city. He ordered troops "not to move illegally".

After the announcement that the military had taken power, a spokesman for Mr Thaksin's administration said they were "still in control". However, analysts said the coup-makers appeared to have their grip firmly on the reins of power.

The Thai ambassador to Washington, Virasakdi Futrakul, said Mr Thaksin was preparing to leave the United States following the coup, after cancelling plans to give a speech at the UN General Assembly. He did not say where the prime minister would go.

Tom Kruesopon, a member of ruling party and an advisor to Mr Thaksin, said "the prime minister has not given up his power. He is not seeking asylum."

Mr Kruesopon said he believed Mr Thaksin could make a stopover in London, where he has family and a home. He still has an official plane at his disposal in New York.

Government offices, banks and the stock market were closed in Thailand on Wednesday. In offshore trade, the baht weakened on the political uncertainty. The currency dropped 1.2 per cent to 37.72 to the dollar at around 9:00 am in Bangkok from 37.26 in late Asia trade Tuesday. Fitch Ratings and Standard & Poor's put Thailand's credit ratings on review for possible downgrade.

Some businesses were shuttered in Bangkok, and foreign car manufacturers such as Japan's Nissan Motor Co, one of hundreds of investors in Thailand's export-driven economy, said they had halted operations for a day. However, the city remained calm and quiet, with Bangkok's notorious traffic jams alleviated by the holiday announcement.

Thailand's military has a history of coups, but many Thais had though such interventions to be largely a thing of the past. However, the Thai army has been bitterly divided over Mr Thaksin's leadership.

Long-simmering public resentment in Bangkok over his authoritarian style boiled over into mass demonstrations in January. In a bid to defuse tensions, Mr Thaksin called an election. However, the opposition parties boycotted the April polls, which were subsequently annulled.

Fresh elections, in which the opposition had already agreed to participate, were expected take place in the second half of November.

Thai Coup Sparks Condemnation, Unease (AP)

By Rod Mcguirk, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 20, 2006

The military overthrow of Thai Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra and the declaration of martial law in the Southeast Asian nation triggered condemnation, unease and uncertainty in Asian nations.

Governments across the Asia-Pacific region issued warnings to their citizens to rethink traveling to Thailand, a major tourist center, where tanks and troops now lined the streets of the capital, Bangkok.

"To see democracy destroyed in that way is a matter for grave concern to us," Australia's Foreign Minister Alexander Downer said. "It's unacceptable for the military just to overthrow a government in this way."

New Zealand also decried the military overthrow, with Prime Minister Helen Clark saying: "New Zealand condemns any process which seeks to overturn a government by unconstitutional and undemocratic means,"

Japan's Foreign Minister Taro Aso called the coup regrettable.

"We strongly hope the situation returns to normal and democracy is restored as soon as possible," Aso said.

The coup occurred without bloodshed after months of political turmoil and sharp criticism that Thaksin had eroded Thailand's democracy.

"It's really too early to form any hardened judgments," Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill told The Associated Press in Washington. U.S. State Department said officials "are monitoring the situation with concern."

Coup Attempt In Thailand (WT/AP)

By Grant Peck, Associated Press

2:34 p.m.

BANGKOK -- The Thai military initiated a coup against Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra today, circling his offices with tanks, seizing control of TV stations and declaring a provisional authority pledging loyalty to the king.

An announcement on Thai television declared that a Council of Administrative Reform with King Bhumibol Adulyadej as head of state had seized power in Bangkok and nearby provinces without any resistance.

A convoy of four tanks rigged with loudspeakers and sirens rolled through a busy commercial district warning people to get off the street for their own safety.

A senior military official, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the situation, said the army´s commander in chief, Gen. Sondhi Boonyaratkalin, had used the military to take over power from the prime minister.

Mr. Thaksin has faced calls to step down amid accusations of corruption and abuse of power.

Massive rallies earlier this year forced Mr. Thaksin to dissolve parliament and call an election in April, three years ahead of schedule. The vote was boycotted by opposition parties and later annulled by Thailand's top courts, leaving the country without a working legislature.

Mr. Thaksin's Thai Rak Thai Party twice won landslide election victories, in 2001 and 2005, and had been expected to win the next vote on Oct. 15, bolstered by its widespread support in the country's rural areas.

In 1992, demonstrators against a military strongman were gunned down before the king stepped in to end the fighting and usher in a period of stability.

Mr. Thaksin had said yesterday that he might step down as leader of the country after upcoming elections but that he would remain at the helm of his party, despite calls for him to give up the post.

Tonight, several hundred soldiers were deployed at government installations and major intersections in the capital of Bangkok.

Army-owned TV Channel 5 interrupted regular broadcasts with patriotic music and showed pictures of the king. At least some radio and television stations monitored in Bangkok suspended programming.

The cable television station of the Nation newspaper reported that tanks were parked at the Ratchadamnoen Road and royal plaza close to the royal palace and government offices.

"The prime minister, with the approval of the Cabinet, declares serious emergency law in Bangkok from now on," Mr. Thaksin said on Channel 9 from New York. He said he was ordering the transfer of the nation's army chief to work in the prime minister's office, effectively suspending him from his military duties.

Mr. Thaksin's critics want to jettison his policies promoting privatization, free-trade agreements and CEO-style administration.

Opposition to Mr. Thaksin gained momentum in January when his family announced it had sold its controlling stake in the telecommunications company Shin Corp. to Singapore's state-owned Temasek Holdings for a tax-free $1.9 billion. Critics say the sale involved insider trading and complain that a key national asset is now in foreign hands.

Thai Army Leaders Depose Prime Minister (WP)

By Ron Corben

The Washington Post, September 20, 2006

BANGKOK, Sept. 20 -- Thai army leaders deposed Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra, a longtime ally of President Bush, using tanks and soldiers to seize the capital Tuesday night without firing a shot. The coup was the first in 15 years in a country where many people believed that military seizures of power were a thing of the past.

Thaksin was in New York, attending the opening of the U.N. General Assembly, when soldiers surrounded Government House, his office, at about 10:30 p.m. He declared a state of emergency by telephone, but his announcement, carried on television, was cut off midway and had no discernible effect as army units seized key facilities in a light rain.

Thaksin canceled a planned address to the General Assembly. On Tuesday night, he remained secluded in a New York hotel, with some sources saying he would leave for an undisclosed location, probably not Thailand.

Bush has made the spread of democratic rule abroad a key theme of his administration. It remained unclear what response the U.S. government would take to the overthrow of an elected figure whom Bush called a "very capable leader" in 2003. In recent months, White House officials have been distancing themselves from Thaksin.

"We look to the Thai people to resolve their political differences in a peaceful manner and in accord with the principles of democracy and rule of law," said Fred Jones, spokesman for the National Security Council.

In Thailand, announcements on state-run television signed by the coup leader, Gen. Sonthi Boonyaratkalin, commander in chief of the army, said that martial law had been declared across Thailand and that the 1997 constitution had been revoked.

On Wednesday, in his first public appearance since seizing power, Sonthi asked for the public's support and declared the coup was necessary to end serious conflicts within Thai society that Thaksin had created, the Associated Press reported.

Delivering a television address in front of portraits of Thailand's king and queen, Sonthi said the coup leaders had no intention of retaining power. He was flanked by chiefs of the three armed services and the head of the national police.

The stock exchange was to be closed Wednesday, along with schools, banks and government offices.

Thaksin, a former senior police official who built a fortune in the telecommunications industry, has faced street protests for much of the year over allegations of corruption, abuse of power and a bungling response to a Muslim insurgency. Many military officers contended that he was trying to interfere with promotions and postings in the armed forces.

Opponents of the prime minister cheered the coup; some of them turned out in the early morning to greet soldiers sitting atop tanks parked on Bangkok streets. Thaksin is widely popular in rural Thailand, where most of the population lives, and there was little immediate response from those communities.

Sonthi and other coup leaders are close to Thailand's deeply revered King Bhumibol Adulyadej. What role, if any, the monarch played in the takeover was unknown. Some of the coup soldiers sported cloths of yellow, the royal color, and gun barrels in an attempt to signal they were acting in support of the king.

Reports said coup leaders had met with the king in his palace. In past political crises, a few words from the king, the world's longest-reigning monarch, have dramatically turned the course of events.

Panitan Wattanayagorn, a political scientist, said he had been fearful in the initial hours that troops loyal to Thaskin might fight back. Concerns of bloodshed subsided as no such opposition appeared.

Army TV gave the first sign that something was afoot when it began broadcasting patriotic songs and images of the king.

But a government spokesman denied that Thaksin was no longer head of the government. "At this moment, he is still the prime minister. I just talked to a senior party member and everyone confirms that Thaksin is still prime minister," Susasanee Nakpong told the Associated Press.

In New York, Deputy Prime Minister Surakiart Sathirathai condemned the coup. Thaksin "is constitutionally and legally elected prime minister," he told CNN. "And this is an elected government. . . . If there's going to be any change, it has to be through the democratic means, and we have upcoming elections anyway in November, so we should listen to the voice of the people."

The coup is the 18th successful or attempted military takeover in Thailand since the country became a constitutional monarchy in 1932. But in the 1990s, the military stepped back from this role as democratic institutions began to take root in the country.

As recently as this weekend, Thaksin denied that a coup was in the making. "As far as I know, there's no such movement for the time being," he told a gathering in Finland, according to the Nation newspaper.

Thaksin and his Thais Love Thais party won a resounding victory in 2005 elections, securing 374 of 500 seats in the House of Representatives. But he soon found himself in a political crisis.

Street protests that had begun with a murmur late last year found voice in January after Thaksin's family sold its shares in Shin Corp., a telecommunications and satellite company, to Singapore's Temasak Holdings for $1.9 billion, tax-free.

Thaksin sought to counter demands for his resignation by calling early elections in April, only to see them boycotted by the opposition parties. Eventually, King Bhumibol called on the courts to "clear up the mess," and the judges nullified the vote.

Sen. Kraisak Choonhavan, whose late father, Gen. Chatichai Choonhavan, was ousted as prime minister in the last successful coup in 1991, said the new takeover was "unfortunate . . . but it seems as if it was inevitable. And I think the key to understand in this event is probably Mr. Thaksin wants to take out the existing military hierarchy altogether and put his men in and have total control of Thailand."

Thaksin had been hoping that a recent military reshuffle and series of promotions would strengthen his hand, analysts said.

The military administrative council says it does not intend to hold on to power but will press ahead with general elections, possibly this year.

In an announcement on state TV, it said the army and national police had taken over Bangkok and the surrounding area to maintain peace and order. "There has been no struggle. We ask for the cooperation of the public and ask your pardon for the inconvenience," it said.

Coup Ousting Thailand's Premier Tests Democracy In Key U.S. Ally (WSJ)

By James Hookway, Patrick Barta And Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

An apparent coup in Thailand raises serious questions about the stability of a key U.S. ally in Asia that until recently had served as an anchor of democracy and investment in the region.

Amid a tropical downpour late yesterday in Bangkok, tanks moved on key government offices and television stations in the Thai capital and seized command of the city while the country's caretaker prime minister, Thaksin Shinawatra, was traveling in

New York. Government-run television stations said the armed forces and the police had taken control of the country, and a statement signed by the Thai army's commander in chief imposed martial law.

The seemingly bloodless coup, the outcome of which still is unclear, underscored longstanding questions about who runs Thailand, a country of 65 million people that is a favorite of Western tourists and companies despite its opaque governance. Thailand is known as a parliamentary democracy, and early this decade Mr. Thaksin became the first civilian prime minister to complete his term.

Many analysts believe the country still relies heavily on the powers of an aging and elusive king who is repeatedly invoked as the only true source of political legitimacy there. Whether the king played any role in the attempted change in government was unclear. A return to military rule would unwind years of progress toward a stable democracy.

Mr. Thaksin cancelled a speech he was scheduled to deliver at the United Nations last night. His spokesman, Surapong Suebwonglee, who was with Mr. Thaksin in New York, said the coup leaders "cannot succeed" and was confident the coup would fail "because democracy in Thailand has developed to some...measure of maturity." But in an interview with The Wall Street Journal on Monday, just hours before the coup began, Mr. Thaksin indicated the opposite, saying Thai democracy "is very young -- the system is not mature." He seemed relaxed and unfazed by rumors of a coup that were then swirling.

"I know there are those who really support me and those who are against me," Mr. Thaksin said.

As the coup unfolded, at least a dozen tanks surrounded Government House, Mr. Thaksin's office, but later withdrew. Thai television showed a motorcade of generals traveling along rain-slick streets to brief King Bhumibol Adulyadej on their coup. Other stations followed by broadcasting only patriotic music and announcements from the coup group. Many Thais that didn't turn on their televisions remained unaware that anything had even happened when they went to sleep last night.

The outcome of the latest power struggle is of vital importance to investors and Western governments. Although Thailand no longer is among the world's fastest-growing economies -- as it was in the 1980s -- it has emerged as an important staging ground for Western companies that don't want to place all their bets on China. This includes the world's largest auto makers, including Ford Motor Co., General Motors Corp. and Japan's Toyota Motor Corp., all of which have made the country a vital production platform.

Thailand's currency, the baht, suffered its biggest one-day weakening in three years yesterday. A large devaluation of the baht helped trigger the Asian financial crisis of 1997, highlighting Thailand's importance in the region, though many analysts believe Asia's economy is far healthier now, limiting any potential economic fallout. Thailand's stock exchange was scheduled to be closed today, along with schools, banks and government offices, the Associated Press reported. (See related article3.)

Thailand also is viewed as a critical hub in the U.S.-led war on terror. The American Embassy in Bangkok remains one of the largest U.S. missions in the world. The U.S. and Thailand run a joint counter-terrorism training center on the outskirts of Bangkok, called the International Law Enforcement Agency, which has been central to the Bush administration's efforts to combat Islamic extremism in the region.

Joint Thai and U.S. operations were successful in tracing suspected terrorist Riduan Isamuddin, also known as Hambali, to the city of Ayuthaya in central Thailand, where they arrested him in 2003. Mr. Isamuddin was a central suspect in the planning of the Bali, Indonesia, bombing of 2002 that killed more than 200 people.

The Bush administration said it was concerned about the military takeover and hoped for a democratic solution. "We continue to hope that the Thai people will resolve their political differences in accord with democratic principles and the rule of law," said U.S. State Department spokeswoman Nancy Beck.

The apparent coup came after nearly a year of political unrest in which Thais took to the streets to protest a government they increasingly viewed as corrupt and ineffective.

Protesters had a number of complaints about Mr. Thaksin, including his inability to settle an armed and violent separatist movement in the country's south. They also were upset over allegations of corruption related to his family's $1.9 billion sale of a telecommunications company to Singaporean investors this year. The sale was arranged in such a way that enabled the family to avoid paying taxes on the transaction.

The sale enraged many Thais. Many already had accused Mr. Thaksin, one of Thailand's richest men, of abusing his power in government to boost his wealth and weaken democratic institutions, including the country's courts.

Mr. Thaksin dissolved the government and called a new election in April to restore his mandate. Key opposition parties boycotted the vote amid continued street protests, and the country seemed rudderless until the king questioned the validity of the April election in a public address, calling on courts to settle the issue.

Thai courts subsequently invalidated the results, in which Mr. Thaksin's Thai Rak Thai party won the majority of seats in Parliament. Mr. Thaksin subsequently took the role of caretaker prime minister pending a new election that was expected later this year. A number of analysts of Thailand believed Mr. Thaksin's party would again win the national elections, possibly explaining the timing of the Thai military's move.

Mr. Thaksin, who has served as Thailand's leader since 2001, remains extremely popular with many Thais, especially in rural areas, for a series of populist measures that included cash payouts to small villages and subsidized health care.

He also gained favor with foreign investors by promoting an economic program to boost Thailand's economy in the face of growing competition from China. This program, which many economists viewed as a template for other, similar countries dealing with the rise of China, included efforts to privatize state companies, to negotiate free-trade pacts with other countries, including the U.S. and Japan, and to authorize large investments in new infrastructure.

Many of those initiatives -- including some of the free-trade deals -- have languished this year while the government was paralyzed by political stalemate. Meanwhile, many Thais believe the king and his supporters were disenchanted with Mr. Thaksin's attempts to aggressively consolidate his power.

Political analysts say the tacit support of King Bhumibol is necessary for any individual or group that aspires to govern Thailand. The 78-year-old monarch has frequently played a political role, implicitly signing off on military coups at times, most notably in 1976, and intervening to ensure the return of civilian governments, as in 1992.

His annual birthday speeches are carefully examined in Bangkok. In 2002, he published a biography of his favorite pet dog, a stray mongrel rescued from the streets of Bangkok, that was widely interpreted as a warning that Thailand shouldn't abandon its traditional values in a quickly modernizing world.

It is considered inappropriate for Thais to speak publicly about the king's possible role in politics, and on Monday, Mr. Thaksin denied suggestions that the king was involved in any of the recent political dramas.

"One should not bring him into politics," he said.

Nevertheless, in June Mr. Thaksin said a "charismatic person" was out to remove him from his job as prime minister. Mr. Thaksin went on to say that a mysterious figure whom he refused to name was "wielding extraconstitutional force" to push him from office.

Most Thais assumed that to mean the king or his chief lieutenant, Gen. Prem Tinsulanonda. By appearing to attack the monarch and his supporters, Mr. Thaksin escalated the economically damaging political conflict into a contest between Thailand's royal and military traditions, and a new, more modern way of governing a rapidly industrializing country.

King Bhumibol's advisers struck back with a show of force. Donning his military uniform, chief adviser Gen. Prem toured army camps around the country warning soldiers that their loyalty is to the king, not Mr. Thaksin.

Other people seen as close to the royal palace gave prominent speeches in recent weeks that were interpreted as critical of Mr. Thaksin's push to modernize the Thai economy and open it up to more foreign investment.

Seizing on that sentiment, local shopkeepers across the country have petitioned the king and the government in recent weeks to block big foreign-owned hypermarkets, such as Tesco PLC of the U.K. and Carrefour SA of France, that are sprouting up across Thailand and taking away their business.

These tensions came to a boiling point last night. An announcement on Thai television declared that a "Council of Administrative Reform" with King Bhumibol as head of state had seized power in Bangkok and nearby provinces without any resistance.

A separate announcement on national television, signed by Army Commander in Chief Gen. Sondhi Boonyaratkalin, said martial law had been declared across Thailand and the country's 1997 Constitution revoked. The general, a Muslim in the overwhelmingly Buddhist country, ordered all troops to report to their duty stations and not leave without permission from their commanders.

"The armed forces commander and the national police commander have successfully taken over Bangkok and the surrounding area in order to maintain peace and order. There has been no struggle," the announcement said.

The military coup didn't meet any initial resistance in Bangkok, although it wasn't clear whether there were any confrontations elsewhere in Thailand.

Mr. Thaksin tried to put the brakes on the coup before it took effect. He telephoned a Thai television station from New York to declare a state of emergency and ordered Gen. Sondhi to report to Mr. Thaksin's deputy, effectively stripping Gen. Sondhi of his power. After 10 minutes, Mr. Thaksin's voice cut off.

A spokesman for the coup, retired Lt. Gen. Prapart Sakuntanak said on Thai television that the power grab was temporary and that power soon would be returned to the people. Some observers said they suspected the military doesn't want to control the country, only to remove Mr. Thaksin.

"Never in Thai history have the people been so divided," Lt. Gen. Prapart said. "The majority of people had become suspicious of this administration, which is running the country through rampant corruption. Independent bodies have been interfered with so much they could not perform within the spirit of the constitution."

A U.S. official who has worked on Thai issues added that the White House would be inclined to take a relatively aggressive stance against a Thai coup, due to President Bush's stated commitment to promoting democracy in the Middle East and Asia. "We're trying to build democracy around the world, and we're just going to stand by" while there are tanks on the streets? the official said. "You could imagine the snickering in the region."

Some officials working on Thailand worry that the Bush administration, absorbed with crises in Lebanon and Iraq, didn't offer signals early enough that Washington would be opposed to a coup. Now, they say, the White House will likely have to work aggressively through the Thai monarchy to restore the democratic process, though they note that it might be too late for Mr. Thaksin's government.

Weathering Thailand's Storm (WSJ)

By Karen Richardson

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

Uncertainty over the outcome of an apparent military coup in Thailand is likely to roil Thai stocks during the next few days, though analysts said it is unlikely to spill over into other major Asian markets.

As tanks and troops surrounded government offices in the Thai capital of Bangkok last night -- part of an effort to oust Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra -- foreign investors in the Southeast Asian country said they hoped for a smooth and swift resolution to the crisis. "Unless we have a tremendous amount of clarity, that first trading session is likely to be very sloppy and very volatile," said Uri Landesman, senior portfolio manager of a $300 million fund that invests globally at ING Investment Management in New York. It wasn't clear when trading would resume, however, as the armed forces declared Wednesday a government, bank and market "holiday."

The main SET index closed 0.47% lower at 702.56 yesterday before the coup. The SET is home to Bangkok Bank and Siam Cement, mainstays of many foreign portfolios invested in Thailand.

A rout in Thai stocks is unlikely to significantly affect the portfolios of international emerging-market investors who construct their portfolios to hew closely to the Morgan Stanley Capital International Emerging Markets Index, which is widely used by emerging-market fund managers. Thailand makes up 1.65% of that index.

The country's baht currency -- the devaluation of which helped send Asia into financial turmoil in 1997 -- fell in its biggest one-day decline in three years, weighing on other Asian currencies. The baht weakened to 37.764 from 37.286 against the dollar.

Emerging-market bonds were slightly rattled by the news. Thailand's $2.1 billion in investment-grade sovereign debt makes up just 0.21% of the J.P. Morgan Emerging Markets Bond Global Diversified Index, widely used as a benchmark by professional investors. Fitch Ratings said it was reviewing the country's triple-B-plus foreign-currency debt rating for possible downgrade in light of the coup, but added Thailand has enough foreign-exchange reserves to handle "any shocks that may come."

Investors and traders didn't panic much. Credit-default swaps -- derivatives that provide insurance against the risk of bond defaults -- became more costly on news of the coup, jumping to $65,000 to protect against a default on $10 million of Thailand's sovereign bonds during the next five years from $37,000 yesterday morning. Later, the price retreated to $53,000, according to data from J.P. Morgan. "A coup is about as common there as an election is here," said Mr. Landesman of ING, who noted some 18 coups have occurred in Thailand in the past 75 years.

Aided by strong economic expansion driven by robust exports, consumer spending and foreign investment, Thai government coffers and Thai companies' balance sheets have strengthened since the Asian financial crisis. In the 1990s, Thailand and other Asian economies had large current-account deficits and exchange rates pegged to the U.S. dollar. These factors encouraged external borrowing, and led to high exposure by local companies and governments to foreign-exchange risk. When U.S. interest rates jumped, money swept out of Asian currencies, stocks and other assets, leaving their currencies devalued, stock markets in shambles and real estate near worthless.

"The last nine years have seen the emerging markets change their governance at both the corporate and government level," said Larry Smith, chief investment officer of Third Wave Global Investors LLC, which manages about $400 million in Greenwich, Conn. While Thai companies had poor financial governance and management before, now they are "in the business of making money," he said, adding that the return on equity for Thai stocks hovers at about 20% -- in the high end for emerging markets. Unlike the country's financial crisis in 1997, "I don't see the coup creating any type of contagion or systemic risk that's going to have an impact on other regions," he said.

Western investors in Thailand expect the coup to be positive for the market in the long term, particularly if it is bloodless and receives the blessing of Thailand's King Bhumibol Adulyadej. Mr. Landesman expects the Thai stock market to rally as much as 15% following a smooth transition of power.

Mr. Thaksin has come under fire by critics for cronyism and unpredictable government policies. Thailand has been run by a caretaker government since Mr. Thaksin in the first quarter dissolved Parliament for elections, which were held April 2. The results of the vote later were annulled because of irregularities. Free-trade talks with Japan and the U.S. are on hold until a new government can be elected.

Other Market Activity

European shares closed lower as long-term worries about interest rates offset short-term relief generated by tepid U.S. inflation data. Asian markets were flat ahead of today's U.S. Federal Reserve meeting.

In LONDON, the FTSE 100 index fell 58.40 points, or 1%, to 5831.80. Nuclear-power operator British Energy tumbled 8.3% after a warning about falling output.

In TOKYO, the Nikkei Stock Average edged up 7.35 points, or 0.1%,to 15874.28 following a three-day weekend. Hitachi dropped 2.3% after issuing a profit warning.

A Retrograde Coup In Thailand (NYT)

"Political troubles should be solved by politicians," the chief of Thailand's army wisely declared last March. "Military coups are a thing of the past." Regrettably, Gen. Sondhi Boonyaratkalin changed his mind yesterday, launching a coup against the prime minister, Thaksin Shinawatra, who was in New York, preparing to address the United Nations.

Mr. Thaksin, in power since 2001, has been a high-handed and controversial leader. Corruption charges swirl around his government and his multibillion-dollar family business empire. He has tried to muzzle press critics. And his inflammatory mishandling of a Muslim separatist campaign in the south has killed more than 1,000 civilians.

But removing him from office is a decision that belongs to Thailand's voters, not an ambitious army general. They would have had a chance to make that decision soon.

Mr. Thaksin won decisive electoral victories in 2001 and 2005. Balloting earlier this year was boycotted by the opposition and later declared invalid by the courts. Arrangements for a new vote were being worked out when the army intervened.

DOJ_NMG_0066031

Military power grabs have punctuated Thailand's recent history, and none have left the country better off. The best thing General Sondhi could do now is recall his wise words of six months ago and return power to the constitutional civilian leadership.

Turmoil In Thailand (LAT)

THERE HAD BEEN 17 MILITARY COUPS in Thailand since its absolute monarchy was abolished in 1932. Number 18 occurred Tuesday, when soldiers circled the offices of Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra with tanks, seized TV stations and declared martial law. The military claimed to be acting on behalf of the popular monarch, King Bhumibol Adulyadej.

Thaksin was in New York at the time to attend a session of the United Nations, and his future as Thai leader is now seriously in doubt. The coup could also jeopardize the recent stability and economic prosperity across Southeast Asia, traditionally among the most volatile regions in the world. Thailand has been an anchor to that stability, but now the restive foes of Thaksin are taking a huge step backward. It would be in the best interest of the country if its monarch took a page from the Spanish playbook and came out against the coup — as King Juan Carlos I did in 1981 — if he is free to do so.

Thaksin, a billionaire media mogul, is very popular in the rural north but widely despised in Bangkok. The first democratically-elected Thai prime minister to serve a full four-year term, he was first elected in 2001 and easily reelected in 2005. But urban voters, dissatisfied with Thaksin's control of the media, manipulation of democratic institutions, mishandling of a Muslim insurgency and other issues, held frequent protests against his regime.

Thaksin responded by holding snap elections in April, and won once again. But the election was boycotted by the minority party, leaving 38 parliamentary seats unfilled, and Thaksin wisely decided to step down. Then, after the courts declared the April election invalid, Thaksin returned to work as "caretaker" prime minister in a country without a parliament, while new elections were scheduled for this fall.

Thaksin bears some blame for his government's downfall. Had he made it clear that he wouldn't seek the premiership after the coming elections, opposition and turmoil in Bangkok would have died down. Had he not tried to interfere with military decisions, he wouldn't have created the fury among army leaders that may have prompted them to take action.

The coup could produce deep uncertainty at best and violent uprisings at worst, and it may threaten economies throughout the region. That's a heavy price to pay for one man's refusal to cede power and a refusal by his people to accept a concept taken for granted in more mature democracies: Sometimes in free elections, your side loses.

Paulson Spends Much Of Debut On World Stage Defending The U.S. (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

HANGZHOU, China, Sept. 19 — In his debut on the international stage, Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. faced three days of criticism and concern that the United States' fiscal and current-account deficits were casting a shadow over the global economy.

The issue of "global imbalances" came up again and again in Singapore in the language of speaker after speaker, as well as in the communiqué of the Group of 7 as its members conferred at the annual meeting of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund.

Mr. Paulson, who arrived in Hangzhou on Tuesday to meet local entrepreneurs before traveling to Beijing on Wednesday, did not seem bothered by the criticism. Economic relations between countries are "never easy," he said Monday.

In office a little more than two months, Mr. Paulson gamely made the arguments in response. He said the current-account deficit — nearly 7 percent of the United States economy — was a sign of strength, not weakness, because American consumers were buying global goods and keeping the world prosperous.

While Mr. Paulson acknowledged to reporters that the United States had room to improve, he saw its deficits as part of a bigger picture and part of a problem of imbalances in other countries.

"The U.S. has for a good number of years now been growing much faster than the major developed trading partners, Europe and Japan," he said, suggesting that as a faster-growing country, the United States would import more. "We've got a low savings rate, and it is a problem in the U.S." He also said the United States could "do more on deficits."

But he said that for the imbalances to ease, Japan, China and Europe had to "get the kind of growth on the consumption side that's going to make a difference."

He refused to blame the policies of the Bush administration for the global problems. The United States is able to borrow heavily from around the world, he said, because investors regard United States debt instruments as secure and United States policies, like maintaining tax cuts, as sound.

As for the nation's budget deficit, Mr. Paulson said it was coming down, citing recent revenue figures. For the future, he promised that he would personally help the Bush administration tackle the exploding costs of Medicare, Social Security and Medicaid in the next two years.

And to those in Singapore who said the United States was saving too little, Mr. Paulson said China was saving too much.

He did not say any of these things in a combative way. He sought to parry the criticism of American policies by suggesting that all countries, not just the United States, needed to put their houses in order.

Others echoed that theme, as when Jean-Claude Trichet, president of the European Central Bank, said at a news conference that all the participants in Singapore had "homework" to do to avert threats to the world economy.

The homework that Europe needs to do, Mr. Paulson said, is structural reform, like lifting regulations, taxes and labor restrictions that will allow business to grow and import more.

His prescription for China was similar. In addition to saving less and consuming more, Mr. Paulson said, China needs to deregulate its economy and, most important, let the value of its currency fluctuate against the dollar and the euro, so that a new balance could be struck in which Chinese exports are more expensive and China imports more.

In addition to criticism of the United States current account and budget deficits, Mr. Paulson heard complaints about American trade policies and Washington's responsibility for disputed practices at the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund.

By all accounts, Mr. Paulson, who took office in July, moved comfortably in Singapore. Many of his counterparts were friends from his years as the head of Goldman Sachs.

He also seemed to understand that when representatives of 184 countries get together, criticism of the United States is often what most of them can agree on. This time the criticism seemed especially focused, but at the same time a main worry was that the United States economy might slow, imperiling the future for everyone else.

"I am not looking for any immediate solutions or quick fixes to any particular economic issue," Mr. Paulson said in Singapore. "I'm looking to set a tone and an expectation of working through issues and making progress."

On trade, the Suntec Center in Singapore, where thousands of officials gathered, echoed with calls for leadership to revive the world trade negotiations that collapsed this summer. But most delegates aimed their appeals at the United States, over its refusal to offer more concessions to revive the talks.

Even a revolt among board members at the World Bank over the anticorruption campaign of its president, Paul D. Wolfowitz, reflected many bank officials' resentment at President Bush for choosing Mr. Wolfowitz, an architect of the Iraq war, to lead the institution.

A leader in the fight against Mr. Wolfowitz's policies, for instance, was a close associate of Gordon Brown, the British chancellor of the exchequer and a likely successor to Prime Minister Tony Blair. Bank officials said Mr. Brown seemed to be trying to show that, presumably unlike Mr. Blair, he could stand up to Washington.

But Mr. Paulson did leave with a major victory. The Singapore gathering demonstrated that the United States had successfully rallied the world's economic players around a policy of trying to expand China's influence in the institutions that oversee the world economy, like the International Monetary Fund, and in pressing China to be a more responsible player on economic issues.

By Michael M. Phillips And Andrew Browne

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson's first meeting after arriving in China yesterday was with Xi Jinping, the Communist Party secretary for Zhejiang Province.

It wasn't because Mr. Xi is a national political figure, although Mr. Paulson considers him a rising star in a province that is an aggressive exporter to the U.S. It was because when the two met in New York City a few months ago, Mr. Paulson -- then chief executive of Goldman Sachs Group Inc. -- promised he'd drop by.

At Goldman, Mr. Paulson believed the key to doing business in China was building long-term relationships. At Treasury, he believes the same thing, putting his contacts to work for the U.S. government on an agenda that ranges from protecting American companies' intellectual property to trying to convince Beijing to relax its grip on the exchange value of the yuan. "These things generally take a bit of compromise, generally take patience and generally take listening as well as talking. And in the case of China it takes a process where you're talking to all of the right people," Mr. Paulson said before arriving in the garden city Hangzhou.

"I told you I would come," Mr. Paulson said as Mr. Xi greeted him at a lakeside guesthouse.

Treasury officials have long found Chinese decision-making opaque, as they struggled to figure out which bureaucrats and politicians really influence policy. They hope Mr. Paulson -- who made some 70 trips to China as an investment banker, tourist and environmental activist -- will bring Treasury something close to an insider's view.

The secretary himself drew up the list of people he wanted to see. Among them was President Hu Jintao, whom Mr. Paulson is slated to meet in Beijing this week -- something of a coup for a cabinet secretary in a protocol-conscious country. He was scheduled to meet, as well, with Finance Minister Jin Renqing and Ma Kai, head of the National Development and Reform Commission, which sets China's energy policy.

Also on his schedule is Beijing Mayor Wang Qishan, who bonded with Mr. Paulson during the 2003 SARS crisis. The previous mayor had been fired for covering up the epidemic, and Mr. Wang took the job, desperate to show Beijing was safe. He asked Mr. Paulson if he would be willing to help out -- by making a public visit to the city. Mr. Paulson immediately got on a plane to China.

Mr. Paulson has a proven record in doing business with China. He helped pull off a coup in 2004 with an innovative plan that enabled Goldman Sachs to get around strict ownership rules and establish control over a full-service Chinese brokerage firm and investment bank. No other foreign investment bank has managed to achieve that.

The argument he used to clinch the deal, according to people familiar with the situation, was that it was in China's best interests because Goldman would help raise standards in a securities industry Beijing is striving to clean up.

That's the tack U.S. officials have taken with China for some time. They argue that by allowing more flexibility in the yuan's exchange rate, Beijing will give itself more leeway to adjust interest rates and control its own economy. The Chinese government is now struggling to rein in investment that is leading to runaway growth and threatening another boom-bust cycle.

Mr. Paulson's comments on the yuan so far have been measured.

But having barely set foot in China, Mr. Paulson was already coming under pressure to speed things along. "Secretary Paulson's repeated efforts to lowball expectations just before beginning negotiations with the Chinese represent a major tactical and strategic mistake," U.S. Business and Industry Council President Kevin L. Kearns said in a written release yesterday. "His claims that Chinese reforms 'will take time,' and his criticisms of 'quick fixes,' inevitably tell Beijing that it can keep stonewalling with impunity."

Sens. Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat, and Lindsey Graham, a Republican from South Carolina, have asked for a Senate vote on a bill that would impose 27.5% tariffs on all imports from China, in retaliation for the alleged advantage an undervalued yuan gives to Chinese businesses.

Aside from the currency, analysts predict Mr. Paulson will push the interests of international financial-services companies, which he sees as necessary for economic growth.

Mr. Paulson has made a point of pooh-poohing expectations that he will make concrete headway on specific economic issues during his four-day China trip. Rather, he has said he is trying to set the tone and build relationships for slower, more-durable gains.

The personal touch seemed to get the attention of Mr. Xi. "We treasure your friendship," he told Mr. Paulson before the two men strolled together through the lush gardens around the guesthouse, the same complex where Richard Nixon stayed during his groundbreaking visit in 1972.

"He's the kind of guy who knows how to get over the goal line," Mr. Paulson said after their meeting.

Two Chinese Warships Visit San Diego (LAT)

By Tony Perry And Mark Magnier

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2006

SAN DIEGO — Under a clear blue sky Monday, two Chinese warships slipped peacefully into San Diego Bay, a sign of some warming in the sometimes chilly relationship between the two countries.

The arrival of the guidedmissile cruiser Qingdao and the oiler Hongzehu marked the third visit of Chinese ships to the West Coast — but the first since the 2001 incident in which a Navy surveillance plane collided with a Chinese fighter, forcing the U.S. plane to land on China's Hainan Island and requiring 11 days of diplomatic wrangling before the plane's crew was allowed to leave.

"With this visit, China and the United States have an important opportunity to develop and build through our sailors relationships for cooperation in maintaining a peaceful and stable region," Rear Adm. Len Hering, commander of Navy Region Southwest, said as the ships docked at the 32nd Street Naval Station.

Three hundred members of the local Chinese community greeted the ships. The Navy Band was accompanied by the Chinese Navy Band.

China could have its first aircraft carrier by the end of this year, and Pentagon analysts have warned in recent years that China could present a major threat as its expanding "blue-water" navy increasingly is able to travel far from home. But the U.S. also may need Chinese cooperation in the United Nations to reign in the nuclear ambitions of Iran and North Korea.

In San Diego, the two Chinese ships are surrounded by carriers, destroyers and submarines. On Monday, a variety of U.S. warplanes screamed overhead.

When it comes to military relations with the United States, analysts said, China is more wary of exposing its weaknesses than of revealing its strengths.

"It's like a millionaire invites someone who only has a few dollars to enter into a partnership," said Ni Lexiong, a defense analyst and professor at the Shanghai Institute of Politics and Law. "The latter wouldn't accept it because he wouldn't have any real say in the partnership and might even risk what little money he does have."

The U.S., meanwhile, has every interest in fostering closer military relations in hopes that Chinese leaders will see America's overwhelming military superiority and convey their impressions back to their political leaders in Beijing — making them think twice about challenging the Pentagon, Lexiong said.

Chinese leaders have eased their reservations about improving relations with the U.S. in recent months as their confidence gradually improves, analysts say.

They also have a big interest in keeping overall bilateral relations on a good footing and don't want military issues to add strain at a time of economic friction and foreign policy differences over Iran and Sudan.

Better bilateral relations, in Beijing's view, would encourage Washington to restrain Taiwan, while military acrimony might spur conservatives in Washington to encourage Taiwan's pro-independence voices. "In a bid to improve its relations with the United States, China is now trying to actively spur these defense exchanges," said Jia Qingguo, vice dean of international studies at Peking University.

Since he assumed command last year of all U.S. forces in the Pacific, Adm. William Fallon has visited China three times, calling for greater transparency and reciprocity in the access each side receives.

In San Diego, crew members aboard the two ships will participate in a search-and-rescue training mission with U.S. ships. But first the crew members will enjoy some free time, including a visit to the San Diego Zoo and its pandas, on loan from China.

Powering China's Juggernaut: Truckers Hauling Coal (NYT)

By Jim Yardley

FUGU, China — Hunched over his steering wheel, Zhu Dexiu turned the key in the ignition as the engine rumbled awake and his coal truck lurched forward. The journey lasted about 30 feet. Then Mr. Zhu switched off the engine and waited for the next flurry of driving, maybe another 20 minutes off.

It was 2 p.m. His goal was to reach the inspection station here on the eastern border of Shaanxi Province by 10 p.m. All that stood in his way were other battered trucks carrying cinderblock-size chunks of coal destined for China's east. There were maybe a thousand of them.

The line was five miles long.

"We've been waiting in this line for 24 hours," complained Mr. Zhu, a green towel draped over his head and behind his ears as if he were a beleaguered Egyptian pharaoh. "We have no choice but to be patient."

Given China's status as the workshop of the world, and given that coal, more than anything, is powering that workshop, men like Mr. Zhu could be called the coal-truck drivers of the world. They carry the coal that powers the country's restaurants, office buildings and high-rises, as well as the factories that make cheap exports for the West.

They also spend hours, sometimes days, waiting in line, a small example of the epic scale, and epic inefficiency, of China's coal economy. The grimmest barometer of that inefficiency is not measured in hours wasted but in lives lost: nearly 6,000 coal miners died in accidents last year, often in illegal mines where owners sacrificed safety in the rush for profits.

But the journey of the coal driver is a reminder that often beneath the juggernaut of the Chinese economy are three guys squeezed into the cab of a filthy truck hauling coal, a trip multiplied daily by untold thousands. In this fashion — one restaurant, one shopping mall or one factory at a time — much of China gets its energy.

First, though, the drivers must get out of coal country in the autonomous region of Inner Mongolia and neighboring Shaanxi and Shanxi provinces. On a gray, drizzly afternoon in August, Mr. Zhu was part of a small caravan of trucks carrying 90 tons of coal to a karaoke bar and bathhouse in Baoding.

Mr. Zhu had collected his load a day earlier from a small mine in Shenmu, a major coal hub in northern Shaanxi. He estimated that the 260-mile trip to Baoding would take five days, including at least two at the inspection checkpoint in Fugu before he could cross the Yellow River and head east. For a poor province like Shaanxi, the toll collected there is like a tithe for every pebble of black gold leaving its borders: the fee for a ton of coal is about $7.

Drivers see the fee as just another shakedown. On a different morning, just south of the ancient city of Togtoh, in Inner Mongolia, a different caravan of about 20 coal trucks was parked on a roadside. They had sent a scout to a nearby traffic circle to check for a police officer with a reputation for dispensing dubious tickets.

"He's got to make his quotas," said one driver, smoking a cigarette as other drivers napped on the road beneath the shaded undercarriages of their trucks. The scout's job was to notify the other drivers when the officer broke for lunch so the caravan could beat it safely through town. "Otherwise," the driver said of the $6 ticket, "we could not make any money."

The inspection station in Fugu is an unavoidable bottleneck for the trucks heading east from the mines in Shenmu. Drivers spend so much time waiting that a floating commercial district has arisen on the roadside. Hawkers on bicycles and mopeds peddle Mao amulets, military magazines, spare keys, boiled eggs, noodles and fingernail clippers.

"Corn! Corn!" shouted a woman selling food from the back of one bike.

In their idle time, drivers play cards in the cramped cabs of their trucks or read magazines. Some compare waiting-in-line stories the way other men compare fish stories.

"The longest we had to wait was two weeks," Mr. Zhu said. "People set up restaurants beside the road."

Another driver in the convoy, Li Wenshun, said he once waited in a line that stretched more than 30 miles, all the way back to the mines in Shenmu.

"Before there was a road," mused Mr. Li, "there was a line."

For the Chinese government, bottlenecks in coal transportation are a critical issue partly blamed for power shortages in cities and factory districts along the southern coast. The government has responded by rapidly expanding railroad lines dedicated to coal and upgrading port facilities to expedite sea shipments of coal to power plants and factories in the south.

Experts say those improvements have begun to help ease the bottlenecks. But the demand for coal remains so insatiable that the more informal, and chaotic, network of truckers continues to play a vital role. Coal trucks seem to be everywhere. Anyone who has driven in China knows the not-always-comforting feeling of looking in the rear-view mirror and seeing a coal truck barreling closer.

Mr. Zhu said he now made the trip from Shenmu to Baoding about six times a month, earning about $600. Many of the drivers were once farmers who could not earn $600 in a year and are looking for a way out of rural poverty. "We have no choice," said another driver. "There is no other way out of the countryside."

On this trip, Mr. Zhu was traveling with a backup driver and his son, an apprentice driver who hopes to have his own coal truck one day. They sat patiently inside the cab as, every hour or so, coal trains whizzed by the paralyzed truck line.

"I like the lifestyle," said the son, Zhu Dongliang, 20. "There aren't that many jobs out there. This is good work."

If sometimes tedious: a few minutes later, the elder Mr. Zhu cranked up the engine and lurched forward another 30 feet. Then he turned it off.

Australia Announces Plan For Compromise In Global Trade Talks (WSJ/AP)

By Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

CAIRNS, Australia -- The 18-member Cairns Group of Pacific Rim and Asian nations launched a bid to intensify pressure on the U.S., Europe and Japan to give ground in global trade talks.

Host Australia announced a compromise it hopes will cut through the impasse on trade protection that is blocking the World Trade Organization's so-called Doha round.

But European Union Trade Commissioner Peter Mandelson, who didn't attend the Cairns meeting, already has rejected the proposal as "undoable."

The plan would require the EU to agree to better by 5% its offer to reduce farm tariffs and the U.S. to agree to cut subsidies by $5 billion, Australian Trade Minister Mark Vaile told Australian Broadcasting Corp. radio yesterday.

"We think that's a middle-ground position," Mr. Vaile said, though he conceded neither the EU nor Washington was on board with the idea.

The U.S.'s chief agricultural negotiator, Richard Crowder, told the Associated Press yesterday that Washington was "prepared to be flexible" on domestic subsidies, provided other countries made significant reductions in agricultural tariffs.

The Doha round talks were suspended in July over disagreements about agricultural subsidies and tariffs.

The Cairns Group members are Argentina, Australia, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Indonesia, Malaysia, New Zealand, Pakistan, Paraguay, the Philippines, South Africa, Thailand and Uruguay.

The group was formed in August 1986 to lobby for the removal of global farm trade barriers.

US Trade Representative Says Australian Trade Proposal "has Potential" (AP)

AP, September 20, 2006

CAIRNS, Australia U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab said Wednesday that a new proposal to break the current impasse in global trade talks "has potential."

Schwab said the proposal, under which the European Union would agree to better by 5 percent its offer to reduce farm tariffs, while the U.S. would agree to cut subsidies by US$5 billion (€3.9 billion), could help restart the stalled Doha round of World Trade Organization talks.

"I'm going to be very careful not to endorse any specific proposal, except to say that the Australian proposal, I think, is an important one," she told The Associated Press on the sidelines of a meeting of the 18-member Cairns Group of agricultural exporting nations.

Australia's Trade Minister Mark Vaile presented the proposed compromise this week, but the EU's Trade Commissioner Peter Mandelson immediately rejected it as "undoable."

While she wouldn't comment on the specific figures, Schwab said the principles underlying the proposal were acceptable to the United States.

"I think the fact that Mark Vaile and the government in Australia put forward a proposal that has both more market access and more cuts in domestic support is ultimately the right way to go," she said. "I think it has potential to move the conversation forward."

The United States and the EU have been sharply divided over how to cut tariffs and domestic subsidies on farm goods, a dispute that led to the suspension of the Doha round in July.

This week's meeting of the Cairns Group has set the revival of the Doha round — named for the Qatari capital where talks commenced in 2001 — as its top priority.

But as the meeting began Wednesday, the United States and Europe remained divided as ever.

"I think the fundamental disagreement has to do with the level of ambition in the Doha round," Schwab said. "If you are going to promote global economic growth and development and the alleviation of poverty you need an ambitious balanced agreement where market access is key and new trade flows occur."

She said the EU was willing to open its markets to the manufactured goods and the services sector, but "when it comes to agriculture, the EU's proposal is less ambitious."

Moscow Faces Global Oil Backlash (FT)

By Neil Buckley And Arkady Ostrovsky

Financial Times, September 20, 2006

Russia was facing a global backlash on Tuesday over its threat to halt work on a $20bn (£10.6bn) energy project led by Royal Dutch Shell.

Japan led the chorus of anger. Shinzo Abe, chief cabinet secretary and front-runner to be next prime minister, warned the move would damage international relations and jeopardise foreign investment. The European Union voiced concern and Britain protested to the Russian authorities.

But even as the international community was protesting against the suspension of an environmental permit for the Royal Dutch Shell-led Sakhalin-2 project, it emerged that another large foreign energy project faced a similar threat.

Russian prosecutors have threatened to suspend an exploration licence for TNK-BP, the Anglo-Russian joint venture, to develop Kovykta, the massive gas field in Eastern Siberia.

A source familiar with the situation said prosecutors in Irkutsk, capital of Eastern Siberia, demanded a local agency for natural resources suspend TNK-BP's licence on environmental grounds and for failing to fulfil its terms.

On Tuesday Russia insisted its move to cancel the environmental permit for Sakhalin-2 was not politically motivated and was prompted entirely by environmental concerns.

If the move is ratified by Russia's industrial safety agency, work on the huge gas and oil development would be halted.

Oleg Mitvol, deputy head of Russia's environmental watchdog, accused the project operators of serious breaches of environmental law, including marine and river pollution on the Pacific island of Sakhalin. He expected the natural resources ministry's decision to revoke the permit to be approved by a further technical body within days.

Ministry officials say the Shell-led consortium would be forced to suspend work on phase two of the project, which includes building the world's largest liquefied natural gas plant and pipelines linking it to offshore oil fields.

The suspension of Shell's permit has been widely seen as a tactic to secure a better stake in the project for the Russian government: a charge the authorities strongly rejected on Tuesday. The moves against Shell and TNK-BP come as the Kremlin looks to expand its influence over the energy sector. It is known to want Gazprom to take a substantial stake in Sakhalin-2. Gazprom is also seen as the front-runner to replace the private Russian partners in the TNK-BP venture.

The move was keenly felt in Japan, where Sakhalin gas and oil are crucial for strengthening energy security and reducing dependence on the Middle East. The trading companies Mitsui and Mitsubishi own 25 per cent and 20 per cent of the project, with the rest owned by Shell.

EU, Japan Object To Russia's Move On Shell Permit (WSJ)

By A Wall Street Journal News Roundup

Russia's move to revoke an environmental permit for a $20 billion oil-and-gas project led by Royal Dutch Shell PLC sparked protests from Europe and Japan.

Meanwhile, Russia's OAO Gazprom said talks aimed at bringing the state-controlled gas monopoly into the giant project on the Far East island of Sakhalin have made no progress since Shell announced costs would double more than a year ago.

Russia's Ministry of Natural Resources said Monday it was withdrawing its approval for the second phase of the project because of allegations Shell had violated terms of the deal. Shell denies that.

But Russia's economics minister said the government had no plans to cancel a handful of foreign-led energy projects agreed to in the 1990s, including Sakhalin II.

The move to revoke the permit follows Kremlin efforts to increase Russian control of oil and natural-gas projects and was seen as a tough negotiating tactic aimed at restructuring the agreement between Russia and the project's operator, in which Shell owns a 55% stake and Japan's Mitsui & Co. and Mitsubishi Corp. own a combined 45%.

The European Commission, the European Union's executive body, said it was taking Russia's withdrawal of the permits "very seriously" and called on Moscow to guarantee a secure and predictable investment climate.

Shinzo Abe, the expected successor to Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, said a major delay to Sakhalin could hurt diplomatic relations, and the British government said it was "deeply concerned."

Analysts said Russia needs massive amounts of investment to develop its infrastructure and exploration capacities.

Sakhalin II had been scheduled to start producing liquefied natural gas in the middle of 2008, with about 60% delivered to Japan, according to Japanese buyers.

Analysts and an industry insider said they don't expect a severe impact on liquefied-natural-gas supplies in 2008 to 2009, because Japanese buyers already had expected initial output from the project to be unstable.

But for the longer term, a possible slowdown in investments in energy projects in Russia could be a serious problem, analysts said.

"Japanese companies may think twice about investing in resource projects in Russia," said Hirofumi Kawachi, an analyst with Mizuho Investors Securities Co.

Analysts said they suspect the Kremlin will ratchet up pressure to the point where Shell would be forced to surrender long-established production deals, negotiated when global oil prices were much lower, to give Russia a bigger slice.

Analysts said Russia also wants to help Gazprom get better terms for a stake in the project. Gazprom had planned to swap 50% in its giant Siberian Zapolyarnoye field against a 25% stake in Sakhalin II. But the plan ran into trouble after Shell announced cost overruns. A Gazprom spokesman denied that the government's move had influenced Gazprom's talks with Shell.

Jonathan Stern, a gas specialist at the Oxford Institute for Energy Studies, said companies would continue to invest in Russia because alternatives such as Iran, Venezuela and Nigeria were just as risky, if not more so.

"They will all say they're going to be discouraged," he said of Western energy companies. "The question is...'Where are you going to go?' If you look at the places which are open for investment...it seems to me that you don't see Russia as more difficult than anywhere else."

Steven Beharrell, a senior counsel at law firm LeBoeuf, Lamb, Greene & MacRae, said this may prove to be a watershed, with assets coming under much closer Kremlin control.

"I think this is an indication and a warning to anyone wishing to invest in Russian infrastructure that you will do it on national terms and not on any others," he told a London conference.

Annan Calls For Unity In Emotional Adieu (AP-Y)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, September 19, 2006

In an emotional farewell, Secretary-General Kofi Annan appealed for nations and peoples to unite to combat widespread contempt for human rights, religious divisions, brutal conflicts and an unjust world economy.

Annan's opening address to the 61st annual U.N. General Assembly hit many issues on the ambitious agenda that leaders of the 192 member nations confront — reviving a stalled Mideast peace process, curbing Iran's nuclear ambitions, getting U.N. peacekeepers into conflict-wracked Darfur and promoting democracy.

But it was overshadowed by a bloodless coup in Thailand in which the military overthrew popularly elected Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra as he was in New York for the ministerial meeting. Thaksin initially switched speaking slots so he could make his speech on Tuesday evening, a day earlier than planned, but later canceled the address.

Trying to build bridges with people in the Middle East angry with the United States over Iraq and Lebanon, President Bush assured skeptical Muslims he is not waging war with Islam and urged support for the people trying to transform the region and bring Mideast peace.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad — who was scheduled to speak to the body later Tuesday — was not in the hall during Bush's address and skipped a lunch hosted by Annan attended by the U.S. leader.

Bush opened his speech saying the call he made immediately after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks five years ago to all nations to defend civilization and build a better future "is still the greatest challenge of our time; it is the calling of our generation."

"At the start of the 21st century, it is clear that the world is engaged in a great ideological struggle, between extremists who use terror as a weapon to create fear, and moderate people who work for peace," he said.

Pakistan's President Gen. Pervez Musharraf, a staunch U.S. ally who spoke shortly after Bush, also urged the world to confront the plague of terrorism head-on and end ending conflicts in the Islamic world to eliminate the "desperation and injustice" that breed extremism.

"Unless we end foreign occupation and suppression of Muslim peoples," he said, "terrorism and extremism will continue to find recruits among alienated Muslims in various parts of the world," he said, and the top priority should be ending "the tragedy of Palestine."

Annan, meanwhile, warned that "as long as the Palestinians live under occupation, exposed to daily frustration and humiliation, and as long as Israelis are blown up in buses or in dance halls, so long will passions everywhere be inflamed."

Failure to resolve the Palestinian-Israeli conflict and Israel's 40-year occupation will continue to hurt the U.N.'s reputation and raise questions about its impartiality, he said. It also will stymie the U.N.'s best efforts to resolve other conflicts, "including those in Iraq and Afghanistan, whose peoples need our help just as badly, and are entitled to it," he warned.

On a positive note, Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni met Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas late Monday for the first time in months. Ministers from the Quartet that drafted the stalled road map to Mideast peace — the U.S., the U.N., the European Union and Russia — will meet Wednesday, and the Security Council was to hold a ministerial meeting Thursday that Arab leaders hope will help revive the Mideast peace process.

Annan, whose second five-year term ends on Dec. 31, said the past decade had seen progress in development, security and the rule of law — the three great challenges he said humanity faced in his first address to the General Assembly in 1997.

But the secretary-general said too many people are still exposed to "brutal conflict" and the fear of terrorism has increased the risk of a clash of civilizations and religions. Terrorism is being used as a pretext to limit or abolish human rights, and globalization risks driving richer and poorer peoples apart, he said.

"As a result, we face a world whose divisions threaten the very notion of an international community, upon which this institution stands," Annan said.

"The only answer to this divided world must be a truly United Nations," he said.

He also decried the continuing conflict in Sudan's western Darfur region, "where the continued spectacle of men, women and children driven from their homes by murder, rape and the burning of their villages makes a mockery of our claim, as an international community, to shield people from the worst abuses."

Sudan's President Omar al-Bashir denied that there was a major humanitarian crisis, accusing volunteer organizations working in Darfur of exaggerating the crisis in order to "solicit more assistance and more aid."

Al-Bashir reiterated his government's rejection of Security Council demands that the United Nations take control of a Darfur peacekeeping force now run by the African Union. Still, he said, he did not oppose the current force being strengthened and stressed that AU troops should remain there until a lasting peace is put into place.

Liberian President Ellen Johnson Sirleaf said the U.N.'s obligation to protect the helpless and innocent must remain paramount. She called on the Security Council to act under Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter, which allows military intervention, "to restore peace, security and stability to Darfur."

The African Union's Peace and Security Council is scheduled to meet here Wednesday to discuss breaking the deadlock over Darfur.

Annan's voice rose with emotion as he described his "difficult and challenging but at times also thrillingly rewarding" job.

"Together we have pushed some big rocks to the top of the mountain, even if others have slipped from our grasp and rolled back," the secretary-general said. "I yield my place to others with an obstinate feeling — a real obstinate feeling — of hope for our common future."

The presidents, prime ministers, foreign ministers, ambassadors and other diplomats in the General Assembly chamber burst into loud applause and rose to give their departing leader a sustained standing ovation.

In Last Report, Annan Cites 'Challenges' (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, September 20, 2006

NEW YORK -- In his final address to an opening session of the U.N. General Assembly as secretary-general, Kofi Annan yesterday warned that the Israeli-Arab conflict has so inflamed tensions that it is constantly refueling "a climate of fear and suspicion" around the world.

Speaking with unusual candor, Mr. Annan also used his last appearance before the high-powered audience to demand economic opportunities for Africa, peace for the Middle East, and human rights for all.

"The events of the last 10 years have not resolved, but sharpened, the three great challenges ... an unjust world economy, world disorder and widespread contempt for human rights and the rule of law," he told the assembled world leaders, ministers and diplomats attending this year's general debate, including President Bush.

"As a result, we face a world whose divisions threaten the very notion of an international community, upon which this institution stands."

Mr. Annan will leave the United Nations in December after a decade of global and sometimes personal turbulence.

President Bush praised his compassion, desire for peace and work ethic.

"We need to toast the fact that he is a decent, honorable man," Mr. Bush said during the luncheon. "We need to raise our glasses to 10 years of extraordinary service and be thankful that a man such as Kofi Annan was willing to stand up and serve the cause of justice and peace."

Mr. Annan, who last month visited 11 countries in two weeks to try to quell the Israeli-Hezbollah conflict in Lebanon, spoke passionately about the region.

"We might like to think of the Arab-Israeli conflict as just one regional conflict among many," Mr. Annan said. "But it is not. No other conflict carries such a powerful symbolic and emotional charge among people far removed from the battlefield."

"As long as the Security Council is unable to end this conflict, and the now nearly 40-year-old occupation, by bringing both sides to accept and implement its resolutions, so long will respect for the United Nations continue to decline," he warned.

The organization's impartiality will be questioned, and people will resist the U.N. efforts to resolve other conflicts, he said, citing Iraq and Afghanistan in particular.

The 61st session of the General Assembly opened amid acute security precautions. Throughout Midtown Manhattan, traffic was halted for passing motorcades, and streets surrounding luxury hotels are being barricaded through the weekend.

Mr. Annan offered a bittersweet assessment of his own tenure.

"This is the last time I shall have the honor of presenting my annual report to this assembly. Let me conclude by thanking you all for allowing me to serve as secretary-general during this remarkable decade," Mr. Annan said yesterday.

"Together, we have pushed some big rocks to the top of the mountain, even if others have slipped from our grasp and rolled back. But this mountain with its bracing winds and global views is the best place on earth to be."

Sudan: Won't Accept U.N. Peacekeepers (AP)

By Nick Wadhams

AP, September 20, 2006

Sudan will not allow the United Nations to take control of peacekeepers in Darfur under any circumstance, the president said Tuesday, claiming that rights groups have exaggerated the crisis there in a bid for more cash.

Omar al-Bashir did say that the African Union, which now runs the peacekeeping mission in Darfur, should be allowed to augment its forces with more logistics, advisers and other support.

"The picture that volunteer organizations try to give in order to solicit more assistance and more aid, have given a negative result," al-Bashir told a news conference.

Speaking on the sidelines of the annual U.N. General Assembly debate, al-Bashir claimed that Zionist groups wanted to weaken Sudan and that Jewish organizations were behind dozens of recent rallies there. He said Israel was spreading a lie that Sudanese Arabs are killing Sudanese Africans.

"We refuse to normalize with Israel, we refuse to deal with Israel," he said.

The fighting in Darfur has largely pitted Muslims against Muslims, though some identify themselves as African and others as Arab. The janjaweed, the Arab tribal militias unleashed by the government, are accused of some of the worst atrocities.

The United Nations and many rights groups claim that fighting between rebels and government-backed militias in Darfur has killed more than 200,000 people and displaced 2.5 million since 2003.

The underfunded AU force has been largely unable to stop the violence, leading AU leaders and the U.N. Security Council to demand a takeover by the United Nations, with its deeper pockets and better resources.

Speaking on the sidelines of the General Assembly meeting, al-Bashir reiterated his stance that the demands to put peacekeeping in Darfur under U.N. control are part of efforts to protect Israel, carve up Sudan and get access to its oil reserves.

While he ruled out U.N. peacekeepers at any cost, he said he had no objection to the African Union force receiving logistical, military and communications support, as well as materials and advisers.

In what could be an encouraging sign, he said the African Union forces should be allowed to remain in Sudan until the region sees peace at last.

"We want the African Union to remain in Darfur until peace is re-established in Sudan," al-Bashir said.

Those comments suggest that the African Union will not face any resistance in renewing the peacekeeping force's mandate, which expires on Sept. 30.

Last month, the Security Council passed a resolution that would put the peacekeepers under U.N. control, but required Sudan's consent.

In his speech to the U.N. General Assembly earlier Tuesday, President Bush repeated Washington's belief that the Darfur tragedy is a genocide, and said the AU force is "not strong enough" to protect the people of Darfur. He called for the force to be strengthened and demanded the U.N. take control.

"If the Sudanese government does not approve this peacekeeping force quickly, the United Nations must act," Bush said. "Your lives and the credibility of the United Nations is at stake."

In that speech, Bush announced that he was naming Andrew Natsios, the former director of the U.S. Agency for International Development, as his special envoy for Sudan.

The United States and its allies are now weighing whether there are other options for confronting al-Bashir's government, including the possibility of military intervention despite his objections.

In her speech to the General Assembly, Liberian President Ellen Johnson Sirleaf said the stalemate over whether a U.N. or AU force should be deployed "demonstrates a lack of international will to address the sufferings and yearnings of the citizens and residents of Darfur."

Saying the U.N.'s obligation to protect the helpless and innocent must remain paramount, she called on the Security Council to act under Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter, which allows military intervention, "to restore peace, security and stability to Darfur."

Darfur Can't Wait (USAT)

USA Today, September 20, 2006

Last week, actor George Clooney described a recent trip to the crisis-torn region of Darfur in Sudan. A little girl pulled his finger, he said, and asked when he would be back. When he replied "soon," she giggled and told him: "That's what you always say."

Out of the mouth of babes, the saying goes, often comes the truth.

On Tuesday, speaking to the opening of the United Nations General Assembly in New York, President Bush announced he was appointing a high-level envoy, Andrew Natsios, to lead a new push to end more than three years of slaughter and mass displacements in Darfur. The little girl set the only meaningful test: Will it be yet another hollow gesture?

The portents aren't good.

At the U.N., Bush rightly took credit for the fact that the United States, two years ago, first called what was happening in Darfur "genocide" as others pussyfooted around the definition. Bush also outlined what it would take to stop the slaughter: sending in a muscular U.N. force of about 20,000 — preferably with NATO logistical backing and air power. The Security Council, with U.S. prodding, recently authorized such a force.

The problem is that the Sudanese government, led by President Omar el-Bashir, won't accept the U.N. force. Sudan also plans to eject a poorly equipped African Union force of 7,000 when its mandate expires at the end of the month. Bashir plans to replace them with Sudanese forces.

That's a recipe for new slaughter: It is government-backed Arab militias, known as Janjaweed, that have been carrying out the massacres of tribes associated with rebel groups. So far, about 2 million people have been displaced and hundreds of thousands killed.

Clearly, the Sudanese government is betting on getting away with murder. It's a good bet. The world is distracted by crises elsewhere, and finding troops for the U.N. force would be hard. Rustling them up for Lebanon and Afghanistan has already proved difficult.

The odds can be changed — with political will. Appointing a high-level envoy is a start. A strong U.S. and European diplomatic offensive would have to follow. Even more helpful would be for China and Russia, which have significant economic ties with Sudan, to use their leverage rather than holding back, as both did when they abstained in the Security Council vote for the U.N. force.

After genocide in Rwanda in the 1990s, the world said "never again." But when the little girl implied that she did not believe Clooney's promise, she spoke from experience — and, all too likely, with prescience.

Gyurcsány Resists Calls for Resignation, Stands by Overhaul

BUDAPEST -- Several thousand protesters gathered outside the Hungarian parliament yesterday for a third night of protests after Hungarian Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcsány rejected demands that he resign after he admitted lying about the condition of the economy before April's elections.

"I do not want to step down," the Socialist prime minister said. "There's only one policy, that of change, reforms and clear speech. This is my policy, there is no plan B."

Hungarian financial markets remained on edge after the protests turned violent Monday night. The BUX index of the Budapest Stock Exchange fell 1.2%.

Socialist members of Parliament continued to voice their support for Mr. Gyurcsány and his economic overhauls, while economists and analysts said the premier's resignation would cause more harm than good.

"The prime minister's resignation would have serious market consequences as it would mean the failure of the reform package," said György Barcza, chief economist at ING Bank in Budapest. Mr. Barcza didn't expect the prime minister to resign, saying that would be a major mistake because it would be perceived as a break with overhaul policies.

Hungary's budget deficit -- forecast by the government at 10.1% of gross domestic product this year -- is the biggest in the European Union. To rein in the budget shortfall, Mr. Gyurcsány has launched extensive austerity measures, mainly consisting of higher taxes and utility prices. Hundreds of public workers have been laid off, universities now charge tuition and residents must pay certain health-care costs, including fees to visit a doctor.

Rating service Standard & Poor's said yesterday that a change in government could weaken effectiveness of overhauls, which could eventually lead to the ratings being lowered.

"Collapse of the government seems unlikely anytime soon, but the scandal clearly undermines the position of the prime minister," said Merrill Lynch economist Radoslaw Bodys. "And any defeat of the ruling Socialists in the Oct. 1 local elections may put further pressure on Gyurcsány, and consequently his proposed fiscal consolidation package."

Mr. Gyurcsány is key for fiscal overhauls, said economist Juliet Sampson at HSBC. Hungarian asset value is based overwhelmingly on the credibility of the government's overhaul program, and this, to a great extent, is tied to Mr. Gyurcsány, she said. "If he goes, any successor would have an even greater challenge in establishing and maintaining credibility," Ms. Sampson said.

Monday night, between 2,000 and 3,000 protesters stormed the headquarters of state television, demanding a live broadcast to proclaim their demands, throwing rocks at police and setting fire to several cars. About 150 people were injured, including 102 police officers, officials said. A more peaceful crowd of about 200 protesters remained outside the Parliament building yesterday.

The protests were in response to a recording of a speech by Mr. Gyurcsány leaked to the state radio station, on which the prime minister admitted to Socialist Party officials that he covered up serious problems in the Hungarian economy. The opposition center-right party, Fidesz, has been calling for the premier's resignation ever since the leak. The source of the leak isn't known. But the premier acknowledged the authenticity of the tape and published a transcript on his blog.

"I almost died when for a year and a half we had to pretend we were governing," the premier says on the recording. "Instead, we lied morning, evening and night." The premier also said on the recording that abundant global liquidity and budget accounting tricks have saved Hungary's international standing among investors.

Hungary's PM Defies Calls To Quit (FT)

By Christopher Condon

Financial Times, September 20, 2006

Ferenc Gyurcsany, Hungary's prime minister, on Tuesday defied calls for his resignation and vowed to press ahead with public- sector reforms after the worst street violence in the Hungarian capital since the fall of communism.

The Socialist premier condemned rioters enraged over his extraordinary admission that he had lied about the state of the economy to win re-election.

Demonstrators had stormed the headquarters of Hungarian public television in Budapest shortly after midnight on Tuesday morning. More than 150 people were injured in clashes with police.

"I put my political life at stake for this. Either there will be a new Hungary or I shall not continue," he said.

The events in Hungary fuel concerns that the European Union's newest members are facing growing political instability and resistance to reforms required for their economic integration.

Last night, a crowd of about 1,000 protesters gathered in front of parliament under a steady rain. They were accompanied by hundreds of riot police.

Fidesz urged the prime minister to go in what it called a "moral crisis".

Monday's protest was triggered by an audio recording, leaked to the press at the weekend, in which Mr Gyurcsany admitted that his Socialist government had lied repeatedly to voters about state finances.

He was trying to galvanise his party to end the deceit and push ahead with real reforms.

Hungary's budget deficit is expected to top 10 per cent of gross domestic product this year. Both the Socialists and Fidesz waged election campaigns in the spring that ignored the rising deficit and featured competing spending promises. The Socialists won the contest and Mr Gyurcsany quickly followed with a budget austerity programme and plans for public sector reforms. Fidesz leaders have since attacked Mr Gyurcsany for concealing the extent of Hungary's budget deficit during the campaign and denying plans for austerity measures.

The Hungarian forint and bonds dropped by the most in a month. Against the euro, the forint fell as much as 1.5 per cent, trading at 272.83 late on Tuesday.

Riots Test Hungary's Young Democracy (CSM)

By Michael Logan

The Christian Science Monitor, September 20, 2006

BUDAPEST, HUNGARY

More than 100 policemen and 50 anti-government protesters were injured late Monday night and into the early morning Tuesday in Budapest after the protesters set fire to cars and stormed the state-run Hungarian Television building in the worst violence Hungary has seen since the fall of communism.

Tension had been mounting since Sunday, when a radio station aired a leaked recording of Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcsany admitting his party had lied before April's general elections.

Hungarians were already angry at the ruling Socialist-Liberal coalition for introducing unannounced tax and energy price increases after being re-elected, and thousands of anti-government, right-wing, protesters took to the streets after the tape was aired.

The country has been divided between right and left since the changeover to democracy in 1990, and divisions have in the past spilled over into bitter campaigns. While the Monday's violence has shocked Hungarians, few see long-term damage to the country's young democracy.

Mr. Gyurcsany, a former Communist youth leader, has resisted opposition calls to resign, and some feel the riots could work in his favor. While the right-wing opposition party Fidesz, founded by dissidents who protested against Soviet rule in the 1980s, did not direct the violence, several analysts feel charged language used in campaigning for the upcoming local elections contributed to the blow up.

"Viktor Orban [the Fidesz leader] has been using words like 'uprising' and 'radicalism'," says Krisztian Szabados, the director of the independent Political Capital Institute. "These words incited people." How the protests began

The riots began after several hundred right-wing extremists broke off from a peaceful crowd of around ten thousand demanding Gyurcsany's resignation late Monday evening. The breakaway group laid siege to the television building on Freedom Square in an effort to have their demands read out.

The mob, supported by several thousand onlookers, set fire to cars, threw cobblestones at police and damaged an unpopular monument to the Soviet troops that liberated Hungary from the Nazis in 1945. The police attempted to control the crowd with water cannons and tear gas but were forced to retreat, allowing the protestors to briefly occupy the building before dispersing.

According to Mr. Szabados, prominent right-wingers helped pump up the protestors by comparing the demonstrations to the 1956 uprising, in which ordinary Hungarians rose up against Communist rule only to be brutally crushed. The 50th anniversary of the uprising falls in October.

Maria Wittner, a Fidesz MP who as a young woman fought in the uprising, gave a speech Monday in which she said: "This is already a revolution." Who's to blame?

Szabados finds this rhetoric irresponsible. "Last night was a breach of the peace, not a revolution. To compare it to 1956 was ridiculous and those who did so are legally responsible."

However, Fidesz laid the blame squarely at the feet of the prime minister.

"Ferenc Gyurcsany alone is responsible for what happened last night," Fidesz spokesman Peter Sziijarto said in a statement.

Opposition parties are increasing their calls for Gyurcsany to resign, who made it clear he would stand firm and vowed to crack down on further demonstrations. He called for calm, branded the riots "Hungary's longest, darkest night" since the fall of communism and said that he had asked the police to do whatever it took to quell further illegal demonstrations.

Local elections are scheduled for Oct. 1, and several large rallies are planned before then, creating the possibility of further incident. However, most analysts believe that the violence has shocked the general populace and there will be no escalation.

The demonstrations first began on Sunday, when Hungarian Radio aired a speech Gyurcsany made at a meeting of his Hungarian Socialist Party (MSZP) in May.

"Obviously we have lied. It is clear that what we were saying was not true," Gyurcsany said in the speech. "We haven't done anything for the last four years. I can't mention a single political step we can be proud of ...."

In the speech sprinkled with expletives, Gyurcsany admitted his party had "screwed up" the economy and had hidden the scale of a planned austerity package, which has since been introduced. Hungary has been under pressure from the European Commission and international investors for some time over its economy, and the austerity package is aimed at reducing the huge budget deficit and joining the euro zone, thus completing the long transition from a state-driven to a stable market economy.

The demonstrations could backfire on the opposition, say analysts. "Last night I said that until the first stone is thrown, Fidesz would be better off, but that as soon as the demonstrations turn violent, Fidesz will lose," Szabados says. "Now the average Hungarian is shocked. What we can say at the moment is that these events will cause a political crisis within Fidesz."

Budapest Police Clash With Demonstrators (AP)

By George Jahn, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 20, 2006

Mounted police charged bottle-hurling protesters outside Socialist party headquarters early Wednesday, another night of violence touched off by the prime minister's leaked admission that his government had repeatedly lied to the public about the economy.

Up to 50 people were reported injured, including one policeman. The state MTI news agency said the officer was seriously hurt in the clashes, which — like on the previous day — involved splinter groups separate from a larger demonstration massing about 10,000 people.

MTI said total police at the scene numbered around 1,000. It reported several police cars burning and said demonstrators were also were tearing chunks of plaster from nearby buildings to throw at police.

The latest violence came just a day after hundreds of demonstrators stormed and vandalized part of the state television building, in clashes that left more than 100 people hurt. Wednesday's confrontation erupted after the demonstrators apparently threatened to move in on the party building and ignored police orders shouted through bullhorns to disperse.

Police succeeded in scattering the protesters, then scuffled with small groups in side streets. Wailing sirens signaled the approach of police reinforcements, who then blocked access to the area to media. An ambulance crew was seen attending to an injured officer while other police hustled away individual demonstrators.

The protesters then regrouped, blocking a main thoroughfare with garbage containers and park benches. A bus, its windshield broken, was caught in the swirling mass of police and protesters. As the confrontation neared its third hour, police split the demonstrators into three groups and deployed water cannons to push them into different directions in a new attempt to disperse them.

MTI, quoting police, said about 50 people had been detained by the time the clashes ended in the early hours Wednesday.

The confrontation demonstrated continued high potential for violence amid radical opponents of Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcsany — (Feh-RENZ DJUHR-chanj) — whose taped comments set off the country's worst violence since its failed anti-Soviet revolution 50 years ago.

The violent group had split away from the estimated 10,000 people gathered in Kossuth Square, the vast plaza abutting the neo-Gothic parliament building. Dozens in the square waved Hungarian flags, and some of the demonstrators set up small tents, signaling they intended to stay at least overnight.

Some insisted they would remain until the resignation of Gyurcsany.

"I hope we can accomplish our goal," said Tamas Szep, 48, a paint supplies wholesaler. "Not only the prime minister, but all of his sidekicks have to go."

Protesters accused the governing coalition of lying to win the April elections, but people also were upset over tax boosts and other economic austerity measures that Gyurcsany has ordered over the last three months.

"My mother used to stand me in the corner for lying," she said. "Gyurcsany should stand in the corner of Siberia for lying to the whole country."

Opposition leader Viktor Orban, whose center-right FIDESZ party lost in the elections, also demanded the prime minister's resignation, describing him as "a sick, lying dilettante."

Gyurcsany — whose taped comments admitting his government had "lied morning, evening and night" about the economy provoked the fury — said he intended to weather the storm.

"I'm staying and I'm doing my job. I'm extremely committed to fulfilling my program, fiscal adjustments and reforms," he told The Associated Press. "I know it's very difficult for the people, but it's the only direction for Hungary."

Police were caught off guard the previous night by the fury of a few thousand people who broke away from the main demonstration and stormed the state TV building. Pushing past officers with protective helmets, clubs and shields, about 400 got inside, breaking glass and causing other damage.

The violence shook a country that for much of its last two decades had been held up as a model of progress following the collapse of communism in eastern Europe.

About 150 people were injured, including 102 police officers, one of whom suffered serious head injuries. Gyurcsany called it Hungary's "longest and darkest night" since the end of communist rule in 1989.

As the crowd grew again on Kossuth Square, hundreds of police from around the country arrived to reinforce officers guarding government buildings in the downtown Pest area. Gyurcsany ordered police commanders to use all means to prevent violence while respecting the democratic right to freedom of expression.

The public was stunned by the blunt admissions of government ineptitude during its first term and the cynicism contained in a 25-minute tape that was widely aired and published by news media over the weekend.

"We did nothing for four years. Nothing," Gyurcsany said on the tape, made during a private talk with Socialist parliament members that was larded with crude expressions. Later he said: "We screwed up. Not a little, a lot.

"No European country has done something as boneheaded as we have ... Plainly, we lied throughout the last year and a half, two years," the prime minister said.

The outpouring of rage was fueled by austerity measures implemented by Gyurcsany's Socialist-led coalition seeking to rein in a government budget deficit expected to surpass 10 percent of Hungary's gross domestic product this year — the largest in the European Union.

The government has raised taxes and announced plans to lay off dozens of employees and to introduce direct fees in the health sector and tuition for most university students.

Until the scandal broke Sunday, the 45-year-old Gyurcsany had been the Socialist Party's golden boy — a youthful, charismatic leader promising to lead his nation to prosperity as a full EU member.

Along with Putin, he counts among his friends Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain and President Bush, whom he presented with a handmade pair of riding boots during the U.S. leader's visit in June.

In the April ballot, his coalition with the Alliance of Free Democrats became the first Hungarian government to win consecutive elections since the return to democracy in 1990.

The origin of the leaked tape remained murky.

When confronted with initial excerpts of the 25-minute recording that state radio put up on its Web site Sunday afternoon, Gyurcsany not only confirmed the tape's authenticity but seemed relieved his comments had been made public.

That led some people to speculate the tape might have been released by Gyurcsany's own office, arguing he might hope a scandal could work in his favor by revealing the full extent of Hungary's economic malaise and casting him in the role of its savior.

The prime minister denied any involvement with the tape becoming public.

Abe Wins Vote For Japan Party Presidency (WP/AP)

By Joseph Coleman, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 20, 2006

TOKYO -- Nationalist Shinzo Abe became head of Japan's ruling party by a landslide Wednesday, a victory expected to lead to his election as prime minister next week.

Abe won 464 of the 702 votes counted, a majority of 66 percent. Foreign Minister Taro Aso came in a distant second with 136 votes and Finance Minister Sadakazu Tanigaki garnered 102 votes.

By winning the three-year term as Liberal Democratic Party president, Abe, a proponent of a hard line against North Korea, and a more militarily assertive Japan, all but guarantees his election as premier in the vote in parliament on Sept. 26.

"From now on, I would like to join everyone in helping Mr. Abe win the public trust," Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, Abe's mentor, said minutes after the vote. Abe stood up and quietly bowed in all directions when the results were read.

Abe, 51, would be Japan's youngest postwar prime minister and the first born after World War II. He is relatively inexperienced, having joined the parliament in 1993 and assumed his first Cabinet position only a year ago.

The son of a foreign minister and grandson of a prime minister, Abe has campaigned on forging a more confident Japan. He is expected to seek to revise the pacifist constitution to give the military more freedom of action and bolster the security alliance with Japan's top ally, the United States.

Despite his inexperience, Abe came to the vote with key essentials for victory: high support ratings inside and outside the party and the blessing of Koizumi, who remains widely popular after five years in office.

Because Abe's victory appeared certain, the competition has been lackluster. Challengers such as Tanigaki and Aso never came close to rivaling him in popularity or a vision for Japan's future.

The lack of competition, however, has led to a lack of clarity about Abe's policies.

One looming question for Japan's neighbors is how far Abe will push his vision of a country freed from the restraining legacy of World War II, in which Tokyo's attempt at regional hegemony left Japan and much of Asia in ruins.

Abe, for instance, supports revisionist history textbooks that teach students to take pride in their nation rather than focus on the dark accounts of Japanese atrocities and aggression. He is also a proponent of the Yasukuni war shrine, which honors war criminals among the country's war dead.

He has compounded this conservative image by questioning whether every prime minister must repeat Japan's standard apology for its wartime actions. When North Korea tested several missiles in July, Abe suggested a look into whether the constitution would allow Japan to conduct a pre-emptive military strike.

It was unclear how that approach would affect Japan's troubled relations with China and South Korea, two victims of Japanese aggression who have refused to meet with Koizumi because of his visits to the Tokyo war shrine.

If he ultimately becomes prime minister, Abe will take the helm of a Japan in transition.

After five years under Koizumi, reforms have made Japan a more competitive market, powering the economy out of a decade-long slowdown but also widening an increasingly troubling gap between rich and poor.

Japan already has started shedding its postwar pacifism. Koizumi pushed for _ and won _ the power to dispatch the military in unprecedented non-combat roles to help U.S.-led missions in Afghanistan and Iraq, despite domestic opposition.

Mexico Pledges To Extradite Drug Lords (AP)

By Marjorie Olster

AP, September 19, 2006

President Vicente Fox said Tuesday that Mexico is willing to extradite any drug lord in its custody wanted by the United States.

Fox said Mexico currently has 16 "big leaders" of drug gangs in jail along with 75,000 lower level members of various cartels.

"We are fighting hard and attaining very important results," Fox said of Mexico's fight against drug dealers. He was speaking at a news conference in New York where he was attending the United Nations General Assembly.

The U.S. is believed to have requested the extradition of at least three suspected drug kingpins: Benjamin Arellano Felix of the Arellano Felix smuggling syndicate; Osiel Cardenas, reputed head of the Gulf Cartel; and Hector "El Guero" Palma, a reputed leader of the Sinaloa drug cartel.

"We will extradite all of those who have pending matters with U.S. justice," Fox said.

It was the first time Mexico's president had made such a sweeping commitment to send wanted drug lords to face charges in the U.S.

Mexico extradited its first major drug lord — accused kingpin Francisco Rafael Arellano Felix — to the United States over the weekend. Before that, Mexico had often balked at sending drug kingpins, arguing they should face justice in Mexico and refusing to send anyone to the U.S. who would face the death penalty.

Mexico's extradition of the man who once ran the Arellano Felix drug clan was a victory for U.S. officials who have been pushing Mexico to send them more drug lords.

After serving a 10-year sentence in Mexico, Arellano Felix was loaded into a helicopter to the Mexican border town of Matamoros, then flown across and handed over to Texas officials in Brownsville. He will be taken to California to face trial on charges stemming from a 1980 case in which he allegedly sold cocaine to an undercover police officer in the United States.

U.S. authorities requested Arellano Felix's extradition on June 2, 2003. A federal judge approved that request in 2004, but it took two years for the Foreign Relations Department approve the extradition.

Mexico has fought many extraditions in the past, arguing that suspects must face justice here first. It also has refused to extradite suspects who face the death penalty in other countries.

Capital punishment is illegal here, and a 1978 extradition treaty with the United States allows Mexico to deny extradition if a person faces the death penalty in another country.

In November, Mexico's Supreme Court removed an obstacle that had prevented many of the country's most notorious criminals from facing U.S. justice when it overturned a 4-year ban on the extradition of suspects facing life in prison.

Mexico last year extradited 41 suspected criminals to the United States, up from 34 in 2004; 31 in 2003; 25 in 2002; 17 in 2001; and 12 in 2000, according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

Liberia Sees Green In Reform Of 'Blood Timber' (CSM)

By Matthew Clark

The Christian Science Monitor, September 20, 2006

MONROVIA, LIBERIA

A lucrative industry long steeped in corruption and used to fuel a brutal civil war, timber may now hold the key to rebuilding the devastated West African nation of Liberia.

Ten months after the country elected Africa's first female head of state, Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf, Liberia is poised for rebirth. And reopening the timber business, which could emerge permanently from under UN sanctions this week, is crucial to boosting its broken economy.

Timber is projected to bring in some $100 million annually, of which Ms. Johnson-Sirleaf's government would get between $7 million and $8 million.

The government estimates that the industry could eventually account for 25 percent of GDP - and create 5,000-7,000 jobs in a country with more than 80 percent unemployment.

The pressure to move quickly is considerable. Violent crime has spiked recently, fueled by large numbers of young, jobless, and restless ex-fighters. The government wants to boost its coffers for much-needed schools, roads and sewers, legal development, and security.

But Liberian and international advocates warn that hasty efforts to reform the industry - which farms teak, mahogany, and walnut, among other varieties - could have disastrous results, shortchanging the land and property rights of forest communities and prompting further unrest.

"We understand the [economic] pressure, but we have to do the right thing," says Alfred Brownell, a Liberian lawyer and cofounder of the Green Advocates rights group. If forest communities feel they are cheated by future logging arrangements, he warns, the country could slide back into conflict, leading Liberia "back to the [former dictator Charles] Taylor's days ... back to Square 1."

Joseph Sesay, a Liberian civil affairs officer for the United Nations Mission in Liberia (UNMIL), says he is keenly aware of the need to ensure local residents benefit enough as loggers operate in their areas. But, he adds, Liberia can't afford to wait. "It's a very tough balancing game," he says.

Ms. Johnson-Sirleaf has moved swiftly to get the timber industry into position. She cancelled all timber concessions shortly after her inauguration this year - a move designed to target corruption and bring loggers under the government's eye. In June, she asked the UN to lift sanctions it slapped on Liberian timber in 2003 in response to Mr. Taylor's takeover of the industry using militias stocked with child soldiers. That helped cut off a key source for Taylor's brutal 14-year war against rebels - and, in turn, end the war. Taylor is now in The Hague awaiting trial on war crimes.

The UN provisionally lifted its sanctions early this summer. If it permanently lifts the bans, the government could choose to revoke its own ban shortly thereafter.

Still, rights advocates warn that the country needs to do more to avoid falling prey to timber-funded militias.

"Ex-generals will have a ready [export] market" in neighboring countries, says Silas Siakor, director of the Liberian group Sustainable Development Institute, and an internationally recognized activist (see story, below). He says the government doesn't have the capacity to regulate the industry, and that the ban on exports should remain in place for now. A law that targets corruption

Last month, the government passed a timber-reform law - a move that will factor strongly in the UN's ultimate decision. But while the law takes stronger measures against corruption and in favor of conservation, critics say it focuses on commercial rights to the exclusion of other concerns.

"There is a school of thought that feels community rights are left out," says Mr. Sesay. But, he says, if the government waited to put every interest group's specific clauses in the bill, it would never have passed. "It's like a Christmas tree. Everyone wants to hang his ornament.

"The law cannot be comprehensive about everything, but can serve as a prelude," he adds, explaining that how the community and government agree to share the resources is an issue with too many complexities to be detailed in the law at this stage.

John Woods, the head of the Liberian government's Forestry Development Authority, says that there is a firm commitment from the government to work with civil-society critics to ensure community rights are more adequately implemented in the near future. "The journey of 1,000 miles starts with one step," he says. Damage by small-scale logging

Meanwhile, advocacy groups point out that despite the UN sanctions, illegal logging - mostly small-scale pit sawing by individuals - continues to deplete the forests.

Brownell, whose group monitors illegal logging, says the practice is extensive and "extremely organized." A drive through parts of the southeast reveals long stretches of road lined with freshly felled trees, piles of plank wood, and large timber trucks.

Reports of such small-scale illegal logging have been downplayed by UNMIL, which insists that none of the timber is being exported. "Pit sawing is widespread. You can't stop it. UNMIL doesn't have the personnel." And, he adds, timber from pit sawing "is the only resource for reconstruction."

The Sustainable Development Initiatives group says it has recent evidence, however, of at least one larger-scale illegal logging company moving heavy machinery across Liberia's eastern border from neighboring Ivory Coast, and operating within Liberia.

During an ad hoc monitoring mission headed by the government and UNMIL in an area of concern - which journalists and civil-society advocates joined - they found no evidence of large-scale illegal logging by timber companies. Mr. Siakor's group, however, says these monitoring trips happen too infrequently to adequately address the situation.

The "government hasn't fully come to terms with the fact that they have serious responsibilities," Siakor says.

Beyond the potential for profits, timber reform is expected to set a standard for how the nation can avoid further conflict and lift itself out of dire poverty.

"Timber will serve as a model for extractive industry reform," including the nation's diamond, rubber, and iron ore mining industries, says Sesay. Liberia is still under UN sanctions on its diamond trade. But on timber, he says, "indications so far are positive." One Liberian who found he could make a difference

Small in stature, soft-spoken, a guy who wears jeans and sneakers to the office - Silas Siakor seems an unlikely hero for his war-torn country.

He'd never use that word to describe himself. But the modest thirtysomething will concede that his efforts to document the plunder of Liberia's vast tropical forests have played an important role not only in helping to end 14 years of war, but also in rebuilding the devastated West African nation in ways that may ensure that the fragile peace will not slip.

Evidence of former leader Charles Taylor's abuse of so-called "blood timber" - collected at great personal risk by a small team headed by Mr. Siakor - was key in prompting UN sanctions on Liberian timber exports in 2003. Those sanctions, in turn, helped end the war. Since then, Siakor has continued to monitor the industry and press for its reform.

Siakor began documenting abuses of Liberia's timber in the late 1990s by using monitors around the country and informers working for corrupt timber companies. "What drives us," he says, "is trying to secure better use of Liberia's natural resources for local people. It's not about the greenery - it's about making people's lives better."

But, he adds, "you can't separate the two."

Collecting the data was risky business, Siakor explains calmly, as he tells of vigorous debates within his small group about whether to go public with the information, for fear of their lives.

Soon after they published a damaging report in 2002, he immediately faced pressure and threats from Mr. Taylor's government. In 2003, Siakor decided to leave his family in Liberia while laying low in neighboring countries until 2004.

Today, Siakor says, his efforts were worth the risk. "If we hadn't acted, no other group would have," he argues. "Up to now, people have been scared."

Last spring, Siakor won one of six prestigious Goldman Environmental Prizes - the world's largest award honoring grassroots environmental activists - for his efforts, and he says it's only now that he has gained international credibility and recognition that he realizes just how hard it is to make lasting changes to government policy from the outside.

"Sometimes I think: 'Is this really worth it?' " he muses. "But then I think of what it would be like if groups like us weren't around, and it motivates me."

Siakor says that he tries to keep colleagues inspired by telling them to take stock of the "little things," the small gains they have made and are making day by day.

"Change will only continue if ordinary people remain actively engaged," he says. "Without that, it will be business as usual."

One of eight children, Siakor says that his father, a hospital worker and strict Baptist preacher, used to tell him to "leave the people thing alone," meaning "don't get involved in the government's business."

But, now, he says, "the paradigm is changing," and people are more willing to play an active role in how they are ruled. "War made people realize that bad governance affects us all."

On India's Farms, A Plague Of Suicide (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

BHADUMARI, India — Here in the center of India, on a gray Wednesday morning, a cotton farmer swallowed a bottle of pesticide and fell dead at the threshold of his small mud house.

The farmer, Anil Kondba Shende, 31, left behind a wife and two small sons, debts that his family knew about only vaguely and a soggy, ruined 3.5-acre patch of cotton plants that had been his only source of income.

Whether it was debt, shame or some other privation that drove Mr. Shende to kill himself rests with him alone. But his death was by no means an isolated one, and in it lay an alarming reminder of the crisis facing the Indian farmer.

Across the country in desperate pockets like this one, 17,107 farmers committed suicide in 2003, the most recent year for which government figures are available. Anecdotal reports suggest that the high rates are continuing.

Though the crisis has been building for years, it presents an increasingly thorny political challenge for Prime Minister Manmohan Singh. High suicide rates and rural despair helped topple the previous government two years ago and put Mr. Singh in power.

Changes brought on by 15 years of economic reforms have opened Indian farmers to global competition and given them access to expensive and promising biotechnology, but not necessarily opened the way to higher prices, bank loans, irrigation or insurance against pests and rain.

Mr. Singh's government, which has otherwise emerged as a strong ally of America, has become one of the loudest critics in the developing world of Washington's $18 billion a year in subsidies to its own farmers, which have helped drive down the price of cotton for farmers like Mr. Shende.

At the same time, frustration is building in India with American multinational companies peddling costly, genetically modified seeds. They have made deep inroads in rural India — a vast and alluring market — bringing new opportunities but also new risks as Indian farmers pile up debt.

In this central Indian cotton-growing area, known as Vidarbha, the unofficial death toll from suicides, compiled by a local advocacy group and impossible to verify, was 767 in a 14-month period that ended in late August.

"The suicides are an extreme manifestation of some deep-seated problems which are now plaguing our agriculture," said M. S. Swaminathan, the geneticist who was the scientific leader of India's Green Revolution 40 years ago and is now chairman of the National Commission on Farmers. "They are climatic. They are economic. They are social."

India's economy may be soaring, but agriculture remains its Achilles' heel, the source of livelihood for hundreds of millions of people but a fraction of the nation's total economy and a symbol of its abiding difficulties.

In what some see as an ominous trend, food production, once India's great pride, has failed to keep pace with the nation's population growth in the last decade.

The cries of Indian farmers — or what Prime Minister Singh recently described as their "acute distress" — can hardly be neglected by the leaders of a country where two-thirds of people still live in the countryside.

Mr. Singh's government has responded to the current crisis by promptly expanding rural credit and promising investments in rural infrastructure. It has also offered several quick fixes, including a $156 million package to rescue "suicide prone" districts across the country and a promise to expand rural credit, waive interest on existing bank loans and curb usurious informal moneylenders.

But pressure is building to do more. Many, including Mr. Swaminathan, the agricultural scientist, would like to see the government help farmers survive during crop failures or years of low world prices.

Subsidies, once a linchpin of Indian economic policy, have dried up for virtually everyone but the producers of staple food grains. Indian farmers now must compete or go under. To compete, many have turned to high-cost seeds, fertilizers and pesticides, which now line the shelves of even the tiniest village shops.

Monsanto, for instance, invented the genetically modified seeds that Mr. Shende planted, known as Bt cotton, which are resistant to bollworm infestation, the cotton farmer's prime enemy. It says the seeds can reduce the use of pesticides by 25 percent.

The company has more than doubled its sales of Bt cotton here in the last year, but the expansion has been contentious. This year, a legal challenge from the government of the state of Andhra Pradesh forced Monsanto to slash the royalty it collected from the sale of its patented seeds in India. The company has appealed to the Indian Supreme Court.

The modified seeds can cost nearly twice as much as ordinary ones, and they have nudged many farmers toward taking on ever larger loans, often from moneylenders charging exorbitant interest rates.

Virtually every cotton farmer in these parts, for instance, needs the assistance of someone like Chandrakant Agarwal, a veteran moneylender who charges 5 percent interest a month.

He collects his dues at harvest time, but exacts an extra premium, compelling farmers to sell their cotton to him at a price lower than it fetches on the market, pocketing the profit.

His collateral policy is nothing if not inventive. The borrower signs a blank official document that gives Mr. Agarwal the right to collect the farmer's property at any time.

Business has boomed with the arrival of high-cost seeds and pesticides. "Many moneylenders have made a whole lot of money," Mr. Agarwal said. "Farmers, many of them, are ruined."

Indeed, one or two crop failures, an unexpected health expense or the marriage of a daughter have become that much more perilous in a livelihood where the risks are already high.

A government survey released last year found that 40 percent of farmers said they would abandon agriculture if they could. The study also found that farming represented less than half the income of farmer households.

Barely 4 percent of all farmers insure their crops. Nearly 60 percent of Indian agriculture still depends entirely on the rains, as in Mr. Shende's case.

This year, waiting for a tardy monsoon, Mr. Shende sowed his fields three times with the genetically modified seeds made by Monsanto. Two batches of seed went to waste because the monsoon was late. When the rains finally arrived, they came down so hard that they flooded Mr. Shende's low-lying field and destroyed his third and final batch.

Mr. Shende shouldered at least four debts at the time of his death: one from a bank, two procured on his behalf by his sisters and one from a local moneylender. The night before his suicide, he borrowed one last time. From a fellow villager, he took the equivalent of $9, roughly the cost of a one-liter bottle of pesticide, which he used to take his life.

Those like him with small holdings are particularly vulnerable. A study by Srijit Mishra, a professor at the Mumbai-based Indira Gandhi Institute of Development Research, found that more than half of the suicides in this part of the country were among farmers with less than five acres of land.

But even those who are prosperous by local standards are not immune. Manoj Chandurkar, 36, has 72 acres of cotton with genetically modified seeds and sorghum in a neighboring village called Waifad. Every year is a gamble, he said.

Each time, he takes out a loan, then another and then prays that the bollworms will stay away and the rains will be good. On his shoulders today sit three loans, bringing his total debt to $10,000, a vast sum here.

The study by Mr. Mishra found that 86.5 percent of farmers who took their own lives were indebted — their average debt was about $835 — and 40 percent had suffered a crop failure.

The news of Mr. Shende's death brought his wife, Vandana, back home to Bhadumari. Relatives said she had gone to tend to her sick brother in a nearby village. By the time she arrived, her husband's body was covered by a thin checkered cloth.

A policeman had recorded the death — the eighth in six months for the officer.

Ms. Shende, squatting in the narrow village lane, shrouded her face in her cheap blue sari and wailed at the top of her lungs. "Your father is dead," she screamed at her small son, who stood before her, dazed.

Blair's Indelible Mark Is A More Open Britain (NYT)

By Roger Cohen, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

LONDON Last month, Tony Blair said this: "Though Left and Right still matter in politics, the increasing divide today is between open and closed." He went on to say, "Without hesitation, I am on the open side of the argument."

The British prime minister will be gone within a year, probably soon after the 10th anniversary in May of his arrival in power, so it's natural that his legacy is being discussed. With those few words, he pointed to a central element of his achievement and got to the heart of the matter.

Beyond Havana and Pyongyang, nobody - or at least nobody outside the French labor movement - talks seriously today about the creation of socialist societies. Even Chinese communists are Starbucks-loving capitalists.

Rather, debate and conflict center on the globalization of commerce, mores and ideas and the various reactions against this inexorable tide of American-led opening.

Whether it's the fanatical absolutists of Al Qaeda with their desire to turn back the clock to the caliphate, or the bizarre Castro-Chávez- Ahmadinejad troika with its Cuban- Venezuelan-Iranian diatribes against the West, or, more innocuously, the world's various anti-globalization cabals, the same issue returns: Is an open world a better world?

Blair's consistent answer has been yes. On issues including trade, immigration, financial markets and competitiveness, he has favored the removal of barriers. "See competition as a threat and we are already on the way to losing," he has said. Jacques Chirac, take note.

One result is that the British economy has grown by 28 percent since Labour took office in 1997, averaging close to 3 percent growth a year, with low inflation and almost full employment. Another is that the London Stock Exchange attracts far more international companies to its markets these days than the New York Stock Exchange and Nasdaq.

A less tangible consequence of Blair's stand is perhaps even more important. It is the necessarily imperfect but still palpable sense exuded by many British cities today of energy, optimism and a comfortable mingling of a many-faceted humanity.

Russian oligarchs, Polish au pairs, Indian entrepreneurs, Kenyan accountants and jobless French youths may not all love Marmite, but they have found a way to make a buck and to get along with each other and with the lads in Blair's Britain.

Which is not, of course, to say that extreme racial or religious tension has vanished - witness the Leeds suicide bombers - or that wide income disparity and substantial poverty have not persisted despite Labour's faltering efforts to spur social mobility and jump-start education.

British bleakness has not ended with Blair. If the housing market goes south - and it is already going sideways - the bleakness could spread. The British have acquired an American taste for personal debt and consumption, using their homes as collateral for skiing breaks in Chamonix and the like.

But the prime minister has never had a "little England" response to the difficulties. He has never retreated into the rich, mawkish lexicon of defeatism or the equally extensive lexicon of British bigotry.

In the place of a managed decline - the theme of the postwar decades until Margaret Thatcher's revolution - he has posited the view that Britain, even as a medium-sized power, can make a difference in the world.

If, that is, the country works alongside the United States, the open society par excellence.

Blair has always been more comfortable with a unipolar world than other European leaders. He has favored European action, but not at the expense of relations with Washington. He has had little time for the European counterweight argument trumpeted from Brussels to Madrid. His commitment to the trans-Atlantic alliance has been unbending.

This position, of course, has ushered Blair into his greatest difficulties: the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, and the unpopular support for President George W. Bush that has accompanied those struggles.

But it is worth noting that had Blair opted to side with France and Germany, rather than with Washington, over Iraq, we might be talking about the trans-Atlantic alliance in the past tense. That would almost certainly mean a more unstable world.

Blair's choices over Iraq were stark. He knew that, with or without Britain, the United States was going in. His decision, like America's, proved to be based on false arguments. That was grave. But it's possible to get into the right war for the wrong reasons, and Blair has developed a deep conviction over Iraq.

As he put it in the same speech last month in Los Angeles, "In almost pristine form, the battles in Iraq or Afghanistan became battles between the majority of Muslims in either country who wanted democracy and the minority who realize that this rings the death-knell of their ideology."

That ideology - which Blair describes as "a specifically Muslim version" of "religious extremism" - aims "not to fight for the coming into being of a Palestinian state, but for the going out of being of an Israeli state." It seeks to prevent democracy taking any hold in Iraq or Afghanistan. It fights for "a retreat into governance by a semi-feudal religious oligarchy." It forms "an arc of extremism" across the Middle East.

Blair is more honest than Bush. He makes no claims of victory or progress. "Why are we not succeeding?" he asks. "Because we are not being bold enough, consistent enough, thorough enough, in fighting for the values we believe in." The greatest problem, he suggests, has been the failure to "bend every sinew" to bring Israel and Palestine closer.

That's a not-so-oblique criticism of Bush, who has been asleep at the wheel on that front. You can be sure that, out of office, Blair will still exercise all his own sinews in favor of a two-state solution. A moralist, he believes passionately in the possibility of reconciliation through the values of open societies: freedom, democracy, the rule of law.

By being on "the open side of the argument," Blair has made an indelible mark on Britain and helped preserve the alliance on which Europe's security still depends.

IMF Consultants Inc. (WSJ)

"The biggest reform to the governance of the International Monetary Fund for 60 years."

So said British Chancellor of the Exchequer Gordon Brown of IMF voting reforms announced at the World Bank-IMF meetings, which close today in Singapore. If he's right, the Fund is in more trouble than we thought. Here's the big news: On Monday the IMF voted to give emerging-market countries more say in how money is distributed. South Korea's voting share, for instance, will grow to 1.3%, from 0.8%; China's will rise to around 3.7%.

Rebalancing the voting to reflect economic progress is probably overdue. But in this case it's also like rearranging flowers before a funeral. Since the collapse of Bretton Woods in 1971, the IMF has been searching for a mission. Before the days of global capital markets, it financed bankrupt governments. Later, in the 1990s, it bailed out private-sector investors who had made bankrupt bets on governments. Lately, with the world economy humming, the IMF has been scrambling for a new purpose.

The Fund's top brass seem to be steering the institution toward the role of global economic consultancy. "It's not resources that are the problem in developing countries," the IMF's director of economic research, Raghuram Rajan, told a breakfast meeting in Singapore on Friday. "What is missing is the ability to use that capital" -- implying that the IMF can help with those choices. "Policy makers need to be ready to adapt to a more difficult environment," Managing Director Rodrigo de Rato told delegates the next day.

Good advice certainly would be welcomed in developing countries, which would benefit from cleaner government and more openness to trade and foreign investment. But is the IMF the institution to provide this kind of counsel? Indonesia is still suffering from the fallout from the Fund's advice during the 1997-98 Asian currency crisis; South Korea and Thailand have only recently recovered. Argentina isn't exactly a poster child for IMF smarts (see above).

This week, too, the Fund focused on all of the wrong problems. Its meetings were peppered with talk of looming global imbalances, unstable exchange-rate regimes and the buildup of central bank reserves. These conditions have persisted for years without damage to the global economy.

Perhaps the Fund would do its 184 members a better service by focusing on strengthening economies so foreign-exchange fluctuations, for instance, wouldn't have such a large effect. It's ironic that the Fund met in Singapore, which boasts one of the most business-friendly environments in Asia, and somehow missed this point. We didn't hear one serious discussion of how low taxes, simple and clear regulatory regimes, and protection of property rights boost economic growth.

The Fund could also revert to a closer reading of its original mission, part of which was "to promote exchange stability, to maintain orderly exchange arrangements among members, and to avoid competitive exchange depreciation." Talking up the Japanese yen, just as the world's second-largest economy gets back on its feet, isn't the way forward. Nor is pressuring China to appreciate the yuan.

The IMF's fundamental mission is to be a lender of last resort. That's less needed these days, with capital freely available in most corners of the world. Many emerging-market nations whose voting rights were just boosted -- China foremost among them -- already serve as bigger lenders to the developing world than the IMF itself. That's not to say that the IMF may never be needed again. But if the IMF wants to go into the consulting business, it had better improve the quality of its advice.

TERRORISM NEWS:

White House Drops A Condition On Interrogation Bill (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

WASHINGTON, Sept. 19 — Seeking a deal with Senate Republicans on the rules governing the interrogation of terrorism suspects, the White House has dropped its insistence on redefining the obligations of the United States under the Geneva Conventions, members of Congress and aides said Tuesday.

The new White House position, sent to Capitol Hill on Monday night, set off intensified negotiations between administration officials and a small group of Republican senators. The senators have blocked President Bush's original proposal for legislation to clarify which interrogation techniques are permissible and to establish trial procedures for terrorism suspects now in United States military custody.

The two sides were said to be exchanging proposals and counterproposals late Tuesday in a showdown that could have substantial ramifications for national security policy and the political climate heading toward Election Day.

The developments suggested that the White House had blinked first in its standoff with the senators, who include John W. Warner of Virginia, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, and John McCain of Arizona. But few details were available, and it was not clear whether a compromise was imminent or whether the White House had shifted its stance significantly.

Until this week, Mr. Bush had sought to address the issue through two channels. One was to clarify the limits on interrogation techniques under Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions by proposing legislation saying that the nation's obligations under the article would be satisfied as long as it complied with the Detainee Treatment Act. That legislation was passed by Congress in December and bans "cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment."

The other was to seek changes in the War Crimes Act, a step the administration had said was necessary to provide interrogators for the Central Intelligence Agency with protection from prosecution at home and abroad. The Republican group led by Mr. Warner favors addressing the issue through changes to the War Crimes Act but has resisted efforts to recast the nation's obligations under the Geneva Conventions.

Senator John Cornyn of Texas, a Republican on the Armed Services Committee who has supported the president's legislation, said Tuesday morning that the White House had agreed to work within the War Crimes Act to refine the obligations under Common Article 3.

"There's agreement on the goal," Mr. Cornyn said, "that is, that we continue to comply with our international treaty obligations and all of our domestic laws, but at the same time not tie the hands of our intelligence officials."

Senator Jeff Sessions of Alabama, another Republican on the committee who has backed the president's approach, said: "It's an argument between people with strong wills. Sometimes you have to step back and re-evaluate; the president has done that. Apparently he's said, O.K., let me look at this in a different way."

Mr. Warner declined to comment on specific proposals, saying only that he had "great optimism" that an agreement could come soon.

White House officials declined to discuss their offer and said they expected negotiations to continue for at least another day.

"We are continuing negotiations in good faith and remain cautiously optimistic about our ability to reach a resolution," said Dana Perino, the deputy White House press secretary.

Common Article 3 guarantees humane treatment to combatants seized during wartime. The two sides agree that the article's language prohibiting "outrages upon human dignity" is too vague and leaves military and C.I.A. personnel uncertain about what techniques they may use in interrogating detainees.

The White House has argued that without more "clarity," it will have no choice but to shut down a C.I.A. program for interrogating top terrorism suspects. But Mr. Warner, Mr. McCain and Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina have argued against any changes in the language interpreting the article, saying such a change would invite other countries to reinterpret the Geneva Conventions as they saw fit, which in turn could endanger captured American troops.

The senators propose to provide clearer guidelines for interrogators by amending the War Crimes Act to enumerate several "grave breaches" that constitute violations of Common Article 3.

Several issues appeared to remain in flux, among them whether the two sides could agree on language protecting C.I.A. officers from legal action for past interrogations and for any conducted in the future. Beyond the issue of interrogations, the two sides have also been at odds over the rights that should be granted to terrorism suspects during trials, in particular whether they should be able to see all evidence, including classified material, that a jury might use to convict them.

Mr. Graham declined to discuss specifics of the talks but said, "I am very pleased with the tone and the progress."

Mr. McCain said only that discussions continued. "There has been no rejection of anything by anybody," he said.

In the House, where the Armed Services Committee backed a bill that looked much like the legislation originally proposed by the White House, leaders said they still supported the president's bill. But they postponed a vote on the legislation until next week, while the Judiciary Committee examines it, and said they would look to the Senate for any signs of compromise.

Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the majority leader, said, "I think the president is on very firm ground here."

White House May Be Willing To Compromise On Detainee Legislation (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, September 20, 2006

WASHINGTON - With time running out before Congress recesses next week, the White House appeared Tuesday to be offering dissident Republican senators a compromise on detainee legislation that would leave the language of the Geneva Conventions untouched if lawmakers preserve the CIA's terrorist-interrogation program.

Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, an administration ally, described the proposal in broad terms, saying, "that's essentially what it does," but stressed that "this is still a negotiation in flux."

Cornyn said any deal could hinge on whether the Justice Department can provide the CIA with a legal opinion "that, yes, what you're doing is clearly within bounds and will not expose you to liability."

The Bush administration wants to ensure that certain harsh CIA interrogation practices aren't ruled illegal, such as "water-boarding," which simulates drowning. The U.S. Supreme Court ruled in June that U.S. treatment of detainees must respect standards of the Geneva Conventions, post-World War II international treaties that guarantee human rights and standards of justice for prisoners of war.

In another sign of the administration's compromise terms, George P. Shultz, secretary of state under President Reagan and well-connected to current policy-makers, released a statement saying, "I believe that there is a compromise that leaves the Geneva Convention alone and achieves the specificity that the administration wants."

Although such terms would mark a significant concession by Bush, no deal appeared imminent with the key Senate Armed Services Committee Republicans: Chairman John Warner of Virginia and Sens. John McCain of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina. Each declined to confirm details of the administration's overture or their response, citing the touch-and-go nature of the ongoing talks.

Warner said, "Until such time as words are put down to paper and people agree on it, I would not try and prejudge who's giving in, who's doing this, or one thing and another."

Graham said he was "very pleased with the tone and the progress" of the negotiations. He had released a statement late Monday saying the senators "share the president's goal of enacting legislation preserving an effective CIA program to make us safe, upholding Geneva Convention protections for our troops and passing constitutional muster."

A White House spokeswoman also declined to confirm any details. Vice President Dick Cheney urged a compromise during a closed-door policy luncheon with Senate Republicans, but didn't speak with reporters.

Even as the private discussions continued, prospects looked dim that a final deal could be sealed between the Senate and the House of Representatives by the end of next week, when Congress is scheduled to recess until after the November elections.

The House postponed a vote on its version of detainee legislation until next week. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said he believed it would be next week before the full Senate can vote. If the two bills differ, they must be reconciled and passed anew by both chambers.

Frist also declared that the version of the legislation favored by Warner, McCain and Graham, which the Armed Services Committee approved 15-9, could endanger CIA agents and has no prospect of surviving a filibuster, a parliamentary stall designed to kill the measure.

The administration has been under mounting pressure from military and diplomacy experts to abandon its plan to interpret U.S. obligations under the Geneva Conventions in a way that appeared to weaken human rights protections. Vocal critics have included former Secretary of State Colin Powell and military judges.

Opposition to Bush from such sources undermined Republican strategy for the fall elections for the party's candidates to rally behind Bush on national security.

"The president picked the battle and he thought it would be with Democrats, but it's been with Republicans, and until they resolve their issue, I don't think there's much that can be done with that," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

Dissidents' Detainee Bill May Face Filibuster (WP)

By Charles Babington And Jonathan Weisman, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 20, 2006

Frist Warns GOP Opponents of Bush's Proposal They Must Accept Two Key Provisions

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist signaled yesterday that he and other White House allies will filibuster a bill dealing with the interrogation and prosecution of detainees if they cannot persuade a rival group of Republicans to rewrite key provisions opposed by President Bush.

With Congress scheduled to adjourn in nine days, delaying tactics such as a filibuster could kill the drive to enact detainee legislation before the Nov. 7 elections, a White House priority. Bush faced still more problems in the House, where GOP moderates Christopher Shays (Conn.), Michael N. Castle (Del.), Jim Leach (Iowa) and James T. Walsh (N.Y.) publicly threw their support behind the bill opposed by the White House. The four Republicans told Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) that any House bill must maintain the dissidents' principles.

On another front, legislation to authorize Bush's warrantless wiretapping program may be in more jeopardy. Frist said yesterday that he referred the warrantless surveillance matter to the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence for further review and would not bring it up for Senate consideration until next week.

Yesterday's actions significantly dimmed prospects that Congress can complete its national security agenda before adjournment. Frist (R-Tenn.) acknowledged that a majority of the 100 senators back the rival group on military commissions but that there are not enough to block a filibuster, which requires a super-majority of 60.

Senate and administration negotiators talked throughout the day, but no real progress was apparent. "It could all come together in a matter of hours, or it could drag out for another week or so," said John Ullyot, spokesman for Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.).

The sharp rhetoric of last week was replaced yesterday by softer language from both the Bush administration and the three Republican senators leading the opposition to its proposals: Warner, John McCain (Ariz.) and Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.).

But Frist struck a more jarring tone, telling reporters that the trio's bill is unacceptable despite its majority support.

For a bill to pass, Frist said, "it's got to preserve our intelligence programs," including the CIA's aggressive interrogation techniques, and it must "protect classified information from terrorists." He said that "the president's bill achieves those two goals" but that "the Warner-McCain-Graham bill falls short."

The disagreement centers on the Geneva Conventions, which say wartime detainees must be "treated humanely." Bush backs language saying the United States complies so long as CIA interrogators abide by a 2005 law barring "cruel, inhuman, or degrading" treatment of captives. Warner and his allies say they are concerned that Bush's approach would invite nations to interpret the Geneva Conventions in lax ways that could lead to abusive treatment of captured U.S. troops.

The Warner contingent also opposes Bush's bid to allow detainees to be convicted on secret evidence they are not allowed to see.

Yesterday, Warner said negotiators were considering revising the federal War Crimes Act to clarify acceptable interrogation methods by nonmilitary officials. His bill embraces a similar approach, which would sidestep direct references to the Geneva Conventions' meaning. It was unclear whether the White House would accept such language.

Frist also surprised senators yesterday on the warrantless wiretapping issue, sending surveillance legislation already approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee to the intelligence committee for further review. With one week left to consider the bill on the Senate floor, Sen. Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine), an intelligence committee member, said passage before the election would be "extremely ambitious."

The intelligence committee is considered hostile to legislation worked out between Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and the White House. That bill would allow but not order the administration to submit its warrantless surveillance program to a secret national security court for constitutional review. The program involves monitoring overseas phone calls and e-mails of some Americans when one party is suspected of links to terrorism.

Three Republicans on the intelligence committee -- Snowe, Sen. Mike DeWine (Ohio) and Sen. Chuck Hagel (Neb.) -- have co-authored competing legislation that would give Congress considerably more oversight of the program.

DOJ_NMG_0066061

Two House committees will draft National Security Agency eavesdropping bills this week that would take still another tack on surveillance, but those measures also face resistance, acknowledged Rep. Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.), the primary author of the measures.

House GOP Delays Vote On President's Plan For Terror Detainees (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, September 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — House Republican leaders postponed a vote on President Bush's plan for interrogations and trials of terrorism suspects Tuesday as an intraparty revolt against the proposal widened.

Four senior House Republicans released a letter endorsing a rival bill authored by Senate Armed Services Chairman John Warner of Virginia and two GOP colleagues, Sens. John McCain of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina. The House members called on the White House and congressional GOP leaders to "ensure the United States fully maintains its commitment to the Geneva Conventions."

The letter was signed by Reps. Mike Castle of Delaware, Jim Leach of Iowa, Christopher Shays of Connecticut and Jim Walsh of New York, all Republican centrists.

The White House and the three senators are trying to reach a compromise. The senators contend that the president's proposal does not provide sufficient protection for the rights of terrorism detainees and could be interpreted as a softening of Geneva Conventions protections against prisoner abuse. They fear that could endanger Americans taken captive in other countries.

Administration officials and their Capitol Hill supporters, such as Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, say the prohibitions against "degrading treatment" in the Geneva Conventions are too vague and could subject CIA officers to prosecution. Both sides are still expressing hope they will reach a deal.

"We are continuing negotiations in good faith and remain cautiously optimistic about our ability to reach a resolution," White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said.

Other Republicans expressed exasperation at the dispute. "I'm a bit confused as to why we are having this disagreement," said House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio. He noted "the bigger question here is who is going to define the specifics of what (the Geneva Conventions) means, some international court or the U.S. Congress under the Constitution."

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee launched a frontal assault on fellow Republicans who oppose Bush's plan. He said the rival proposal "subjects our personnel to international courts and vague standards" and "would allow terrorists access to classified information."

Warner, McCain and Graham, all military veterans, contend that military and legal experts side with them. The latest to come to their side: former secretary of State George Shultz, who endorsed the senators' position in a statement released by McCain's office.

One possible area for compromise came in a letter released by the three senators Tuesday. Maj. Gen. Scott Black, the Army's judge advocate general, recommended that Congress create a list of serious offenses that would be considered war crimes as a way to clarify the Geneva standards. Black said anything more "could cause reciprocal action by other signatories, which is particularly problematic when we are at war."

Just How Far Can CIA Interrogators Go? (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, September 20, 2006

WASHINGTON

Is it ever appropriate, for example, to put a naked detainee in a cold cell and douse him with water? If so, for how long? Should interrogators be able to lead people to think they are drowning (a practice known as waterboarding)?

Many lawmakers thought they had settled some of these questions last December, when they passed an antitorture amendment by broad majorities in Congress. But in his signing statement, President Bush claimed executive powers to exempt members of his administration from the amendment, should circumstances warrant.

Ever since, Sen. John McCain (R) of Arizona and others have sought clarification on what, exactly, the Bush administration had ruled inbounds for detainee treatment.

President Bush says that "tough" alternative interrogation techniques are needed and have been useful, but won't disclose what they include. In a speech on Sept. 6, the president confirmed the existence of secret CIA detention facilities, but said that the "alternative set of [interrogation] procedures" used in these prisons was in compliance with the US law.

The White House and the GOP senators are now trying to find a compromise.

"We're having a very constructive and productive dialogue with senior officials at the White House," says Sen. John Warner (R) of Virginia, who chairs the Senate Armed Services Committee. "Progress is being made in good faith."

The new Army Field Manual would protect detainees from several of the disputed techniques, such as waterboarding. But the manual does not pertain to CIA interrogators, who operate outside the military chain of command. A majority of senators on the Senate Armed Services Committee want assurances that even those interrogations fall within the protections of national and international law, such as Common Article 3 of the 1949 Geneva Conventions.

"This is a matter of conscience.... Are we going to be like the enemy, or are we going to be the United States of America?" asked Sen. John McCain (R) of Arizona on Sunday on ABC's "This Week."

"We have to indulge the assumption that no one yet has been convicted of a crime," says Eugene Fidell, president of the National Institute of Military Justice. "Does a person charged with a heinous murder lack that measure of honor that we can throw the Constitution and our values out the window?

Critics, citing press reports, say that there is evidence that secret CIA interrogations, as well as the abuse at Abu Ghraib prison in Baghdad, went well beyond those norms. "Reports about the techniques employed by the CIA suggest that they include sexual humiliation, stress positions, prolonged standing, exposure to extreme temperatures, and waterboarding. All these techniques are clearly prohibited by Common Article 3," says a recent report by Human Rights First, an advocacy group based in New York.

"This is treatment that civilized nations do not engage in," said Deborah Pearlstein, director of the US Law and Security Program at Human Rights First, at a briefing on Friday.

So far, administration spokesmen have responded to specific questions about techniques in broad, general terms. They say they are reluctant to tip off terrorists to what might be used.

"What we're trying to do is answer a call that comes from the men and women at the CIA, that are responsible for questioning Al Qaeda detainees," said Stephen Hadley, national security adviser, also on "This Week." "And what they've asked for, very simply, is: 'Let us have clear standards.' These are good men and women."

Supporters of the Bush administration's strategy on detainees say this refusal to respond specifically to examples raised by critics is hurting the president's credibility.

"The differences between the Senate Armed Services bill and the administration's bill are really very, very slight, but nevertheless important," says David Rivkin, a former Justice Department official in the Reagan and first Bush administrations, who consults with the White House on legal issues involving the treatment of detainees. "Torture is off the table, cruel and inhuman treatment are off the table. It really is a matter of things that can be perceived as humiliation, and that's culture and context specific."

For example: Waterboarding cannot be used, he says. However, cold-cell interrogations are a matter of degree: "Putting somebody in a place that isn't freezing or horribly hot for a long time is not appropriate, but ... there are very clearly degrees of environmental stress that are well below the level of cruel and inhuman treatment."

Cultural differences also play a role, he adds. "In our culture, to be interrogated by a woman is not degrading. In Islamic culture, it's very degrading. Are we supposed to be pandering to that definition ... and not taking advantage of someone's psychological weakness and use it as a lever?"

McCain Knows Firsthand Need To Limit Torture Rules (USAT)

By DeWayne Wickham

USA Today, September 20, 2006

Let's be clear about this.

What President Bush wants from Congress is not clarity on the limits to which CIA interrogators might go in trying to get terrorism suspects to talk. He wants Congress to grant them absolution.

As the standoff between the Republican White House and a band of GOP senators appears headed toward a resolution, we should not lose sight of this important point.

For days now, attention has been focused on the effort by President Bush and Vice President Cheney to get Congress to pass legislation that they say would clarify a section of the Geneva Conventions that stipulates how wartime captives should be treated.

Article 3 of this document, they contend, is too vague. But in making this criticism, they point to just one clause that prohibits “outrages upon personal dignity, in particular, humiliating and degrading treatment.” Unmentioned by them — and many of the journalists who have reported on this issue — is that Article 3 is much broader and specifically prohibits murder, mutilation, cruel treatment and torture.

What has been widely reported is that the CIA has used tactics such as sleep deprivation and water boarding (which creates the sensation of drowning) to try to pry information from captives. They test the limits of what many people might think is torture — and that's the fissure Bush wants to close.

But a unilateral American interpretation of this clause would open the door for this nation's enemies to come up with their own interpretations of Article 3 — and increase the chances that U.S. troops captured by them will be abused.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., a war hero who spent 5½ years as a prisoner of war, has led a bipartisan group of senators in opposing Bush's effort to have Congress legislate a U.S. interpretation of Article 3. Wisely, in rejecting Bush's proposal last week, a majority of the members of the Senate Armed Services Committee sided with the Arizona senator, including the committee chairman, Sen. John Warner,

R-Va., and Sen. Lindsay Graham, R-S.C., men who also have distinguished records of military service. On one level, siding with these men and against Bush and Cheney, who both ducked active duty military service during the Vietnam War, is an easy call for me.

But on an even more thoughtful level, McCain's opposition to Bush's legislation makes sense. It's hard enough to get warring nations to adhere to the Geneva Conventions without creating a precedent that would make it possible for other countries to conjure up their own interpretations of them to escape being branded as war criminals.

In his autobiography, Faith of My Fathers, McCain wrote about the lengths an interrogator went to break his silence: “On occasions when he was particularly determined, I would find myself trussed up and left for hours in ropes, my biceps bound tightly with several loops to cut off my circulation and the end of the rope cinched behind my back, pulling my shoulders and elbows unnaturally close together. It was incredibly painful,” McCain wrote of the torture he experienced.

Anyone brave enough to endure that ought to know what he's talking about when it comes to what this country's interrogators should be allowed to do.

Instead of trying to force his views on the Senate, Bush should yield to the better judgment of those who, in this matter, have experience and logic on their side.

Bush Anti-terror Plan Edges Foward (AP-Y)

By Laurie Kellman

AP, September 20, 2006

President Bush's stalled anti-terrorism agenda edged forward Tuesday, with a rebellious House member rewriting her bill on wiretaps more to his liking and maverick Senate Republicans reopening talks over how to handle detainees.

Rep. Heather Wilson, R-N.M., offered to substitute her original bill on giving legal status to Bush's warrantless surveillance program with a bill that would grant a key administration request: allow wiretapping on Americans in the event of an "imminent" terrorist attack.

In exchange, the administration would be required to share with Congress more details of the nature of the threat, presumably with the House and Senate Intelligence committees and some congressional leaders.

"Excesses are best prevented when intelligence activities are operated within a framework that controls government power by using checks and balances among the three branches of government," Wilson said in a statement.

The substitute, to be considered Wednesday by the House Intelligence Committee, represents a possible breakthrough in a bitter, election-season rift between the White House and GOP leaders on one side and Republican lawmakers concerned about Bush's use of executive authority in his war on terror.

While the wiretapping question moved ahead, the second prong of Bush's legislative war agenda — treatment of detainees — also showed signs of progress.

The White House and a group of Senate Republicans continued Tuesday to swap proposals on legislation authorizing the interrogation and prosecution of terrorism suspects.

The two sides remained at odds over how to adhere to the 1949 Geneva Conventions and at the same time allow the CIA to conduct effective interrogations.

Sen. John Warner, R-Va., said "progress was being made in good faith," while Majority Leader Bill Frist said he hoped to vote on a final measure by the end of next week.

The Senate Armed Services Committee last week approved detainee legislation written by Warner, the panel's chairman, and Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., but opposed by Bush. The White House has said the committee's bill would put an end to the CIA interrogation program.

Bush's measure would let coerced testimony be presented at terrorism trials but would deny defendants access to classified evidence in them. Bush also favors a narrower interpretation of the Geneva Conventions that would make it harder to prosecute U.S. interrogators for using harsh techniques.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino confirmed Monday that the administration was sending new language to the senators in hopes of reaching an agreement. The revision was expected to address specifically the nation's obligations under the Geneva Conventions, a major sticking point with the three Republicans.

The development came as a key part of Bush's argument on detainees lost some of its edge. In letters obtained Tuesday by The Associated Press, two of the service's senior lawyers backed away from a previous assertion that the services do not object to the president's plan.

"I believe that approach is not objectionable from a strictly legal perspective" and would not "abrogate" U.S. treaty obligations, Maj. Gen. Jack Rives, the Air Force judge advocate general, said in a letter to Graham.

However, Rives added that while the section would not reduce the nation's commitment to Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, "some could perceive it as such."

Maj. Gen. Scott Black, the Army judge advocate general, agreed.

"I believe that further redefinition of Common Article 3 is unnecessary and could be seen as a weakening of our treaty obligations, rather than a reinforcement of the standards," Black wrote in a Sept. 15 letter obtained by the AP.

"This could cause reciprocal action by other signatories, which is particularly problematic while we are at war," Black added.

Support among House moderates for the White House proposal on detainees also was faltering. GOP moderates Christopher Shays, R-Conn., and Mike Castle, R-Del., said in a letter to House GOP leaders Tuesday that they support Warner's bill.

Amid the whirl of developments, the prospects for congressional passage of the wiretapping and detainee policies were unclear in the waning week-and-a-half before Congress recesses for the Nov. 7 election. House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said he expects Wilson's bill to come to the floor next week. But even if it passes the House, the Senate must churn through three conflicting pieces of legislation on the same matter.

Detainee legislation faces a similar crush in the House and Senate next week.

Revolt Over Wilson Bill Rocks Panel (HILL)

By Carrie Sheffield

The Hill, September 20, 2006

Unrest among GOP members of the House Judiciary Committee threatens to overthrow a bill co-sponsored by Chairman James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.) aimed at altering policies governing federal intelligence-gathering programs.

Citing concerns over civil liberties and program stability, GOP committee members last week forced Sensenbrenner to cancel a markup of the bill that would allow President Bush's warrantless surveillance program to continue with limited congressional oversight.

Republican members say they have enough votes to replace what they see as an unsavory bill, introduced by Rep. Heather Wilson (R-N.M.) and co-sponsored by Sensenbrenner, with a more palatable one during a scheduled markup this morning.

Several GOP and Democratic committee members are concerned that Wilson's bill would separate oversight of Bush's Terrorist Surveillance Program (TSP) from congressional oversight under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA).

Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), who is spearheading GOP committee movement against Wilson's bill, said the measure fails to create a solid system for TSP and would instead establish a passive, ad hoc response to terrorist attacks, rather than a steady program with legislative oversight under FISA. Flake said this approach both threatens the stability of intelligence gathering and increases the likelihood of civil liberties abuse.

"If we believe that these surveillance powers are necessary and vital to fighting terrorism, it is imperative that they be codified within [FISA]," Flake wrote in a letter to fellow Republican committee members on Monday. "Otherwise these powers could potentially disappear in two years when this president leaves office. Future presidents may eliminate the Terrorist Surveillance Program altogether if such powers are not codified."

Flake said he has enlisted Reps. John Hostettler (R-Ind.), Tom Feeney (R-Fla.), Louie Gohmert (R-Texas) and Bob Inglis (R-S.C.) in his campaign against Wilson's bill.

"Bob is not sure he can support the Wilson bill, which is why he is undecided at this point and he could then support Flake's bill," said Inglis spokesman Price Atkinson.

Inglis co-sponsored a bill Flake introduced that would ensure that intelligence oversight is delegated to the Judiciary panel and other committees. Flake said the National Security Act outlines a disbursement of intelligence oversight among various committees, but that the shared jurisdiction has been incorrectly usurped by the House Select Committee on Intelligence.

"We really don't get much in Judiciary," Flake said.

Intelligence Chairman Rep. Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.) disagreed, saying the diversity of his committee's membership ensures that other committees are adequately informed about intelligence programs.

"The Intelligence Committee was established with crossover membership so that a group of members [on other committees] could be apprised of what's going on in the intelligence community," Hoekstra said.

As part of his counter-Wilson effort, Flake has also banded with Democrats such as Rep. Adam Schiff (Calif.) and says he thinks he has enough votes to replace Wilson's bill at the markup today unless a compromise addressing their concerns can be reached. The committee has 23 Republicans and 17 Democrats.

Schiff has introduced a bill along with Flake, Inglis and four other committee Democrats that would "reiterate" FISA's jurisdiction over electronic surveillance.

Schiff and Flake said they met with Department of Justice officials last week to iron out differences, but failed to reach an agreement on which measures to include or discard from Wilson's bill. Wilson faces a tight race in November against Democratic challenger Patricia Madrid and has touted her bill — which, according to press reports, the White House opposes and is hoping to amend on the House floor — as a sign of independence from Bush.

"Maybe they'll come around," Flake said. "I would rather negotiate or work something out. That's my goal."

Adding to their frustration, Judiciary members said the committee held its first classified briefing on FISA last Tuesday, but were not given information about Bush's TSP.

"I'm one who thinks this surveillance is necessary and proper and we ought to be doing it, but it concerns me that we know very little about it," Flake said.

Some members said they were puzzled by Sensenbrenner's absence from the briefing, which was caused because he has refused to participate in classified briefings. According to committee members, Sensenbrenner fears later disclosing sensitive information to the public.

"Every member has to make that decision for themselves," Schiff said of Sensenbrenner's policy. "I think it would be very difficult to analyze the necessity or lack of necessity of proposed changes if you are not privy to why they're being sought."

Wrong Turn On Eavesdropping (WP)

BEFORE WRAPPING up business and sending members home for the fall campaign, both houses of Congress are likely to take up measures to authorize the National Security Agency's program of warrantless surveillance. The two main bills under consideration would both be disasters; they should not pass in anything like their present form. Because the parameters of the program remain so murky, it is impossible for those who have not been briefed on its details to identify exactly what Congress should do. No matter what the contours of the program may be, however, the steps these bills contemplate are dangerous. Instead of modernizing and updating a law that has served well and may need adjustment, they would authorize broad executive powers of warrantless domestic surveillance.

The main bill in the Senate, by Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), was originally designed to place the NSA's program before the courts for review. Judicial review of this program could indeed be helpful, but Mr. Specter's bill, which yesterday seemed to be running into trouble in the Senate, would achieve it at an unacceptable price. It would effectively repeal the requirement in current law, known as the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA), that all national security surveillance conducted domestically take place under the act's terms. Instead, it would explicitly acknowledge that the president may have inherent constitutional authority to spy on Americans without court approval -- thereby giving the administration carte blanche to snoop on Americans however it likes. And it would also permit the administration to seek a warrant for an entire "electronic surveillance program" rather than individual warrants to spy on people against whom it has evidence. The cumulative impact of this bill would be to make FISA optional and give the administration a green light to spy.

In the House, a proposal by Heather A. Wilson (R-N.M.) has acquired an undeserved reputation for moderation. Under her bill, all aliens who are not permanent residents would become subject to warrantless surveillance for up to a year if they are "reasonably expected to transmit or receive foreign intelligence information" -- even if there is no suspicion of wrongdoing on their part. Even more troubling, the proposal would give the president the ability to conduct warrantless surveillance against anyone he suspects of contact with terrorists after a terrorist attack or, in the latest version, when he deems an attack imminent. Because the key terms in this section go undefined, these provisions could easily be read to permit broad warrantless surveillance domestically even following -- or in anticipation of -- attacks on U.S. troops in combat zones overseas.

Congress needs to step in and regulate the NSA's program; it almost certainly also needs to modernize the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which was passed before the advent of modern telecommunications and computer technologies. Members of both parties have advanced thoughtful proposals. The goal of any legislation should be to authorize what is necessary in the NSA's program while at the same time limiting it and ensuring appropriate judicial oversight. These bills would do almost the opposite.

Red Cross Officials To Visit Prisoners At Guantánamo (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 19 — Red Cross officials plan to begin a series of face-to-face visits in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, on Monday with the 14 prisoners who until this month had spent as much as four years in secret Central Intelligence Agency custody.

The visits by a team from the International Committee of the Red Cross are believed to be the first time that the detainees, who include senior operatives of Al Qaeda like Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, will get to talk with anyone outside of the world of their captors since they were taken into custody.

Simon Schorno, an official with the International Red Cross in Washington, said on Tuesday that about 10 experienced officials, including translators, will assemble this weekend in Guantánamo and begin their interviews on Monday.

"We expect to be able to speak in private with any detainee of our choosing," Mr. Schorno said.

The priority, he said, will be to interview the 14 recently transferred prisoners, assess their conditions and "give them the means to communicate with their families through Red Cross messages."

But any information or assertions as to how they were treated under C.I.A. custody is not likely to emerge publicly anytime soon. Under the standard arrangement that allows its officials access to war-related prisoners, the Red Cross has agreed that it will not speak publicly about what it learns. Any complaints about mistreatment will be delivered to the United States government and not made public except under rare circumstances.

If the prisoners wish to publicize their treatment at the hands of the C.I.A., they will probably get an opportunity later, if and when they are charged with war crimes as President Bush has promised. Although the White House and Congress are still wrangling over a measure to set up military tribunals, any detainee who is charged will be assigned a military lawyer.

At that time, the detainees will also be eligible to acquire civilian defense lawyers, as have other Guantánamo detainees. The defense lawyers could be expected to raise the issue of the treatment of their clients while in C.I.A. custody.

Officials at the Center for Constitutional Rights say they have already been talking with a handful of prominent defense lawyers who have expressed interest in defending the senior Qaeda defendants. The center, a human rights group based in New York, has been largely responsible for organizing legal representation for more than 400 detainees at Guantánamo.

"There are lawyers queuing up for these cases," Bill Goodman, the legal director of the center, said in an interview.

Mr. Goodman said the group of lawyers who have been involved in preliminary discussions was composed of skilled and experienced litigators, although he declined to provide any names.

Civilian lawyers would have to deal with the age-old lawyer's burden of representing a client widely regarded as reprehensible as well as shoulder a great financial obligation, Mr. Goodman said.

"Unpopular clients are a badge of honor to lawyers who believe everyone deserves to be represented," he said.

While lawyers across the spectrum have come forward to challenge the government's detention of little-known detainees at Guantánamo, the task in this case will be representing a new group of detainees that includes people who are indisputably Qaeda members. Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, for example, is believed to be the chief planner of the Sept. 11 attacks.

"I'm confident we'll be able to recruit serious skilled lawyers to represent these people," Mr. Goodman said. "The bar understands this basic commitment."

What has typically occurred in the case of the other Guantánamo prisoners is for a family member to hire a private lawyer to work with the military defense lawyer.

The prisoners may make their desires for a private lawyer known through letters they will be able to send to their relatives via the Red Cross. The correspondence is generally limited to family members of prisoners, although exceptions may be made.

The letters, on a standard one-page Red Cross form, are censored as they go out from the prisoner and come in from family members.

Military officials have declined to describe the conditions under which the new prisoners at Guantánamo are being held except to say they are in a "modern and secure" facility. That description appears to apply to Camp Six, the only hard-walled and modern facility at the detention site. Camp Six has solitary cells, all electronically controlled and monitored.

Red Cross Delegation Will Visit Detainees At Guantanamo (MCT)

By Carol Rosenberg

McClatchy Newspapers, September 20, 2006

A Red Cross delegation will travel next week to Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, to meet with Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, and 13 other reputed terrorists recently transferred to U.S. military custody after years of imprisonment in secret CIA jails.

The 12-member delegation from the International Committee of the Red Cross would be the first people not affiliated with the detentions and questioning to meet with the terrorist suspects since their arrests as long as five years ago. Afterwards, the prisoners will be allowed to fill out Red Cross message forms that will be passed to their families in what would be their first communications since their captures.

Simon Schorno, the ICRC spokesman in Washington, D.C., said Tuesday that the delegation would include a doctor, a lawyer and several translators. He said the delegation would begin arriving at Guantanamo Bay on Monday and would stay for about two weeks.

Mohammed and the 13 other suspects, including alleged Sept. 11 conspirator Ramzi Binalshibh, had been held secretly by the CIA until two weeks ago, when President Bush for the first time publicly acknowledged that the CIA had operated secret prisons and had used harsh interrogation tactics on prisoners held in them. Bush said the program was being suspended in response to a Supreme Court decision and that its remaining prisoners were being transferred to U.S. military custody.

Schorno said that the Red Cross visit to Guantanamo had been scheduled before Bush's announcement, but that the delegation would make a point of asking to see Mohammed and the others next week. The prisoners can refuse to meet with the delegates.

"We have not gone to the island since their arrival, so they are not registered with us until now," Schorno said. "We want to speak in private with any detainee of our choosing, including the 14 that were recently transferred."

The International Red Cross has long been responsible under the Geneva Conventions for verifying that prisoners of war are treated humanely and don't disappear while in custody, but U.S. officials insisted that the Geneva Conventions didn't apply to suspected terrorists. That view was rejected by the U.S. Supreme Court in June.

The International Red Cross wouldn't identify the head of the delegation by name nor specify the delegates' nationalities. But Schorno said the delegation leader had visited Guantanamo before, speaking with senior U.S. military officers and meeting with prisoners.

How CIA interrogators treated the new prisoners during their detentions will certainly come up during any meetings with the Red Cross, but it's unlikely that information will be made public. Under international rules, Red Cross officials report the findings of their visits only to the country holding the prisoners.

In announcing the transfer of the prisoners to Guantanamo on Sept. 6, Bush said that some had been questioned using an "alternative set of procedures" designed to induce them to testify. Those procedures are said to have included loud music, sleep deprivation and exposure to extreme temperatures recently prohibited to military interrogators.

Bush said the questioning techniques had been necessary to gain valuable information, and he has sought congressional approval to continue using them.

Bush also has sought congressional approval to establish military tribunals that would offer fewer protections to defendants than traditional U.S. military justice would. That proposal has been met with stiff opposition from key Republican senators, including Sen. John McCain of Arizona, who was tortured as a prisoner of war in North Vietnam.

The last Red Cross visit to Guantanamo straddled the end of June and beginning of July, following the simultaneous suicides by hanging of two Saudis and a Yemeni, the first prisoners to die during their captivity there.

Red Cross Workers To Meet With 14 Who Were Held In Secret Prisons (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, September 20, 2006

Representatives from the International Committee of the Red Cross are scheduled to begin meetings Monday with the 14 terrorism suspects who were held for years in secret CIA custody, the detainees' first contact with the outside world since they were captured after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

The meetings will be part of a routine Red Cross visit to the U.S. military detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, said Simon Schorno, a Red Cross spokesman in Washington. About 12 officials, including interpreters, will spend about two weeks at the camp, he said.

Red Cross officials have met regularly with the hundreds of detainees at Guantanamo Bay since early 2002 but have never before gained access to detainees in U.S. custody in secret prisons around the world.

Schorno said the Red Cross has been hoping to speak to anyone who was held in a CIA-run prison.

"It has been a priority of ours to gain access to those people," he said. "It's something that we have expressed our discomfort and problem with several times."

Defense Department officials declined to confirm the visit.

"The International Committee of the Red Cross has regularly sent delegations to Guantanamo for weeks at a time," said Lt. Cmdr. Chito Peppler, a department spokesman. "They have had access to private interviews with detainees and have facilitated communications with their family members around the globe."

President Bush publicly addressed the secret CIA program this month just as the detainees were transferred to Guantanamo Bay, where they are covered by international humane-treatment standards. Bush defended the program and has been pushing for a U.S. law that would allow the CIA to continue using aggressive interrogation tactics, something members of Congress -- including some top Republicans -- have been trying to block.

The Red Cross will officially register the men, one of whom is alleged Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Sheik Mohammed, and will then offer to speak to them privately, Schorno said. The meetings involve only a Red Cross delegate, an interpreter and in some cases a doctor.

It is possible that, in such discussions, the Red Cross will become the first organization outside of the Bush administration to learn about the practices in the CIA-run facilities, including the interrogation techniques used. But the international agency's guidelines require the information to be completely confidential, meaning that the representatives will be able to directly raise their concerns only with U.S. authorities.

"Certainly it's a difficult decision, but it's the main reason why we get access," Schorno said. "We will take the information and intervene if necessary."

The visits also mean that the 14 suspects will be able to contact their families, who until this month were unaware of the men's whereabouts, through Red Cross messages. The U.S. military censors the messages before delivery, and families are allowed to write back.

Schorno said 20,000 such messages have been transferred between Guantanamo Bay detainees and their families.

Intelligence Comes First (USAT)

By Andrew C. McCarthy

USA Today, September 20, 2006

The case of Maher Arar, a Canadian Muslim allegedly tortured in Syria after being taken there by the CIA, warrants scrutiny. So, indeed, does the whole practice of rendition, a favorite of the Clinton administration long before the Sept. 11 attacks.

U.S. treaty obligations forbid transporting people to countries where we have reason to believe they'll be tortured. Syria, moreover, is not only a torture state but a terror state. We should regard it as an enemy, not a collaborator.

But with the lives of 300 million Americans at stake, the United States cannot make national security policy based on individual anecdotes about government roguishness.

Intelligence is singularly crucial in the war on terror. A terror network has no territory or treasury to defend. We can't bomb friendly countries where it is embedded, much less our own cities where its threat to us is greatest. Our only weapon is intelligence. Without it, we'll have to accept the preventable deaths of American soldiers and civilians. That is not acceptable.

Last year's legislation by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., extended Fifth Amendment protections to alien enemy combatants. In my view, that gave al-Qaeda captives the right to Miranda warnings, at least if we hope to use confession evidence at trial. Now, McCain champions opposition to the president's urgently needed effort to clarify hopelessly vague Geneva Convention terms recently imposed by the Supreme Court — such as a prohibition of "degrading treatment."

No one is urging torture. It's illegal. But there are many tactics, short of torture, that have proved effective in wringing life-saving intelligence from jihadists, who are trained to resist interrogation. Without latitude and clear guidance about what is permissible, our interrogators would be vulnerable to war crime charges just for doing their jobs.

Yes, rogues need to be rooted out. But the vast majority of our agents are honorable. They will follow the rules if Congress tells them what is and is not permissible — common sense McCain obstinately resists. If Congress follows his lead and abdicates its duty, the highest quality intelligence will be lost, and with it American lives.

Into A Moral Desert (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, September 20, 2006

At its highest levels, the literature of war is often about a hero gone bad, a hero, in fact, who becomes indistinguishable from his enemy. Achilles, to begin at the beginning, outrages the gods by his desecration of the body of his slain archrival, Hector, and it takes a message from Zeus to persuade him to relinquish the body for burial.

In America, the closest we've come to having a Homer of our own, "an epic, tragic, national poet," is probably John Ford, the tormented, alcoholic Irish American director who invented both the classic Western and John Wayne in his 1939 film "Stagecoach." But it's the film Ford made immediately after that, "Young Mr. Lincoln," starring young Henry Fonda, that may be the single most lyrical and compelling evocation of the American ideals of justice and community ever crafted by an American artist. No one did heroes as well as Ford.

So it's all the more startling to see Ford's late Western "The Searchers," his ninth picture with Wayne, which came out in 1956. Suddenly, Wayne no longer personifies the chivalrous ideals he embodied as the Ringo Kid in "Stagecoach" or the military officers in Ford's cavalry films. In "The Searchers," Wayne plays a former Confederate cavalryman who rode off to avoid surrendering to the Yankees and who is possessed by a raging hatred of Indians. As the self-appointed protector of isolated frontier settlers who are subjected to murderous raids from a band of Comanches, he becomes as savage as the Comanches themselves -- his hatred culminating in a shot in which he scalps the Comanche chief he has tracked for five years.

Nor does Ford let even his beloved cavalry off easy, showing us the bodies of squaws killed in a raid on a Comanche encampment. In the film's famous closing shot, with the camera positioned inside a settler's home looking out the doorway to the desert beyond, the Wayne character returns his niece, whom the Comanches had kidnapped five years earlier, to the settler's family. She enters the house; other characters enter the house; and Wayne remains outside, looking in, then turning, then walking away into the desert as the door closes and the picture ends.

Defend civilization by becoming as barbaric as its enemies, Ford suggests, and you are no longer really part of that civilization. Or perhaps you are, but that civilization has lost some of its ideals, its raison d'Ãªtre, in the process.

These thoughts of Homer and Ford on men in war are occasioned by the story of the Syrian-born Canadian computer engineer whom the Mounties misidentified as an al-Qaeda associate and whom our own government then spirited off to Syria in September 2002 so he could be tortured into revealing what he knew. After nearly a year of torture, it was clear that he knew nothing, because he wasn't an al-Qaeda associate.

What's striking about this story (and it's just one of many things that are striking about this story) is that we sent him to Syria, which was providing us with some assistance during the period between Sept. 11 and our invasion of Iraq but which also was an authoritarian regime that knew no constraints in the treatment of its presumed enemies. We sent him there because he'd be tortured, because the Syrians would do the kinds of things that the same administration officials who devised this policy feared the Syrians, given half a chance, would do to us.

But why rely just on the Syrians? At the same time, as the president acknowledged this month, we ourselves (that is, CIA employees) had embarked on our own round of torture of al-Qaeda suspects, some of them the genuine article, some not. As the president asserted during his news conference Friday, that doesn't mean that we've become our enemy, that we're in any sense the moral equivalent of al-Qaeda. But it most certainly means we've abandoned our own moral and legal norms, as the administration's determination to create a loophole in the Geneva Conventions makes unmistakably clear.

Lindsey Graham, John Warner, Colin Powell and above all John McCain know firsthand what war can do to men and why we need laws to keep men from becoming their nightmare image of their enemy. Their knowledge is as old as Homer, as American as John Ford.

As events would have it, though, our nation is led by men who have carefully avoided both war and literature. By men devoid of a sense of the nation's and their own moral fallibility. By men who have led us into a moral desert and aren't even looking for a way back home.

Every Suspect Is Not A Terrorist — Just Ask Him (USAT)

USA Today, September 20, 2006

As Congress weighs how to treat and try suspected terrorists, it should consider the story of Maher Arar, a Canadian Muslim.

His case is a textbook example of what can go wrong, and why Americans should be leery of embracing the harsh tactics President Bush wants applied to terror suspects.

Arar's nightmare began in September 2002. The computer engineer, married and the father of two, was detained in New York's JFK Airport during a stopover on a flight home from Tunisia, where he had been with his family. Unknown to Arar, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, acting on faulty information, had told U.S. authorities Arar was an Islamic extremist with suspected links to al-Qaeda.

Arar was held and questioned for 12 days at JFK and in a U.S. detention center. When U.S. authorities told him they were sending him to Syria, from which he had emigrated to Canada at age 17, the mild-mannered Arar broke down crying, protesting the Syrians would torture him.

Arar was shackled by U.S. authorities in the rear of a small jet and flown to Jordan. There, he was hit by Jordanian guards and questioned. Then he was blindfolded and driven to Syria, where his life descended into a hellish round of beatings and interrogation. He was punched and whipped with an electric cable. Desperate to stop the beatings, he confessed to having been trained in Afghanistan — a country there is no evidence he has ever visited.

The beatings quickly diminished, but for 10 months Arar was locked in a tomblike, rat-infested concrete cell just 3 feet wide and 6 feet long. The Syrians eventually required him to sign a confession and set him free. He returned to Canada in 2003, where he suffered from severe post-traumatic stress and was unable to work to support his family.

We know all of this because of a devastating new report by a Canadian judge, who heard testimony about Arar's case from more than 70 witnesses and had access to more than 21,000 documents. The judge concluded “categorically that there is no evidence” Arar was ever a security threat.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Tuesday that the hand-over of Arar to the Syrians was a deportation, not a “rendition” — a controversial practice in which U.S. authorities turn over suspected terrorists to other countries.

In this case, that seems to be a distinction without a difference.

Terrorism is a deadly threat to the USA, but Arar's story illustrates what can happen when fear of it causes the usual checks and balances of the legal system to be bypassed.

Several precautions might have averted the injustice: Turning Arar over to Canada instead of Syria. Giving him a court review. Adopting reasonable principles on torture, either by the United States or by its proxies. But the Bush administration has resisted due process for terror suspects and wants to sanction practices that can be interpreted as torture.

As we said as recently as Tuesday in this space, torture is a terrible bargain. It often produces bad information, and it almost always degrades the moral authority of the torturer. Using it on the most vile terrorist leaders is debatable. Applying it to an innocent man is unforgivable.

Tortured By Mistake (WP)

ACOUPLE of years ago, President Bush might well have counted Maher Arar as one of the success stories of the CIA's secret program for detaining and interrogating suspected terrorists. Mr. Arar, a Canadian citizen, was arrested at New York's John F. Kennedy International Airport in September 2002 because he was on a watchlist; Canadian police said they believed he had connections to al-Qaeda. Rather than being returned to Canada, Mr. Arar disappeared into the CIA's secret system -- he was transported to Syria and handed over to its military intelligence service. For several weeks, Mr. Arar was tortured by his Syrian captors, who beat him with an electric cable. Eventually he broke and confessed that he had trained at an al-Qaeda camp in Afghanistan.

The problem with this story, as an official Canadian investigation reported Monday, is that Mr. Arar was innocent. "Categorically there is no evidence" that Mr. Arar was a terrorist or posed a security threat, the report stated. He never traveled to Afghanistan. The Canadian police intelligence about him was simply wrong. But after his coerced confession, he was held in a Syrian dungeon for 10 months and suffered "devastating" mental and economic harm before finally being released in 2003.

Mr. Arar's case vividly illustrates a couple of the points that veteran military and diplomatic leaders have been trying to impress on Mr. Bush about the dangers of the CIA program, for which the president is demanding congressional approval. From early 2002 until this month the agency held some al-Qaeda suspects in secret prisons and subjected them to harsh interrogation techniques that, though they don't include beatings with cables, violate the Geneva Conventions and current U.S. law. Others, like Mr. Arar, have been secretly handed over to foreign governments known to use torture in interrogations, including Egypt and Jordan as well as Syria -- a practice known as "rendition."

Mr. Bush claims that the renditions, secret detentions and harsh U.S. techniques -- which most of the world regards as torture -- have yielded important intelligence. But as the military commanders who oppose such methods have insistently and courageously pointed out, it is well known that the information they produce is unreliable. Many detainees, as Mr. Arar did, will falsely incriminate themselves or others to avoid abuse. Over time, better intelligence can be obtained by working within guidelines mandating humane treatment of detainees -- such as those in the new Army interrogation manual released this month.

Moreover, as Mr. Arar's case illustrates, cruel treatment of prisoners, even in secret, eventually becomes known and can badly damage the honor and influence of the United States and its relations with allies. The mistreatment of Mr. Arar has hurt U.S. relations with Canada and could impede cooperation with its police and security services in the future. Other cases of rendition have similarly upset U.S. intelligence relations with Italy, Germany and Sweden.

It's no wonder that two former Republican secretaries of state, Colin L. Powell and George P. Shultz, oppose Mr. Bush's attempt to modify U.S. compliance with the Geneva Conventions to permit future secret detentions and renditions by the CIA. Or that military leaders ranging from Gen. John W. Vessey Jr., a former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, to Maj. Gen. Scott C. Black, the senior serving uniformed lawyer in the Army, also oppose the president's initiative. They understand well what Mr. Bush refuses to see -- that the price of his policies is bad intelligence, the criminal mistreatment of some innocent people, and damage to U.S. prestige and alliances that the country can ill afford.

Rules For The Real World (NYT)

The White House has been acting lately as though the struggle over the proper way to handle prisoners is a debate about how tough to get with Osama bin Laden if he's ever actually caught. This week, we've had two powerful reminders of the real issue: when a government puts itself above the law, innocent people are put at risk.

On Monday, Canada issued a scathing report about the story of a Canadian citizen, Maher Arar, who was abducted by American agents in late 2002 and turned over to Syrian authorities, who obligingly tortured him for 10 months until he signed a transparently false confession. The report said Mr. Arar never had any connection to terrorism. But the United States stonewalled Canada's investigation, which concluded that the Americans misled Canada about their plans for Mr. Arar. Sending him to Syria, where he would certainly be tortured, was not just immoral and un-American, it was a violation of international law.

In Iraq, American authorities have been holding an Iraqi-born photographer for The Associated Press for five months without charging him with any crime. Military officials say they have evidence that Bilal Hussein has "strong ties" to insurgents, but refuse to show it to Mr. Hussein, his lawyers, The A.P. or even to the Iraqi courts. We don't know the truth. But we know how to get at it: If the Americans have evidence against Mr. Hussein, they should present it. If he committed a crime, he should be charged. If not, he should be set free.

These two cases illustrate vividly why Congress needs to pass an effective law on the handling of prisoners that not only provides for legal military tribunals to try dangerous men like Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, who is believed to have organized the 9/11 attacks, but also deals with the other men, perhaps hundreds, wrongly imprisoned at Guantánamo Bay, and sets rules for the future.

The bills now before Congress don't meet the test. The White House's measure endorses the practice of picking up any foreign citizens the United States wants, abusing and even torturing them, and then trying them on the basis of secret evidence. It effectively repudiates the Geneva Conventions, putting American soldiers at risk.

The other bill, written by the only three Republican senators who were willing to defy the White House, preserves the conventions and creates a respectable trial process. But it defines "illegal enemy combatant" so broadly that the administration could apply it to almost any foreigner it chose, including legal United States residents. Both bills choke off judicial review and allow even those acquitted by a military tribunal to be held indefinitely.

Either bill might be acceptable if the United States government were infallible. As it is, they would legalize the sorts of abuses of power that the United States fought against in other countries for most of the 20th century.

PSB Says It Will Continue Probing Phone Records Case (AP)

AP, September 20, 2006

MONTPELIER, Vt. --State regulators plan to continue exploring whether telephone records were improperly released to the federal government even though the Justice Department has warned such an inquiry could run afoul of federal law.

"We have jurisdiction under state law to proceed in this matter and it has not been shown that federal law pre-empts that jurisdiction," the Public Service Board said.

Verizon and AT&T both operate in Vermont and news reports have suggested they might have turned over records of customer calls to the National Security Agency. Those companies' customers, Gov. Jim Douglas and the Vermont chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union urged the Public Service Board to determine whether Verizon and AT&T violated state statutes by cooperating with the NSA.

Verizon has said in the board's proceedings that it could not say whether it had cooperated with NSA, even if it wanted to, because federal law bars it.

But the Public Service Board said the privilege against answering the state's inquiry "belongs to the government and must be asserted by it. It can neither be claimed nor waived by a private party."

The federal government has declined to participate in the case before the Public Service Board and the Justice Department has said in a letter that it should be dropped. But the board says it concluded that no federal laws prevented it from pursuing the docket.

The federal government has sued Connecticut and New Jersey to block those states from pursuing the issue.

"The Vermont Public Service Board is being very brave in continuing its actions in this case," said Allen Gilbert, director of the Vermont ACLU. "Vermont might be the state that is able to get to the bottom of this."

Magic City (ME) Morning Star, September 20, 2006

PORTLAND — The MCLU went to court today to protect the privacy rights of Maine telephone customers. In a motion filed in U.S. District Court, the MCLU seeks an opportunity to have the consumers' voice heard in the Bush administration's lawsuit against the Maine Public Utilities Commission. The MCLU asked that the Verizon customers who initiated the privacy investigation at the Maine Public Utilities Commission be added to US. v. Kurt Adams et al as intervenor-defendants.

"The Justice Department is making up the law as it goes. It's a blatant attempt to intimidate Maine's Public Utilities Commission, but it won't work," said John Paterson, an MCLU cooperating attorney with Bernstein Shur. "Mainers deserve to know if their privacy rights were violated."

The MCLU asserts that the DOJ has no legal basis for suing the State of Maine. The Maine Public Utilities Commission has merely asked Verizon to confirm the truthfulness of statements it had already made publicly in press releases.

"Verizon's refusal to respond to our questions and now the Justice Department's lawsuit makes it look like Verizon has cooperated in Maine with the National Security Agency and that they are guilty of violating Mainers' privacy rights and possibly breaking the law," said James Cowie, lead intervenor-defendant, "The United States of America is not a place where citizens should have to expect that the government is eavesdropping on our private telephone conversations."

Today's filings follow on the heels of Attorney General Steve Rowe's vigorous defense of Maine's right to conduct an investigation. Congressmen Mike Michaud and Tom Allen have called on U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to withdraw the lawsuit. Fifteen Maine state senators and twenty-seven Maine state representatives signed a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales noting that state has both the authority and the responsibility to protect Mainers.

"The federal government has abused its authority to cover up what appears to be illegal surveillance of ordinary Americans," said Shenna Bellows, Executive Director of the Maine Civil Liberties Union, "No one, not the telephone companies and not the federal government, is above the law."

Maine was the third state to be sued by the federal government is this matter. The government has also sued the states of New Jersey and Missouri, and on September 6, the Department of Justice sued a fourth state, Connecticut, in an effort to prevent the state from determining whether the telephone companies or the federal government broke the law. The federal government is attempting to use the theory of "state secrets" to prevent any state level investigations or lawsuits against the warrantless National Security Agency surveillance program. The government's legal arguments were challenged in two recent legal victories for privacy advocates. In Hepting v. AT&T, a judge ruled that national security did not prevent consumers from moving forward with a lawsuit against the telephone companies. In ACLU v. NSA, a judge ruled portions of the warrantless National Security Agency surveillance program to be unconstitutional.

FBI Informant In Terror Case Says He Was Truthful (AP)

By Michael Virtanen, The Associated Press

AP, September 20, 2006

ALBANY, N.Y. (AP) — An FBI informant testified Tuesday that he did whatever an FBI agent told him, even if that meant misrepresenting himself as a big import-export businessman, Islamic radical and part-time arms dealer in the FBI sting that led to terrorism charges against two Albany Muslims.

Shahed Hussain acknowledged cooperating with the FBI in hopes of reducing his sentence after his 2001 arrest for helping immigrants fraudulently obtain state drivers' licenses in Albany. He maintained he has been truthful since, especially with FBI case agent Timothy Coll.

"My cooperation agreement tell me I could not do any kind of false statement with Mr. Coll or with any law enforcement," Hussain said.

The credibility of the Pakistani emigre is a central issue in the case, with defense attorneys saying Hussain not only lied to their clients, but in his past business dealings as a translator at the state Department of Motor Vehicles and to the FBI concerning their clients.

He testified that, following Coll's instructions, he represented himself first as a businessman and then as an arms dealer — "a wealthy, radical guy" — to Yassin Aref and Mohammed Hossain. They are accused of supporting terrorism by laundering $50,000 that Hussain claimed came from selling a shoulder-fired missile to terrorists.

It was a fictitious terrorist arms plot, and jurors will have to decide what the defendants knew or believed.

"I was not making up a story. I was telling exactly what he wanted me to," Hussain said, noting Coll coached him before every meeting. "It was an undercover operation so if you call that a lie, it's a lie."

Hossain, an Albany pizzeria owner, had sought a loan from Hussain. Muslim cleric Aref witnessed the transactions, involving $50,000 cash, with the pizzeria owner repaying $45,000 to the informant in checks over several months in 2004.

The Albany men also are accused through the transactions of supporting Jaish-e-Mohammed, or JEM, a Pakistan-based Islamic terrorist group, which informant claimed he supported.

Hussain acknowledged that Aref told him he didn't know anything about JEM besides what he'd seen on television. He and defense attorney Kent Sprotbery sparred over what Aref's subsequent comments meant, Hussain contending the imam told him to support JEM, the attorney saying Aref in a mini-sermon told him to ask God, and that Hussain deliberately dropped in a stray comment about a missile for the FBI's benefit.

Hussain also testified he showed the shoulder-fired missile launcher to Hossain at a videotaped meeting in November 2003, and the money transactions began in January 2004. He acknowledged that he never showed the weapon to Aref, though he did show both defendants the trigger mechanism, but only briefly while Aref was counting money.

Under cross-examination, he also acknowledged at a December 2003 meeting, as shown in the transcript, that he told Hossain: "Whatever I'm doing, I'm not doing anything wrong or breaking any law. ... I am not selling any kind of drugs, nor am I selling any kind of weapon that can cause a man to be killed. I am just delivering all this so that the Muslims can protect themselves from nonbelievers."

Hussain insisted to defense attorney Kevin Luibrand that he was referring only to Islamic law in that instance. He said his comments, as directed by Coll, were meant only to show he wasn't involved in any street crime.

Cheney Says Hopes Of World Rest On U.S. (AP-Y)

By Tom Raum

AP, September 19, 2006

Vice President Dick Cheney cast the global war on terror on Tuesday as a "war of nerves," borrowing a phrase Harry Truman used to describe the Cold War. Cheney asserted that the hopes of the civilized world depend on a U.S. victory.

"We are not going to let down our guard," Cheney told a convention of automobile dealers. He said President Bush "will not relent in the effort to track the enemies of the United States with every legitimate tool at his command."

He defended the administration's warrantless wiretapping and detainee programs, both subject to criticism from Democrats and some members of his own Republican party.

Cheney characterized as "just plain wrong" a federal judge's ruling earlier this month rejecting the administration's plea to throw out a lawsuit over the wiretapping program. "We hope it will be reversed on appeal," the vice president said.

U.S. District Judge Garr King in Portland, Ore., said he was not persuaded by the administration's argument that going ahead with the case would harm national security. It was the latest of several differing rulings on a program the administration says is essential to fight terrorism, but that civil-liberties groups decry as an overreaching of presidential authority.

Cheney said that, to President Truman, the term Cold War was "an expression he never much cared for and seldom used. He called it the war of nerves. When you think about it, that's an apt description of the kind of challenge America is now facing."

"The war on terror is a test of our strength, a test of our capabilities, and above all a test of our character," Cheney said.

"We know that the hopes of the civilized world ride with us. Our cause is right, it is just and this nation will prevail," Cheney added.

Speaking to the National Automobile Dealers Association, Cheney suggested that the U.S. economy was firing on all cylinders and seldom has been stronger. He credited Bush tax cuts in 2001 and 2003, and urged Congress to finish work on making them permanent.

Cheney told the dealers that modern automobiles are "marvels of design, performance and reliability. ... You're part of the reason America remains among the strongest economies in the world."

Cheney recalled that his own first car was a 1949 Chevrolet with several hundred thousand miles on it "which I drove with not much skill but plenty of enthusiasm. It had a lot of power. As I could recall, I could pretty much pass anything on the road except filling stations."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Study: Prisons Breed Islamic Extremists (AP-Y)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP, September 19, 2006

Jailed Islamic extremists with violent interpretations of the Quran are taking advantage of scarce religious monitoring programs to breed terrorists in U.S. prisons, a study released Tuesday shows.

State and local prison officials struggle to track radicalized behavior by inmates or religious counselors, the joint study by George Washington University and the University of Virginia found.

Many prisons can't afford preventive programs; in California, for example, officials reported "that every investigation into radical groups in their prisons uncovers new leads, but they simply do not have enough investigators to follow every case of radicalization."

"Radicalized prisoners are a potential pool of recruits by terrorist groups," concluded the study, released at a Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee hearing on "homegrown" terrorists. "The U.S., with its large prison population, is at risk of facing the sort of homegrown terrorism currently plaguing other countries."

An estimated 2 million people are imprisoned in the United States; 6 percent of them are Muslim, according to the Federal Bureau of Prisons.

Daveed Gartenstein-Ross, a counterterrorism consultant, told senators that "chilling" interpretations of the Quran were given to prison inmates when he worked for the al-Haramain Islamic Foundation, an international charity that served as a major al-Qaida financier.

The readings urged Muslims "to wage war against non-Muslims who have not submitted to Islamic rule," Gartenstein-Ross said in prepared testimony to the Senate panel.

"I know of only a few instances in which prisons rejected the literature we attempted to distribute — and it was never because of the literature's radicalism," said Gartenstein-Ross, who has since left the charity and converted to Christianity.

Prisons have long been considered recruiting stations for gangs and, more recently, terrorists, but little has been done throughout government to combat them. The Senate hearing came as law enforcement and intelligence officials focus on finding out how and why extremist homegrown sympathizers cross a line to become operational terrorists.

The panel's chair, Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, called the matter "an emerging threat to our national security." Added Sen. Tom Carper, D-Del., "While homegrown Islamic terrorism might not be as much of a threat as in say, Europe or some other places, we ignore the threat that does exist at our peril."

The report cited several high-profile cases of terrorists who became radicalized while incarcerated, including British shoe bomber Richard Reid. It also noted what authorities call a foiled plot of a potential shooting rampage against California military facilities, synagogues and the Israeli Consulate in Los Angeles by followers of Kevin James, who founded the radical group Jamiyyat Ul-Islam Is-Saheeh, or JIS, as an inmate at California State Prison in Sacramento.

Researchers interviewed federal, state and local prison officials, religious counselors and counterterror authorities in four states — California, New York, South Carolina and Ohio — and the District of Columbia. They concluded that federal prison authorities have made significant strides in collecting and sharing information to help monitor whether inmates are becoming radicalized.

But state and local prison officials have largely relied on contractors and volunteers to lead Islamic services because of a lack of well-trained Muslim chaplains, the report found. In New York, that led to several cases of "imams espousing violent views," it said.

The report noted a 2004 study that found that about half of 193 prisons surveyed supervised religious services or monitored them with video or audio recorders. "In the absence of monitoring by authoritative Islamic chaplains, materials that advocate violence have infiltrated the prison system undetected," it found.

Islamist Radicals In Prison: How Many? (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, September 20, 2006

NEW YORK

The radicalization and recruitment of terrorists in US prisons present a threat of "unknown magnitude," according to national security experts.

That's prompted leading analysts to call on Congress to set up a national commission to study the spread of radical ideologies in America's correctional systems.

Prisons have long been fertile breeding grounds for radical thought. Right-wing extremists, neo-Nazis, and Christian Identity groups have traditionally recruited and set up ideologically based gangs in these facilities. Radical Islamists have been more active in European prisons, but there have been a handful of documented cases of Islamist radicalization in US prisons.

The situation presents an opportunity for launching preventive strategies in the war on terror, experts say. The goal of the commission would be to ensure that the civil rights of inmates, as well as the redemptive aspects of all religions, are protected - while at the same time, systems can be put in place to prevent extremists from spreading distorted theologies that promote violence.

"Our concern is that isolated cases could end up dictating what could ultimately end up being bad policy. And the last thing we want is to victimize people who honestly want to practice their religion," says Gregory Saathoff, executive director of the Critical Incident Analysis Group at the University of Virginia in Charlottesville. "Paradoxically, that could create a backlash that could play into the hands of those interested in subverting the system."

The United States has the world's largest prison population, with more than 2 million inmates. It also has the world's highest incarceration rate - 701 of every 100,000 people are in prison or jail. Islam is the fastest-growing religion behind bars, which makes the system a desirable target for terrorist organizations to recruit new members, experts say. But people familiar with the prison system say the vast majority of Muslim inmates are African-Americans and Hispanics who turned to Islam for spiritual development or protection and camaraderie.

Indeed, there's little interaction between the Muslim community on the inside with the one on the outside. For instance, in New York State there are an estimated 200 Muslim prison volunteers, compared with more than 4,000 Christian volunteers. "The stage hasn't been set for the type of collaborations that folks are trying to suggest, and given the fact that most [Muslim inmates] are Americans, terrorism is the last thing they'd want to be involved in," says Mika'il DeVeaux of the Muslim Re-entry Initiative, a nonprofit group in New York dedicated to helping released inmates reintegrate.

Mr. DeVeaux was a Muslim leader during the 25 years he spent in New York State prisons for a murder conviction. He says there are stark differences between American-born Muslims in prison and immigrant Muslim prisoners, who make up a very small fraction of the population.

"I encourage local imams to seize the agenda from the immigrant Muslims and stop allowing them to define for Westerners what Islam is and what the Muslim agenda is," he says.

But he and others with experience behind bars see potential for extremists of all kinds to indoctrinate and recruit young, alienated prisoners. The practice is more prevalent in European prisons, where the Muslim population is primarily made up of first- and second-generation immigrants with close ties to South Asia. Richard Reid, the attempted shoe bomber who was arrested in 2001, converted and became radicalized, according to prosecutors, while behind bars in Britain.

There has been only one publicly documented incident in the United States where officials say home-grown prison Islamists attempted to directly foment violence on the outside: In September 2005, police in California disrupted what they say was a plot by Kevin Lamar James, a self-styled leader of an Islamist inmate group, to blow up government facilities and Jewish synagogues in the Los Angeles area.

In 2004, a study by the inspector general of federal prisons found there was no coherent system for screening out extremist chaplains, and more than half of all religious services were not monitored. The Federal Bureau of Prisons responded by setting up a vetting process for its chaplains and religious volunteers. But 93 percent of inmates are in state and local prisons, which have a shortage of qualified Muslim chaplains as well as a lack of trained correctional officers to identify extremist ideology.

A report by George Washington University's Homeland Security Policy Institute and Dr. Saathoff's Critical Incident Analysis Group, which was released Tuesday, says it's essential for local, state, and federal correctional officials to work closely with one another as well as the FBI. Then, they say, extremists within the prison system, and those on the outside who want to exploit it, can be identified and tracked. But they acknowledge it will be a challenge, particularly since most American prisons are overcrowded, and many are understaffed.

"The really critical thing here is information," says Jeffrey Raynor of the Institute of Law, Psychiatry and Public Policy at the University of Virginia, who co-wrote the report. "Inmates often move between these systems, and we need to find innovative ways to integrate information so we can understand how to most efficiently short-circuit [the potential for terrorist recruitment] with our limited resources."

Islamists In U.S. Prisons Pose Threat, Report Says (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, September 20, 2006

Islamic extremists in U.S. prisons have taken advantage of a lack of religious monitoring to embrace violent interpretations of the Koran, posing a threat of "unknown magnitude" to national security, a report said yesterday.

"Prisons have long been places where extremist ideology and calls to violence could find a willing ear, and conditions are often conducive to radicalization," according to a study by George Washington University and the University of Virginia.

"With the world's largest prison population and highest incarceration rate, America faces what could be an enormous challenge -- every radicalized prisoner becomes a potential terrorist recruit," said the study, which was conducted for the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee.

An estimated 2 million people are imprisoned in the United States, and 6 percent of them are Muslim, according to the U.S. Bureau of Prisons.

Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, the committee's ranking Democrat, said homegrown terrorism is a "grave enough concern" that Congress needs to consider whether to focus more attention and resources on it.

"What controls can we put into place to curtail such conversions? Unfortunately, the number of qualified Islamic chaplains, or imams, is insufficient," Mr. Lieberman said, noting that although more than 80 percent of religious conversions in prison are to some form of Islam, only 10 of the 200 chaplains in the federal system are devoted to Islam.

The study said that just as young people may become radicalized by "cut-and-paste" versions of the Koran via the Internet, "new inmates may gain the same distorted understanding of the faith from gang leaders or other influential inmates."

Although radicalization is neither unique to Islam nor a recent phenomenon, an inadequate number of Muslim religious services providers increases the risk, the study said.

Additionally, it said, the inability to track inmates after their release and a lack of social support to reintegrate them into the community give rise to a "vulnerable moment" in which they may be recruited by radical groups posing as social support organizations.

The study said "Jailhouse Islam" incorporates violent prison culture into religious practice; a lack of manpower and resources hinder efforts to combat prisoner radicalization; and information collection and sharing among federal, state and local prison systems to track radical behavior and religious services providers is "difficult to assess."

The study said that no one profession was equipped to analyze and recommend change and that a multidisciplinary approach of religion, criminal justice, intelligence, law and behavioral sciences was necessary for "proactive analysis of the phenomenon." It also called on Congress to establish a commission to investigate the issue.

According to the study, prison gangs may adopt a form of Islam that incorporates values of gang loyalty and violence, and several imams characterized the phenomenon as a significant threat to security in prisons.

The study noted several connections between former prisoners and terrorism, including:

•Jeff Fort, a Chicago gang leader who converted to Islam while incarcerated in 1965. Fort founded a street gang known as El Rukn, which later brokered a deal with Libya to carry out attacks on U.S. police stations, government facilities, military bases and airplanes in exchange for $2.5 million and asylum in Tripoli.

•Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman, the radical Egyptian cleric who plotted to bomb New York City landmarks in 1993. Sentenced to a life term, he issued a decree from federal prison ordering Muslims to kill Americans "wherever you find them." Terror mastermind Osama bin Laden later said that edict gave religious authority for the September 11 attacks.

•Richard C. Reid, who is thought to have converted to radical Islam while incarcerated in Great Britain. He was later apprehended while attempting to detonate a bomb on a U.S. commercial flight in December 2001.

FBI Raids Mo. Islamic Leader's Home (WP/AP)

By Alan Scher Zagier, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 20, 2006

COLUMBIA, Mo. -- FBI agents searched the home of a prominent Islamic community leader and Iraq war critic, a bureau spokesman said, declining to reveal any reasons for the search.

A dozen agents searched the home of Shakir Abdul-Kaf Hamoodi and his wife on Monday, FBI spokesman Jeff Lanza said. Agents removed boxes and computer equipment throughout the day, neighbors said.

The search warrant has been sealed, and Lanza would not comment on what the agents were looking for.

Federal agents on Monday also raided the offices of a Southfield, Mich., Muslim charity organization, Life for Relief and Development, where Hamoodi has worked.

In that raid, the warrants were based on a criminal assertion, but the affidavits were sealed, William Kowalski, an assistant special agent in the FBI's Detroit office, told the Detroit Free Press.

The Michigan charity's head of legal services, Ihsan Alkhatib, said the agents are investigating whether the charity conducted business in Iraq before the 2003 war in violation of legal sanctions against the country.

Alkhatib said the organization "did everything by the book."

Lanza declined to discuss whether the Michigan and Missouri searches were connected.

Hamoodi, 54, is a former University of Missouri engineering professor who now owns an international grocery store. He said he has worked as a paid organizer and fundraiser for the organization for several years. He said he cooperated fully with federal investigators.

"They came in, asked questions, I told them the answers and they left," he told the Columbia Missourian.

Hamoodi, who grew up in Iraq but has lived in Columbia for 21 years, has been an outspoken critic of the Iraq war and recently had his home defaced with graffiti.

The search came three days after bureau officials met with Muslims at a local mosque to try to improve community relations.

FBI Scours 2 Houses Owned By Pilot In Wales Case (SEATT)

By Steve Miletich, Seattle Times staff reporter

Seattle Times, September 20, 2006

FBI agents conducted searches last month in the slaying of Seattle federal prosecutor Thomas Wales, combing two houses owned by an airline pilot long under investigation in the 2001 killing.

Agents looked for evidence to tie the pilot to an anonymous letter sent to the Seattle FBI office in January, said a law-enforcement official, speaking on condition of anonymity because the investigation is continuing.

The letter's author wrote that the killing was carried out by a hit man from Las Vegas, a claim the FBI discounted as an amateurish attempt to throw off investigators. As such, the letter writer could be charged with obstruction of justice.

The letter was postmarked about the same time the pilot was in Las Vegas for a visit, according to sources familiar with the investigation.

The searches took place at the pilot's Snohomish home and a house he owns in Bellevue, neighbors at both locations said.

FBI spokeswoman Robbie Burroughs in Seattle said she couldn't comment.

The pilot, contacted Tuesday outside his Snohomish home, declined comment. He recently moved there, after living for years at the Bellevue address. The Seattle Times is not naming the pilot because he hasn't been charged with a crime.

Wales, 49, who prosecuted the pilot in a fraud case in 2000, was shot to death in his Queen Anne home on Oct. 11, 2001.

The searches represent the most visible activity in the investigation since top FBI officials stripped the case from the Seattle FBI office in June and put it under the direction of the Portland office. The move came after the head of the Seattle office tried to reduce the number of investigators on the case, sparking an outcry from law-enforcement officials in Seattle.

The pilot's Snohomish neighbors said 15 to 20 FBI agents swarmed the house on a weekday morning in late August, wearing clearly marked jackets that brought onlookers onto the suburban street.

"They were there all day," said one woman, who asked not to be named.

Neighbors couldn't recall the exact date but said agents spent a lot of time searching and photographing a Suburban SUV and a Mercedes sedan before combing the house.

The pilot and his family were home at the time but left during the search, neighbors said.

At the Bellevue house, more than a dozen agents searched the premises several weeks ago, said a neighbor who couldn't recall the date.

The search marked the third time FBI agents have obtained a search warrant for the Bellevue house since Wales was killed, the most recent occurring in April 2004.

Before the killing, the pilot was indicted by Wales on charges he and others improperly altered a Vietnam-era military helicopter to make it look like a civilian model they could sell. The charges against the individuals were dropped, but a company they had formed pleaded guilty.

After the plea agreement, the pilot sued the government for malicious prosecution, seeking more than $125,000 in legal fees. The case was dismissed by a federal district judge.

Court documents related to the latest search warrants, and the previous ones, are sealed. But for each warrant, investigators must present new information for probable cause to a judge.

The Las Vegas letter gave investigators a new lead.

FBI behavioral experts considered it an unrealistic account of a hired killing but concluded it was likely written by someone tied to Wales' killing.

The investigation is a top priority of the FBI, with a $1 million reward. If Wales was killed because of his work, he would be the first federal prosecutor in U.S. history to be slain in the line of duty.

Wales was shot while sitting at his computer in his basement. The assailant fired from the backyard and then fled.

ENEMIES (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, September 20, 2006

Bill Gertz, defense and national security reporter for The Washington Times, describes a growing threat posed by foreign agents and terrorists who exploit U.S. weaknesses in this second of three excerpt from his new book, "Enemies: How America's Foes Steal Our Vital Secrets -- And How We Let It Happen" (Crown Forum), out this week. Read Part 1 here and Part 2 here.

The FBI, the CIA and other intelligence agencies continue to struggle to plant agents in, or recruit them from, deadly Islamist terror organizations here and abroad.

The FBI, for example, did not have under way a single active investigation this past spring of al Qaeda or any Islamist group anywhere in the United States.

Osama bin Laden's al Qaeda network is not alone in posing a threat of new attacks. The FBI believes that Lebanon-based Hezbollah has set up terrorist cells in at least 10 U.S. cities.

The Iranian government has backed Hezbollah to the tune of $100 million. FBI officials worry that Iran could activate a network of Hezbollah terrorists here if the international community acts to stop the Islamic regime's nuclear program.

President Bush expects the FBI to help counter such terror threats through its new National Security Branch (NSB), a major reform he announced over internal opposition in summer 2005.

"The focus of what we're doing has changed over our history," said Gary M. Bald, the 28-year FBI veteran chosen to direct the NSB, which combined counterterrorism, counterintelligence and intelligence-analysis divisions. "This is the most significant [change], no doubt. But it's just the latest.

"It's not the embracing or the understanding of the need to do it," Bald said in an interview. "It's getting us efficient at something that we've not had a long experience at doing."

The FBI and the rest of the U.S. intelligence community was woefully unprepared after September 11 to track down terrorists by penetrating the dark world of al Qaeda.

The nation had extremely limited capabilities in human intelligence-gathering -- the real stuff of spying. These shortcomings remain five years later.

Rep. Peter Hoekstra, Michigan Republican and chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, argues that many problems facing U.S. intelligence are a legacy of the Clinton administration.

"It's ineffective in 2006 because it was gutted in 1996," Mr. Hoekstra said, pointing to the severe depletion of human spying capabilities in the 1990s.

Left largely unsaid in this year's debate about the president's authorizing the National Security Agency to intercept suspected terrorists' communications: The administration might not have needed to rely on the program so heavily, and risk infringing on civil liberties, were American counterintelligence not so weak.

The government needed to take extraordinary measures to track down al Qaeda cells. And despite the terrorist surveillance program and stepped-up FBI activity, U.S. intelligence has not found any al Qaeda cells inside this country.

'Work in progress'

A presidential commission organized in 2004 revealed the FBI's ineptness in conducting counterintelligence and counterterrorism programs.

The Commission on the Intelligence Capabilities of the United States Regarding Weapons of Mass Destruction (commonly referred to as the WMD commission) examined how and why the intelligence community failed to properly assess Iraq's nuclear, chemical, biological and missile weapons programs.

The WMD commission, headed by federal appeals Judge Laurence Silberman and former Sen. Charles S. Robb, Virginia Democrat, also explored the overall capabilities of U.S. spy agencies.

A section on "intelligence at home," included in the panel's report issued in March 2005, said the FBI had made strides in collecting and analyzing intelligence but had "a long way to go." The bureau, it said, acknowledged that domestic intelligence gathering "will be a work in progress until at least 2010."

The biggest challenge, the report found, was integrating FBI operations into a command structure that is subject to orders from the director of national intelligence, John D. Negroponte, whose recently created job is to oversee the nation's 15 spy agencies.

The commission called for creation of a National Security Service to manage, direct and control all FBI resources used in countering terrorists, spies and other threats to national security.

The panel said the FBI needed to move past decades of bitter rivalry with the CIA that prevented the agencies from complementing each other's efforts in the war on terror.

"Past efforts to build a strong intelligence capability within the FBI have foundered on this resistance," the report said. "In 1998 and 1999, similar reforms failed in quick succession as a result of strong resistance from the FBI's operational divisions and an intelligence architecture that could not defend itself inside the bureaucracy."

Law-enforcement investigators did not want to become spies. And bin Laden, they argued, "is never going to Des Moines."

'More capable'

Mr. Bush overruled internal opposition and announced creation of a national-security section within the FBI on June 29, 2005, and chose to highlight the change during a July 11 speech at the FBI Academy in Quantico.

The president said the reform, among 70 recommendations from the WMD commission that he backed, would make the FBI "more capable to stop the terrorist acts before they happen."

The next month, FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III appointed Bald, a career law-enforcement investigator with little experience in intelligence, as director of the redubbed National Security Branch.

Although Bald was the FBI executive for counterterrorism and counterintelligence, close observers saw his selection as a clear sign that the bureau would continue to oppose building an aggressive counterterrorism and counterspy capability.

Bald, though, bristles at the suggestion that the FBI had a cultural aversion to improving intelligence-gathering.

"It's a culture of complete dedication to our mission, working around the clock, being called in on weekends and nights and not getting paid extra, and really doing everything you can to protect our nation," Bald said.

He said a substantial number of 12,000 special agents work for his new branch, although the actual number is classified. All of the bureau's 1,720 intelligence analysts are part of the NSB.

The FBI hasn't found it easy to change an institutional viewpoint of being its own "primary customer of information," Bald said. He said he worries that leaks of sensitive information could wrongly damage the reputations of those under investigation.

"Now what we're in is a realization that not only are there other services that benefit from our intelligence, but other services can provide value to our investigations as well," Bald said. "We understand that. The challenge is developing the processes that make that efficient."

'Safe from scrutiny'

Even as adversaries and friends alike ramp up intelligence activities against the United States, the WMD commission's final report warned, "our counterintelligence efforts remain fractured, myopic and marginally effective."

The report stated bluntly: "Our counterintelligence philosophy and practices need dramatic change, starting with centralizing counterintelligence leadership, bringing order to bureaucratic disarray and taking [the CIA's] counterintelligence fight overseas to adversaries currently safe from scrutiny."

Since the 1970s, some 15 agencies have been severely restricted in trying to stop foreign spies and, increasingly, terrorists. Multiple special commissions and reports, many before September 11, identified the problems.

Taking advantage of these severe deficiencies, spies -- among them John A. Walker, Aldrich Ames, Robert Hanssen, Ana Montes and Katrina Leung -- have significantly weakened U.S. intelligence and defense capabilities.

China and Russia have stolen sensitive technology on a massive scale. Enemies have penetrated every single U.S. national-security agency except the Coast Guard. They have purloined nuclear weapons data, cryptographic codes and procedures, intelligence sources and methods, war plans and more.

The continuing threats include Cuba and North Korea as well as the traditional intelligence powers, China and Russia, which use official and nonofficial cover officers to target American interests.

And then there are the nonstate actors that could well pose an even greater danger: al Qaeda, Hezbollah and other terror organizations. The CIA and other U.S. agencies have almost no knowledge of terrorists' intelligence practices here.

Attack first

Richard Haver, former special assistant for intelligence to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, helped assess the damage in major spy cases since the 1980s. He points to widespread resistance within government to making the necessary reforms.

"We do the things that are easy, we do the things that are cosmetically appealing, that make the system feel better," Haver said in an interview, "and that perhaps satiate the critics in Congress and placate the media and make it look as though we're really changing."

Haver argues that true reforms are not about more money or agency-wiring diagrams.

"They have to do with culture," he said. "They have to do with the way these bureaucracies view themselves, the way they work with each other."

In the infamous case of Hanssen, the spy for Moscow, the FBI was unwilling even to look for a spy in its midst, and so he operated for years without being caught.

"The best defense is a good offense," Haver said. "If you are sitting back, waiting for the enemy to attack you, it will happen. If you want effective counterintelligence, the principal element of that is the capability of your system to attack the adversary intelligence service before they attack you."

Project Aims To Foil Hijack Attempts (WT)

By Al Webb

The Washington Times, September 20, 2006

LONDON -- Five years after the September 11 terrorist attacks, a hijack-proof airliner still seems the impossible dream, but the next best thing to it could begin guarding the world's airways within two to four years.

A consortium of European scientists is working on a $46 million project to thwart terrorists bent on capturing and destroying an aircraft in flight after they have managed to sneak through airport security.

More than 100 aviation specialists from 31 companies are involved in the project, part of a plan known as Security of Aircraft in the Future European Environment (SAFEE), to create a so-called "last barrier to attack" by hijackers.

Scientists at one of the companies, defense giant BAE Systems in Bristol, England, say that at the heart of their work is development of a computer system that could automatically seize control of a threatened airliner and prevent a hijacker from steering it into a mountain or tall building.

Such a system is viewed as the "holy grail" of aircraft security, designed to foil tragedies such as the September 11, 2001, hijacked-airliner attacks that killed nearly 3,000 people in the U.S.

Total safety may be impossible, researchers concede.

"You never reach zero level of threat, no risk," SAFEE program coordinator Daniel Gaultier, of the French technology company Sagem Defense Securite, told journalists recently. "But if you equip planes with onboard electronics, it will make them very, very difficult to hijack."

Researchers at BAE Systems say components of the new system are being tested and could be in operation by 2008. Others say 2010 is a more realistic date.

Even a limited deployment would represent a major advance in aircraft safety. Improvements since the September 11 attacks have been limited largely to reinforcing cockpit doors and deploying sky marshals.

The continuing threat of another major terror spectacle in the skies was highlighted by last month's raids in Britain in which authorities arrested two dozen young British Muslims suspected of planning to smuggle liquid explosives aboard about 10 jetliners and detonate them over the Atlantic Ocean.

A key element in the SAFEE project involves a secure cockpit biometrics system of fingerprints, iris and other scans that would make the aircraft controls unusable for anyone other than an approved pilot.

Even if terrorists managed to break into the cockpit, a "hazard-avoidance" computer would take control of the aircraft and guide it to a safe landing at the nearest airport, avoiding tall buildings and other hazards.

Still other enhancements the SAFEE scientists want to develop include the use of TV cameras, microphones and other sensors to keep tabs on any suspicious passenger behavior.

"We want to detect a threat early, before someone storms the cockpit or flight deck," Catherine Neary, a human factors specialist at BAE Systems, told ABC News.

Also around the corner, the SAFEE researchers hope, are an "electronic nose" to check passengers as they board; cameras at check-in desks to verify passenger biometric data; and an electronic-chip-based system to match passengers with their luggage.

There are skeptics. Britt Marshall, a former law-enforcement officer and Interpol agent, reminded the Internet publication TechNewsWorld that "the Titanic was billed as the ship that was unsinkable."

"Now we know," Mr. Marshall said, "that there is no ship in this world that is unsinkable, no plane that is non-hijackable and no marriage that is undivorceable."

Appeals Court Upholds Firing Of Muslim Pilot (AP)

By Jim Salter, The Associated Press

AP, September 20, 2006

ST. LOUIS -- A Muslim pilot fired a week after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks was let go because he was seen in a bar in uniform, not because of religious bigotry, a three-judge federal appeals court panel ruled Tuesday.

The panel of the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed a district court judge's ruling that Trans States Airlines did not violate discrimination laws in firing Mohammed Shanif Hussein of San Bruno, Calif., on Sept. 18, 2001.

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission office in St. Louis filed the suit on behalf of Hussein. EEOC attorney Robert Johnson said the agency was still considering whether to seek a hearing before the full 8th Circuit.

"We're disappointed with the ruling," Johnson said. "We considered it a strong case of discrimination because of the reaction to what happened on 9-11."

Hussein does not have a listed telephone number.

Bill Mishk, a spokesman for Trans States, said the company is "obviously pleased that the appeals court agreed with our position."

Hussein, of Indian descent and a native of the island Fiji, moved to the U.S. in 1997 and was hired as a probationary pilot by Trans States, a commuter airline based in the St. Louis suburb of Bridgeton.

Two days after the terrorist attacks, on Sept. 13, with commercial air travel still suspended, Hussein returned a Trans States plane to Lambert Airport in St. Louis, then rented a room at a Howard Johnson's hotel.

Trans States vice president of flight operations Daniel Reed received an anonymous phone call from someone saying a pilot in a Trans States uniform was seen in a hotel bar. That person, the caller told Reed, raised his beer in a salute when a TV image showed a replay of one of the planes striking the World Trade Center.

The caller said he read the name Hussein on the pilot's identification tag, and Reed determined the pilot was Mohammed Hussein. Reed said he fired Hussein because he was in uniform in a bar, not because of his religion.

Court documents indicate Hussein told an FBI agent that he was drinking in the bar, but did not do anything to show support for the terrorists. He said he was seen smiling not because of the attacks, but because he had just learned his wife was pregnant.

Crisis Seen In Luggage Screening (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, September 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — The nation's airports face a looming crisis in their ability to screen checked luggage for bombs that will require billions of dollars to avert, a new report ordered by Congress says.

Many airports have too few screeners and use slow, labor-intensive bomb detectors that are being overwhelmed by increasing passenger traffic, the study says.

The report criticizes how bomb detectors were installed in airports after 9/11. Because of a tight deadline, “many if not most of the implementations were suboptimal,” it says.

The van-sized machines clog terminals and operate so slowly that flights are sometimes held up or bags don't make it onto their flights, airport officials say. Those problems will worsen unless luggage scanners are replaced at most U.S. airports with faster machines that are part of baggage-conveyor systems.

“It's very urgent,” said James Bennett, CEO of the authority that runs Washington's Reagan National and Dulles airports. “It's one of the — if not the — most pressing improvement that needs to be made in aviation security.”

Jim Crites, operations chief at Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport, said “there is no more room” in airports for additional luggage scanners, “and yet you have more demand coming on.”

The 220-page report was written by officials from airports, airlines, design firms and the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) in August, before new restrictions for carry-on bags led to a huge increase in checked luggage. That surge “has further stressed the system,” Bennett said.

Rep. John Mica, R-Fla., chairman of the House's aviation subcommittee, questioned whether Congress would approve the proposed $4.8 billion. “Unfortunately, Congress is not ready to face the reality of the problem,” Mica said.

Congress ordered a study in late 2004 of how to install faster luggage scanners.

The report suggests spreading costs by selling federal tax credits that would be redeemed over many years, and by making airports pay $700 million. That plan would move up the installation of new machines to 2013 instead of 2024, when they'd be in place without special financing.

Faster, more automated bomb detectors would cut some personnel costs, the report says. They also would improve security by reducing the percentage of bags screened using less-reliable methods to 5% from 25% or higher during busy periods, and by reducing crowds in airport lobbies that are potential targets for terrorists.

High-speed scanners expected to be ready in a year or two would screen bags at 10 times the rate of current machines. False alarms, which now force screeners to search 15% to 25% of checked bags, could be lower, the report says.

The TSA received the report last week after an agency advisory committee unanimously approved it. The TSA will consider whether to endorse the study and seek congressional approval for financing the new machines.

Air Marshals Ousted Over Job Injuries (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, September 20, 2006

The size of the federal air marshal force has been cut in half by on-the-job injuries that have sidelined nearly 2,100 marshals, while squabbling prevents health and safety policies from being implemented, government officials say.

Marshals say medical staffers are quitting the Federal Air Marshal Service (FAMS) out of frustration as hundreds develop illnesses related to their heavy flying schedules such as barotrauma, decompression sickness that causes ruptured eardrums and sinus conditions often requiring surgery.

They are also developing deep vein thrombosis, a disease attributed to long periods of sitting that causes blood clots, usually in the legs, that could lead to cardiac arrest.

A July 21, 2005, memo from the Charlotte, N.C., field office obtained by The Washington Times says it was "experiencing a large amount of missed missions due to federal air marshals calling in sick and medical groundings by physicians."

"Five percent nationwide are affected by sinus and ear problems daily. These groundings all have a commonality of being directly related to our current flight schedules," said the memo, citing 17 documented cases of barotrauma in its office.

"Our health is being eroded at an alarming rate," it said.

Policies to prevent such injuries or to determine sick leave and light duty for injured marshals are being held up by fights over wording and punctuation, said one air marshal. Others say they were fired for their disability then denied workers' compensation.

"They have a track record of that," said Frank Terreri, director of the Federal Law Enforcement Officers Association for the Federal Air Marshal Service. "As soon as you're hurt, you're done. Every other law-enforcement agency offers you another position if you're hurt in the line of duty. If I got hurt tomorrow, I would be done, and you just can't treat employees like that."

Conan Bruce, spokesman for the air marshal service, did not return several calls for comment.

The Federal Aviation Administration does not regulate the number of takeoffs and landings for commercial air pilots but limits them to eight hours of flight in a 24-hour period, said spokeswoman Alison Duquette.

However, pilots get 16 hours of layover time compared with 10 or 12 hours for marshals. Pilots are able to move around the cockpit and do not experience DVT, says David Mackett, president of the Airline Pilots Security Alliance.

"Pilots experience different health issues because their job is very different from what air marshals do; [marshals are] experiencing all kinds of health problems," Mr. Mackett said.

In 2005, marshals typically flew three legs a day. Because of rapid attrition, along with a demand that more flights be covered, marshals now average four flights a day, five days in a row, then two days off.

From Oct. 1, 2003, through Sept. 14, 2006, the Labor Department says 2,450 air marshals applied for workers' compensation. Air marshal officials protested or "controverted" 226 claims, according to a Labor Department official who added that the board denied more than 300 applications.

Jimmie Bacco was undergoing brain surgery at the Mayo Clinic to stop cerebral spinal fluid from leaking out of his ear when he was fired because he could no longer perform his duty. His disability claim has been denied, and he owes the clinic $80,000.

"The amount of guys terminated because of this is enormous," says Mr. Bacco, one of several current and former air marshals now coming forward to confront the agency. "Some are demoted and given administrative positions at half their pay, others are terminated."

Shawn McCullers was fired after developing deep vein thrombosis but still acts as the vice president of health and safety for the law-enforcement association for FAMS and has advised more than 70 marshals on getting claims approved.

"It's quite ridiculous; medical issues are rampant throughout the service," Mr. McCullers said.

One former air marshal asked to stay overnight at Los Angeles after a flight form Newark, N.J., rather than continue his mission to Seattle because of head pain, but the marshal was ordered to complete the flight. He did, and "blew out his eardrum," Mr. Bacco said.

No longer able to fly, the marshal took a train home to Newark.

"What they are doing, is basically getting away with murder, and there is no oversight for them whatsoever," Mr. Bacco said.

Last year's Air Marshals Service budget for workers' compensation was $3 million and went $3 million over budget. This year's budget is $6 million, but $7 million has already been spent.

Boeing Wins Deal For Border Security (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, September 20, 2006

Aerospace and defense giant Boeing Co. has won a multibillion-dollar contract to revamp how the United States guards about 6,000 miles of border in an attempt to curb illegal immigration, congressional sources said yesterday.

Boeing's proposal relied heavily on a network of 1,800 towers, most of which would need to be erected along the borders with Mexico and Canada. Each tower would be equipped with a variety of sensors, including cameras and heat and motion detectors.

The company's efforts would be the basis of the government's latest attempt to control U.S. borders after a series of failures. The contract, part of the Secure Border Initiative and known as SBInet, will again test the ability of technology to solve a problem that lawmakers have called a critical national security concern. This time, the private sector is being given an unusually large say in how to do it.

Boeing sold its plan to the Homeland Security Department as less risky and less expensive than competing proposals that would have relied heavily on drones for routine surveillance work. Boeing plans only limited use of small unmanned aerial vehicles that could be launched from the backs of Border Patrol trucks when needed to help pursue suspects.

The system is to be installed first along the Mexican border in an area south of Tucson known to be a key crossing point for illegal immigrants. The company has said it can deploy the system along both borders within three years.

The public announcement of the award is planned for tomorrow. Several congressional and industry sources yesterday confirmed that Boeing had defeated four other companies in one of the most closely watched and intensely fought contract competitions this year. The sources spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the competition. Homeland Security spokesman Larry Orluskie said the department was "really close" to making an award.

Boeing officials declined to comment, pending official notification. In an interview this month, Boeing executive Wayne Esser said that despite the company's aviation experience, it wanted to keep its border surveillance systems on the ground. "The aerial platform just goes off the map from a cost standpoint," he said.

Homeland Security has been criticized harshly in recent years for initiatives that have either failed or far exceeded their budgets. In one case, cameras that the department installed on the borders broke down in bad weather.

"The administration has spent $429 million of the taxpayer's money to try and secure our borders with two already-abandoned border security programs," said Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss). He expressed concern that the same thing will happen to SBInet.

Mindful of that record, Boeing emphasized that all its technology has been proven to work. "The low-risk approach is probably going to carry weight here," Esser said.

From the beginning, department officials told industry leaders that they wanted immediate results. The contract proposed giving the private sector wide latitude in helping U.S. Customs and Border Protection figure out the right combination of technology, infrastructure and personnel needed to stop immigrants, terrorists and criminals from illegally crossing into the United States.

Deputy Homeland Security Secretary Michael P. Jackson said this year that he wanted the companies "to come back and tell us how to do our business."

SBInet has been regarded all year by many industry executives as a critical prize, since the Homeland Security Department's budget continues to boom and no single company has emerged to dominate the market.

As a result, there was pitched competition among defense companies for a contract that is estimated to be worth about $2.5 billion over the next four years. The contest included five prime contractors -- Lockheed Martin Corp., Northrop Grumman Corp., Raytheon Co., Ericsson Inc. and Boeing. Each rounded up dozens of subcontractors, bringing a wide variety of defense and technology firms into the competition.

Boeing's subcontractors include a Washington division of L-3 Communications Holdings Inc. and a Reston division of information technology firm Unisys Corp.

Boeing has been one of the Defense Department's largest contractors for decades, and has been trying to win Homeland Security awards since the department was created.

In pursuing this contract, Boeing pointed to its work installing explosive-detection systems at more than 400 airports in less than six months following the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. But that contract was criticized by the Homeland Security's inspector general's office, which found that Boeing received $49 million in excess profit on a deal that was supposed to be worth $508 million but ballooned to $1.2 billion. Investigators also found that Boeing had subcontracted 92 percent of the work, and that the machines had high false-alarm rates. The company disputed those findings.

Winning SBInet is considered an important victory for Boeing as it seeks to overcome a number of recent setbacks, including a scandal in which a Pentagon official admitted favoring the company in exchange for a job, and the loss this summer in the competition to build the next U.S. manned spacecraft.

Boeing Said To Be Selected To Lead Border Program (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 19 — After a face-off among large military contractors, the Boeing Company was picked by the Homeland Security Department to lead a high-tech effort to secure borders, Congressional officials who were briefed on the decision said Tuesday.

The contract will at least initially be much more limited than some industry officials had expected, valued at $80 million instead of the $2 billion estimate given for the six-year deal, the officials said.

Boeing will be asked to install or at least help supervise the installation of a combination of sensors, cameras, fences, vehicle barricades and small unmanned aerial vehicles starting near Tucson, which has some of the heaviest traffic of illegal immigrants.

Boeing beat out teams led by Lockheed Martin, Northrop Grumman, Raytheon and Ericsson based on a plan that put far less emphasis on costly unmanned aerial vehicles.

Wayne Esser, who led the Boeing bid, said the company's strategy focused on coming up with a solution that could be expanded to all 7,500 miles of the United States border without compromising the ability of the Homeland Security Department to pay for its many antiterrorism initiatives.

"This is not a Department of Defense type of procurement," Mr. Esser said in an interview before his company was notified of its selection. "Customs and Border Protection just doesn't have that kind of a budget."

The program, the Secure Border Initiative, is a central element of the Bush administration's plan to curtail illegal immigration. The president also wants a temporary-worker program to give legal standing to many illegal immigrants already in this country.

The Senate may vote as early as Wednesday on bills to direct the department to build a 700-mile two-layer fence between Mexico and the United States, about a third of the shared border. The House has passed the proposal.

Such a fence could require fewer of the high-tech measures that Boeing would provide.

Because major gaps on that border would remain and because there are no plans for a large-scale fence along the Canadian border, the alternative methods of monitoring thousands of miles would continue to be necessary.

Under the Boeing plan, towers would be built along the border with radar systems to watch for movement, as well as cameras that could zoom in on movements to determine whether the subject was a vehicle, animals or people.

Ground sensors to detect movement, sound or simply contact would be installed, particularly where tree coverage makes the radar and cameras less effective, Mr. Esser said.

Northrop Grumman had proposed using an unmanned aerial vehicle, a drone known as the Global Hawk, that flies as high as 65,000 feet for up to 34 hours, to help monitor the border. Each vehicle can cost tens of millions of dollars.

Lockheed Martin had proposed using, among other tools, a high-altitude balloon known as a tethered aerostat that flies at up to 15,000 feet and, weather permitting, can be left up for a long time.

The Boeing proposal includes small, relatively inexpensive unmanned aerial vehicles that can be launched from a pickup truck by an agent in the field and then fly for, perhaps, 90 minutes. These vehicles could help apprehend illegal immigrants, but they would not be routinely used to monitor large stretches of the border.

The Boeing team also looked for ways to reduce the cost of sending out Border Patrol agents, by figuring out how long it could allow illegal immigrants, even after they have been detected across the border, to continue walking or driving before it would be necessary to seize them.

"We don't have to pick them up in the desert," Mr. Esser said. "We can pick them up once they reach the road."

The contract could still turn into a deal worth up to $2 billion for Boeing over the next six years.

Winning this contract will help the company sell its services to other countries looking to secure their borders.

Among contractors, this was considered one of the three most important contracts offered by the Homeland Security Department. The others involved rebuilding the Coast Guard fleet of ships, helicopters and planes and creating a tracking system for visitors who enter the United States legally.

Members of Congress have expressed some skepticism about whether the department will be able to succeed in this border effort because of the failure of previous ones.

"Achieving operational control of both the northern and southern border — nearly 7,500 miles — within five years is an enormous, but important, undertaking," Representative Harold Rogers, Republican of Kentucky, said Tuesday. "Huge technical, geographic and personnel challenges remain.

"Nevertheless, my colleagues and I are prepared to give D.H.S. the resources it needs — provided funding is linked to results — to get the job done."

Boeing Group Gets U.S. Border Pact (WSJ)

By Robert Block

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

The Department of Homeland Security is expected to announce today that it has awarded an estimated $2 billion contract to help secure America's southern border with Mexico to a team of companies led by defense contractor Boeing Co., according to industry officials and congressional staffers.

The contract is for the first phase of the department's three-pronged Secure Border Initiative, or SBI, a comprehensive plan to protect the frontier and reduce illegal immigration. The first part of the program, called SBInet, is expected to use technology such as motion sensors, cameras, unmanned aircraft and cellular telephones to create a "virtual fence" to monitor the border and help law-enforcement agents catch illegal immigrants sneaking across the frontier.

Government officials have declined to attach a value to the overall program, but the entire border plan is expected to be the biggest Homeland Security program since the department in 2004 awarded a contract to Accenture Ltd. to monitor foreign visitors. Known as U.S. Visit, that program could amount to $10 billion over a decade.

Boeing said in a statement that it is awaiting an announcement, adding "we feel that Boeing proposed a secure border solution that will meet the government's requirements at the best value." Boeing beat out teams led by other defense companies Lockheed Martin Corp., Northrop Grumman Corp. and Raytheon Co.

The Boeing-led SBInet team includes DRS Technologies Inc.'s Surveillance & Reconnaissance Group, Elbit Systems of America's Kollsman Inc., L-3 Communications Holdings Inc., Perot Systems Corp., and Unisys Corp.'s Unisys Global Public Sector.

The U.S. Customs and Border Protection Agency, part of Homeland Security, is the agency in charge of the Secure Border plan. The first phase of the program will concentrate on the Arizona border with Mexico, industry officials said.

SBInet has attracted defense companies looking for new revenue sources as Pentagon spending growth slows, but they have been frustrated by the slow development of opportunities in the homeland-security market after it was initially trumpeted as a growth area following the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in the U.S.

According to defense-industry officials and congressional staffers the various plans of how to make SBInet were varied, in part because the Department of Homeland Security left it up to the various companies to decide how to best protect the border, giving them unusually wide sway over a critical national security issue. Michael Jackson, deputy secretary of the Homeland Security Department, told the competing firms this year he wanted them "to come back and tell us how to do our business."

Previous attempts to use technology to control the border have been checkered, and new tools, such as unmanned planes, face hurdles in how they will be deployed. Northrop Grumman's tack was to use unmanned drones. Boeing's proposal included lining the borders with 1,800 high-tech towers that could feed live video to Border Patrol agents carrying wireless hand-held receivers. Lockheed Martin's approach was to use blimps.

SBInet is billed as "a signature effort" for the department. An audiovisual presentation released this year depicted crowds of illegal aliens storming urban border crossings both in trucks and trudging in long columns along rural trails. The presentation showed how the geography of the southern border funnels illegal human migration into three main routes.

When Boeing announced in May its intention to put together a team of companies to pursue the contract, Jim Albaugh, president and chief executive of Boeing Integrated Defense Systems, called the program an "an initiative of national significance."

DOJ_NMG_0066084

This wouldn't be the first big Homeland Security contract Boeing has won. The company was involved installing airport explosive detection systems for the Transportation Security Administration shortly following the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, equipping more than 400 airports in fewer than six months.

Agencies May Overpay For Freedom Tower Space (WSJ)

By Alex Frangos

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

The federal government and New York state may be overpaying to move into the Freedom Tower, some commercial-property experts say.

The federal government's real-estate arm, the General Services Administration, said this week it has tentatively agreed to pay $59 a square foot for 16 floors in the yet-to-be-built skyscraper at the World Trade Center site when it opens in 2012. New York state government would pay the same rate for 11 floors.

A look at prices for comparable space shows the government is paying more than tenants in other Lower Manhattan buildings, even factoring in possible rent inflation over the five years it will take to build the Freedom Tower.

"I think it's high," says Barry Gosin, chief executive of Newmark Knight Frank, a real-estate services firm, though he says any progress on the long-stymied rebuilding effort might be worth it. "At the end of the day, the benefit to the taxpayer might justify a premium investment by the state to get this project going."

Others are more critical. "Are we getting the best bang for our buck?" asks Bettina Damiani of Good Jobs New York, a government-subsidy watchdog group. "There are a ton of public resources already going into the site to make it viable" for private business, she says. Among them: tax-exempt Liberty Bonds to finance the office towers, $2 billion in federal aid to build a transit hub, plus other state and Port Authority of New York and New Jersey money. "We have to ask: Are those viable subsidies if we have to use government entities to fill the towers?"

Average asking rents downtown were $35.18 in the second quarter, according to real-estate firm Cushman & Wakefield. "You've got a gap as high as $24 a square foot," says Marisa Manley, president of Commercial Tenant Real Estate Representation Ltd., a New York real-estate firm. "So for a one-million-square-foot lease, you're looking at a potential $240 million subsidy over a 10-year-period. ... It's drawing away money from taxpayers. It's not a marketplace solution."

In April, Port Authority officials indicated that the agency needed one million square feet of signed leases at $47.50 a square foot to make the $2 billion Freedom Tower financially viable.

Joe Stellato, deputy commissioner for real estate and facilities at the New York State Office of General Services, says "we're very comfortable with this transaction." He says state and city tax incentives -- plus concessions it has negotiated with the Port Authority that he declines to specify -- would reduce the cost to the state substantially.

The most recent comparable lease is one signed by Moody's Investors Service in August for the same amount of space as the federal government is taking in the Freedom Tower -- 600,000 square feet -- in the recently rebuilt 7 World Trade Center. It will pay $41.50 a square foot minus $3.80 in state and city incentives, reducing its effective rent to $37.70. It also will get 14 months of free rent and $50 a square foot in so-called tenant improvements, or inducements by the building's owner, Larry Silverstein, to outfit the space. In five years, around the time the Freedom Tower opens, the Moody's lease will increase to $46.50 a square foot.

Other recent deals in downtown Manhattan also are lower. Willis Group Holdings signed a lease in August for 205,000 square feet in One World Financial Center, across the street from Ground Zero, for $36.50 a square foot, increasing to $41.50 in 2011. BearingPoint Inc. signed a lease in August for 55,000 square feet in Three World Financial Center for $39.50 a square foot. In five years, that will kick up to $44.50.

Emily Baker, regional administrator for the GSA, says its real-estate consultants figured rents in 2012 for new custom space will be $80 a square foot. The federal agency likely moving to the Freedom Tower -- Customs and Border Protection -- has unique needs that can be accommodated by getting into the building early, such as holding cells for suspects, security screening and parking. "The requirements for the tenant buildout go far beyond just your Moody's cube farm," Ms. Baker says.

The rent set for the Freedom Tower is an important benchmark. The Port Authority, which owns the land at Ground Zero, and the City of New York together are in intense negotiations to lease 1.2 million square feet in Tower 4, to be owned by Mr. Silverstein. (The Port Authority has refused to move into the Freedom Tower, which it will own and operate, citing employee fears after 84 coworkers were killed in the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.)

People close to the negotiations for Tower 4 say the rent figure, while not finalized, is close to the one announced for the Freedom Tower. The two sides are working toward signing a term sheet by tomorrow's meeting of the Port Authority board of commissioners. The board is also expected to approve the design of the east side of the site, including Mr. Silverstein's three office towers and a mall-size collection of stores. Mike Shenot, managing director for Jones Lang LaSalle, the Port Authority's real-estate consultant, says the price reflects several factors, including increases in demand expected if the economy and job growth stay strong. "None of us have crystal balls. We're just trying to use good sound logic."

Mr. Gosin of Newmark Knight Frank says there might be that kind of demand growth. But with the four office towers being built at the same time at the Trade Center site, plus a new headquarters for Goldman Sachs Group Inc., there will be "a big chunk of space" in 2011 and 2012. "It's a long way off. And you know how markets can turn."

In a class on Islamic history at the Hartford Seminary some years back, the students were discussing a saying ascribed to the Prophet Muhammad that translates roughly as, "Whenever God wants the destruction of a people, he makes a woman their leader."

The professor, Ingrid Mattson, suggested that the phrase should be analyzed in its historical context when Islamic societies consisted largely of tribal raiding parties. A male Saudi student contended that all such sayings were sacred and not to be challenged, the argument growing so heated that he stormed out of the classroom. Professor Mattson stood her ground, as was her style.

Now she is challenging convention again. This month, Professor Mattson, a 43-year-old convert, was elected president of the Islamic Society of North America, the largest umbrella organization for Muslim groups in the United States and Canada, making her a prominent voice for a faith ever more under assault by critics who paint it as the main font of terrorism. She is both the first woman and, as a Canadian, the first nonimmigrant to hold the post.

To her supporters, Professor Mattson's selection comes as a significant breakthrough, a chance for North American Muslims to show that they are a diverse, enlightened community with real roots here — and not alien, sexist extremists bent on the destruction of Western civilization. Some naysayers grumble that a woman should not head any Muslim organization because the faith bars women from leading men in congregational prayers, but they are a distinct minority.

"The more Americans see Muslims who speak English with a North American accent, Muslims who were born and raised here, who understand this culture, the more it will cease to be a foreign phenomenon but something local and indigenous," said Mahan Mirza, a Yale doctoral candidate in Islamic studies who recalled the classroom scene above from the master's program at the Hartford Seminary in Connecticut.

At the annual Islamic Society conference in Chicago where her election was officially announced to the thousands of Muslims in attendance, women rushed to have snapshots taken at her side.

"When I see her, I just feel that there is this beam of light on her," said Reem Hassaballa, 30, of Chicago, a teacher and a mother of three. "She is a very good role model. If it can happen in a little convention like this, hopefully it could happen in the whole Muslim world. She could be the start of something bigger." Ms. Mattson sees both pluses and minuses in the fact that her election is being viewed as a watershed. The Islamic Society of North America is a 20,000-member group representing all manner of organizations, from student clubs to professional associations for doctors and lawyers to mosque boards to political activists. Her immediate predecessor was a religious scholar who often wore the flowing white robes and stacked turban of his native Sudan.

"Somehow there is the feeling that someone who is white is safer and less scary," Professor Mattson said. "But I am who I am. So if there is some social capital that I can use to counteract some of the negative perception and open ears to what we have to say as a community, then that is a benefit."

A short, trim woman with a quiet manner that belies her authority, Ms. Mattson grew up, by her own description, as a good, middle-class Roman Catholic school girl in Kitchener, Canada, a suburban community about 60 miles southwest of Toronto. She attended a Catholic girls high school and took piano lessons at the convent, spending hours in church praying or contemplating the art. It was a peaceful asylum removed from the raucous household where she was the sixth of seven children.

At 16, though, she stopped attending Mass. "I believe I made a very serious attempt to understand my faith," she said, repeatedly sitting with her religion teacher to ask questions about Catholicism and spirituality. She found the answers wanting, she said, less and less relevant to her teenage life.

Ms. Mattson enrolled in the nearby University of Waterloo to study philosophy and fine arts, a determined agnostic. In 1986, while studying in Paris, she met her first Muslims, mostly West African students, and was struck by their warmth, dignity and generosity.

Back home, she started to read more books about Islam and took classes in Arabic, which she now speaks fluently. When first delving into the Koran, its explanations of the presence of the creator in the natural world struck a chord. That echoed her own spiritual sentiments developed during summers spent at the family's 200-year-old cottage on an island in a Canadian lake without running water or a telephone.

In 1987, as a college senior, she converted. "This religious community was giving me the framework for my spiritual experience, and so I entered into it," she said in an interview.

At first she told only her mother, whom Ms. Mattson describes as a strong, flexible, understanding woman. Her father, a criminal lawyer, had died when she was 12 and her mother had worked in a factory to support the family.

"My mother was confused at first and did not understand it," she said. The change was eased somewhat by the fact that her oldest sister, Peggy Smith, had converted to Judaism before her marriage.

But her brothers and sisters only found out months later, when she wrote them a letter from overseas. They were mostly concerned, she said, that she had not joined some cult, and vaguely dismayed that her bar-hopping days with them had ended because Islam demands temperance.

Now, Ms. Mattson and Ms. Smith share certain common concerns —like keeping pork off the table at family gatherings.

"Sometimes it's only the Muslim and the Jew who are eating Christmas dinner with my mother," Professor Mattson said with a laugh, explaining that her siblings are off with their spouses. Conversation tends to run around family issues rather than comparative religion, she said.

Ms. Mattson's first exposure to the larger Muslim world came after she graduated from college, when childhood lessons about missionary work inspired her to volunteer to teach Afghan women in a sprawling refugee camp of about 100,000 people in Peshawar, Pakistan. There, in what might be called the wild Muslim east, the group later known as the Taliban barred their women from attending her classes.

"I remember clearly someone pointing a man out to me and saying 'That's the brother of the man who killed Anwar Sadat.' " she recalled. "That was freaky. I was thinking, what is going on here, and who are these people?"

But the most important person she met was Amer Aatek, an Egyptian engineer working to install a water system in the camp and playing uncle to numerous orphans. Not long afterward, they were quietly married in her house in Peshawar. When the destitute refugee women learned that there had been neither trousseau nor a banquet, they gave her a party and presented her with a wedding outfit: a red velveteen top and billowing blue silk pants dotted with multicolored pompoms. It was not exactly her style. She is given to headscarves in dark blue or brown with long matching skirts and long-sleeved jackets.

In 1989, she enrolled in the University of Chicago as a Ph.D. student in early Islamic history. Her husband played the main role in raising their daughter and son during much of the 10 years it took to complete her dissertation, which was based on a line from the Koran that translates as, "A believing slave is better than a nonbelieving free man."

The idea behind the revelation is that the faithful should ignore social status. Ms. Mattson said she wanted to know why slavery continued although the holy texts discouraged it, ultimately deciding that it was because religious scholars ignored political issues.

"She is one of those people who constantly strives for social justice," said Wadad Kadi, one of her University of Chicago professors. "She recognized the importance of fundamentally understanding Islamic law and making it relevant to people's lives."

In addition to being a professor of Islamic studies at the Hartford Seminary, she directs the program that trains Muslim chaplains for hospitals, universities or the military.

Since her time as a student in Chicago, Professor Mattson has worked with the Islamic Society, which was founded in 1963. She had served as vice president for the past five years, so her election was both anticipated and unopposed. (Not only is the post unpaid, but she also is expected to donate 1 percent of the salary from her paid job to the organization.)

American Muslims generally put their numbers around 6 million but some demographers suggest it might be as little as half that.

Ms. Mattson hopes to focus on Muslim women's rights and on how the current negative image of Islam will affect the young generation. She is also concerned that the "terrorist" label is being abused — extended too widely against Muslim groups doing charitable work among the Palestinians and elsewhere.

Like other mainstream Muslims, she struggles with how best to convince people that the faith does not condone terrorist violence. She detects what she calls "Muslim fatigue" among North Americans weary both of the extremists who use the religion to justify their attacks and of the moderates who seem powerless to influence them.

"The sense I have from Americans is that they don't want to hear Muslims talking about Islam anymore," she said. "They just want us to do something to stop causing all these problems in their lives."

FEMA City Residents Get 35 Days Grace (MH)

By Nicholas Spangler

The Miami Herald, September 20, 2006

People living in government trailer parks that opened after the 2004 hurricane season have another 35 days before they have to move out, the Federal Emergency Management Agency announced Tuesday.

FEMA extended a Sept. 26 deadline -- itself the six-month extension of a prior deadline -- to Oct. 31 to give trailer tenants more time to find permanent housing. Though they have said it before, FEMA officials say this new deadline is the absolute last.

"That's what I've been told. Thirty five days and that's it," said FEMA spokeswoman Mildred Acevedo.

The last of more than 17,000 people left homeless after four back-to-back hurricanes in the summer and fall of 2004 still live in 1,161 FEMA trailers all over the state.

FEW AFFORDABLE OPTIONS

In places like Charlotte County, site of FEMA City -- once home to 1,500 people in 551 trailers -- extensions were needed because there was nowhere else to live. Much of that county's affordable housing was destroyed by the hurricanes, and housing costs soared. The latest extension gives "the people who are in these units more time," said Acevedo. ``It gives them more time to work on their paperwork, if they're purchasing their units, and more time to work on a housing plan."

DOJ_NMG_0066087

Bob Hebert, Charlotte County's director of emergency recovery, suggested another reason for the extension: Federal marshals weren't ready to evict families from the trailers. "The property fell under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice, and the department was not ready to act on termination of leases yet," Hebert said.

LAND LEASE EXPIRED

FEMA City still holds 72 trailers, with 165 people, on county land that FEMA leased. The lease for much of that land expired in August; another lease expires next week, and the county wants the land back. Some of it will be used to expand a Public Safety building to keep government operating during the next hurricane.

FEMA has spent $1.184 billion responding to the 2004 hurricanes. The cost of the one-month housing extension was not immediately available.

Bush To Meet With Both Musharraf, Karzai (AP)

AP, September 19, 2006

President Bush, already scheduled to meet separately in the coming days with the leaders of Afghanistan and Pakistan, has now added joint White House talks where all three leaders can discuss regional security.

Relations between the neighboring countries have sometimes been strained over terrorist hideouts along their long, remote, mountainous border. A growing Taliban-led insurgency in Afghanistan, aimed at toppling the U.S.-backed government of Afghan President Hamid Karzai, has made the situation there an increasingly urgent problem for the Bush administration.

The White House announced Tuesday that the three-way session was scheduled for Sept. 27, a day after the president sees Karzai in the Oval Office, and five days after Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf's separate session with the Bush.

"The meeting will provide the three leaders an opportunity to discuss further cooperation in enhancing the trilateral relationship," White House press secretary Tony Snow said in a statement.

Pakistan was once a key Taliban supporter, but switched sides to become an ally of the U.S. in its campaign against terrorism following the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. Still, Pakistani-Afghan relations have suffered under allegations by Afghan officials that Pakistan hasn't done enough to go after the remnants of the ousted Taliban regime, which Afghani leaders say have established hideouts in Pakistan along the mountainous border. Pakistan has rejected such charges.

Recently, cross-border relations have improved, and Karzai and Musharraf pledged in meetings in Kabul earlier this month to jointly fight militants.

Bush visited both leaders in their home countries in March.

'06 Cuts In Iraq Troops Unlikely (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, September 20, 2006

The U.S. military is unlikely to reduce forces in Iraq before next spring because the current contingent of more than 140,000 troops is battling sectarian violence that could prove "fatal" to the country if not arrested, the top American commander for the Middle East said yesterday.

"This level will probably have to be sustained through the spring" amid aggressive operations to stabilize Baghdad, said Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, chief of the U.S. Central Command. "I do believe that the secular tensions, if left unchecked, could be fatal to Iraq . . . and the center of the problem is Baghdad. It's the main effort," he told defense reporters.

In a sober assessment, Abizaid, who has overseen the U.S. military strategy in Iraq since July 2003, said he had hoped six months ago for the withdrawal of several thousand U.S. troops from Iraq by now. "We clearly did not achieve the force levels that we had hoped to," he said, citing sectarian unrest, ongoing weaknesses in the capabilities of Iraqi security forces -- in particular the police -- and the five-month political void in the country after the December 2005 national elections.

Asked point-blank whether the United States is winning in Iraq, Abizaid replied: "Given unlimited time and unlimited support, we're winning the war."

The general's comments effectively ended hopes for a big troop withdrawal from Iraq this year, which had long been the military's target for reducing forces. As violence has intensified over the spring and summer, military leaders and the Pentagon's official assessment of the war have delivered increasingly tough characterizations of conditions in Iraq.

Now, six weeks before the U.S. midterm elections for which Iraq is a galvanizing issue, Abizaid is delivering the message that there will be no hasty exit from the costly conflict.

In Baghdad, Abizaid said, U.S. and Iraqi military operations have reduced violence "slightly," but he emphasized that it is too early to tell whether such progress will continue. The holy month of Ramadan is likely to bring increased bloodshed, as in past years, he said.

"Baghdad's not going to clarify itself in my mind militarily for a couple of months," he said, pointing in particular to the difficulty of reining in what he called the "splintered" death squads of the Mahdi Army, the Shiite militia of radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr.

"The bodies are piling up in areas that are not necessarily the same areas that we're patrolling," he said, acknowledging that even with the increased forces in Baghdad, U.S. troops cannot be everywhere in the sprawling city of 5 million people. U.S. and Iraqi troops are methodically clearing neighborhoods in Baghdad, while the military is also attempting to control movement into the city at 28 locations. The U.S. military plans to reevaluate the security plan in Baghdad in December, by which time more Iraqi troops should have moved into the capital, he said.

While dampening hopes of troop cuts this year, Abizaid left open the possibility that the U.S. troop level could be increased. "We'll bring in more forces if we have to," he said.

The military would draw, if necessary, on reserve forces already in Kuwait and elsewhere in the region before asking the Pentagon to send more U.S. troops, Abizaid said. He added that there is currently no plan to further extend the tour in Iraq of the Army's 172nd Stryker Brigade. That unit had been scheduled to return home over the summer but was abruptly diverted to Baghdad in July when sectarian killings spiraled there.

It costs about $1.2 billion a month to keep a U.S. Army division in combat in Iraq, an Army insider said.

Abizaid's assessment was echoed yesterday by members of the Iraq Study Group, a nonpartisan 10-member panel that will present detailed recommendations to the White House and Congress later this year.

"Time is short, the level of violence is great, the margins for error are narrow," co-chairman and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.) said at a news conference at the U.S. Institute for Peace. He declined to discuss the group's research but painted a generally grim picture. "This is a very tough problem. The options are limited; there is no silver bullet; there is no magic formula to this very tough situation in Iraq."

The group, which began looking into Iraq's prospects in March, is expected to produce a report sometime after the November elections, a schedule that former secretary of state James A. Baker III said is designed to remove any politics from the group's findings. Baker, who is also a co-chairman, said the group's focus is on Iraq's future, not on any past mistakes that led to the country's current tumult.

Discussing a particularly troubled area, Anbar province in western Iraq, Abizaid said that despite serious security problems he has no immediate plans to significantly increase U.S. forces there, as was recommended by the senior Marine intelligence officer in Anbar in a classified report last month.

"It's very, very clear that Anbar province is a problem that will have to be dealt with over time," Abizaid said. "It's a violent area, it's a tribal area, it's a tough area," he said. He added that the Iraqi forces there "need a lot of work."

"Whenever we bring out foreigners -- be that anyone who's not from al-Anbar -- to serve in the military or police units there, they immediately want to go somewhere else," he said, suggesting that recruiting people from local Sunni tribes to serve as auxiliary forces might offer a solution.

Asked why he would not send additional U.S. troops to Anbar, Abizaid said that it is a huge area with many small population centers that would "soak up a lot of troops from the decisive areas where we need them more," such as Baghdad. "Ample troops doesn't mean you have enough troops to do everything, everywhere," he said.

Abizaid said substantially increasing U.S. ground forces could breed dependency in Iraqi troops while complicating the already demanding rotations of U.S. troops in Iraq and Afghanistan, and for other contingencies.

The general also said that there are now more U.S. troops in Afghanistan than ever before. U.S. commanders expect the current U.S. troop level of 20,000 to remain fairly steady at least until the spring. Insiders attributed recent increases to a growing training program for Afghan security forces, noting that the actual number of troops in combat roles has held steady. Currently, about 4,500 troops are involved in training the Afghan army.

Gen. Says U.S. May Boost Forces In Iraq (MERCN/AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

The San Jose Mercury News/AP, September 20, 2006

WASHINGTON - The U.S. military is likely to maintain and may even increase its force of more than 140,000 troops in Iraq through next spring, the top American commander in the region said Tuesday in one of the gloomiest assessments yet of when troops may come home.

Gen. John Abizaid, commander of the U.S. Central Command, said military leaders would consider adding troops or extending the Iraq deployments of other units if needed. Until sectarian violence spiked early this year, Bush administration officials had voiced hopes that this election year would see significant U.S. troop reductions in what has become a widely unpopular war.

"If it's necessary to do that because the military situation on the ground requires that, we'll do it," Abizaid said of longer deployments. "If we have to call in more forces because it's our military judgment that we need more forces, we'll do it."

His comments came as violence around Iraq killed at least 16 civilians on Tuesday and wounded dozens of others. Iraqi lawmakers angered by the relentless violence demanded that the defense and interior ministers appear before parliament to explain what they are doing to eliminate the death squads that have claimed hundreds of Iraqi lives.

The U.S. military said a U.S. soldier was killed Tuesday by a suicide car bomber in northern Iraq, another died of non-battle related injuries on Monday, and two others were killed Sunday.

Abizaid said that right now the number of U.S. troops "are prudent force levels" that are achieving the needed military effect. Still, his blunt assessment was the first time officials confirmed that higher troops levels would continue into next year.

Abizaid, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace are expected to meet with members of Congress later this week.

President Bush, in New York for U.N. General Assembly meetings on Tuesday, told Iraqi President Jalal Talabani that the U.S. will keep soldiers in Iraq as long as necessary. "I've told the president of Iraq that America has given her word to help you and we will keep our word. The people of Iraq must know that," Bush said.

Late last year, military leaders had said they hoped to reduce troop levels to about 100,000 by the end of this year. But Abizaid said Tuesday that the rising sectarian violence and slow progress of the Iraqi government made that impossible.

"I think that this level probably will have to be sustained through the spring," he said. "I think that we'll do whatever we have to do to stabilize Iraq and Afghanistan and use the military power of the U.S. to do that."

Members of Congress said they will listen to Abizaid's recommendations.

The military commanders, said Sen. Saxby Chambliss, R-Ga., "know what's necessary to adapt to the enemy's tactics. And whether that means more troops or more troops just in Baghdad, I believe they will make the appropriate decisions necessary to help the Iraqi forces continue to stand up and ultimately defend their country on their own."

But Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., called the news disappointing. "We should have started redeploying at the end of this year," he said.

Abizaid cautioned that the solution to much of Iraq's violence - both sectarian and insurgents - is not necessarily "throwing more American units at the problem."

Instead, he said the Iraqi government must improve the political and economic conditions in the embattled country, as part of an effort to get the "angry young men" off the streets. And he said there will be more emphasis on the U.S. military teams that are training the Iraqi army and police forces.

There are 147,000 U.S. forces in Iraq - up more than 20,000 from the totals in June. Rumsfeld extended the one-year deployment of an Alaska-based Stryker brigade in July as part of the effort to stem the escalating violence in Baghdad. Abizaid said Tuesday that there are no plans to further extend that brigade's deployment.

Abizaid said the latest security crackdown in Baghdad is improving conditions there, specifically in neighborhoods targeted by coalition and Iraqi forces. Military leaders should know by December, he said, whether the effort is working or if new tactics are required.

"The secular tensions, if left unchecked, could be fatal to Iraq," he said. "And the center of the problem is Baghdad ... It's the area where we have to spend the most military effort."

Sectarian executions have been a persistent problems in Baghdad. On Tuesday, Iraqi authorities said they found three blindfolded bodies dumped in eastern Baghdad - all had been shot and bore signs of torture, trademarks of sectarian killings being waged between Shiite and Sunni Arabs.

Abizaid said that while the Baghdad campaign is the priority, the U.S. military has not abandoned the volatile western Anbar province.

Last week, Marine Maj. Gen. Richard C. Zilmer, commander of U.S. forces in western Iraq, said he has enough troops - about 30,000 - to accomplish his main mission to train Iraqi forces, but not enough to defeat the insurgency there.

His comments raised questions about whether additional forces are needed in Anbar. But Abizaid said that the more than 140,000 American troops, plus the 300,000 Iraqi troops and 23,000 troops from other coalition members, are enough to do what needs to be done, "not everywhere, all the time, equally - but to bring Iraq to stability over time."

Meanwhile, U.S. experts studying what to do next in Iraq said Tuesday that Baghdad's government must make more progress toward controlling the violence and rebuilding the nation.

"The government of Iraq needs to show its own citizens soon - and the citizens of the United States - that it is deserving of continued support," said Lee H. Hamilton, co-chairman of the independent, bipartisan Iraq Study Group, a 10-member panel asked by Congress to advise lawmakers and the administration. Hamilton, the former Democratic congressman from Indiana, was also co-chairman of the Sept. 11 commission that investigated the terrorist attacks.

No Cutback Likely In U.S. Troop Levels For Iraq Before Spring, Top Regional Commander Says (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0066090

WASHINGTON, Sept. 19 — The top American commander in the Middle East said Tuesday that more than 140,000 soldiers would probably be needed in Iraq at least until spring because of continuing sectarian violence and the need to secure Baghdad.

"I think that this level probably will have to be sustained through next spring, and then we'll re-evaluate," the commander, Gen. John P. Abizaid, told reporters at a breakfast round table.

He called current force levels "prudent," but added: "We'll bring in more forces if we have to. By the way, if we can send more forces out, we'll do that as well." He acknowledged that the military, after five years of war waged in Afghanistan and Iraq, would be hard pressed to come up with more troops.

Pentagon officials have said previously that the current level, about 144,000 troops, was likely to be maintained through the end of the year unless security improved. General Abizaid's comments were the first indication that senior commanders believed reductions were very unlikely until well into next year.

The violence in Iraq and the shortcomings of the fledgling government have repeatedly frustrated plans by the Bush administration and the Army to begin sustained reductions in American forces and hand off primary responsibility for security to Iraqi military and police units.

The American complement fell to 127,000 earlier this year but rose again after Baghdad grew increasingly unstable. The force now includes 14 combat brigades and elements of two others, one of which is in the process of leaving Iraq, a military spokesman said.

"If you had asked me six months ago, I would have said that we would be down a couple of brigades from what we currently have," General Abizaid said.

The situation in Baghdad, where thousands of American and Iraqi troops have been sent since July from other areas of Iraq after a surge in bombings and sectarian killings, has become "slightly better," he said. But, "Baghdad is not going to clarify itself in my mind militarily for a couple months."

Democrats responded to General Abizaid's remarks by suggesting that they were further evidence of the need to lay out a timetable for withdrawing American troops from Iraq, a step the Bush administration has said would embolden insurgents.

"What's the endgame? We need a deadline to force Iraqis to stand up for Iraq and get our combat troops home," said Senator John Kerry, a Massachusetts Democrat.

Senator Jack Reed, a Rhode Island Democrat and a co-author of a resolution in June to begin withdrawing troops this year, said, "We can fight for 10 years."

"What we have to have is a police department that works, governing officials that work," he said. "That's the challenge, and I don't see the administration talking about it. I don't see them putting up budgets that would fund that."

General Abizaid acknowledged that confidence among Iraqis in their police remained low and that it was important for the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki to purge the police of sectarian militias and to improve the economy.

He said the insurgency still raging in Iraq represented less of a threat than the cycle of sectarian attacks by Shiites and Sunnis, which if not addressed by military, economic and political steps, could tear the country apart.

"The insurgency can't be fatal to Iraq in my mind, but I do believe that the sectarian tension if left unchecked could be fatal to Iraq, and the center of the problem is Baghdad," he said.

The troop levels in Iraq are the highest they have been since they were increased temporarily to provide security for elections in January.

General Abizaid also raised concerns about the increased fighting in Afghanistan, which has had intensified violence in the south, despite the presence of 21,000 American troops and another 19,000 from others countries under NATO command. That is the most American troops deployed to the country, even during the 2001 invasion, though an American military official said the number of American combat troops within the overall total was smaller than it had been in the past.

"I don't think the Taliban represents a mortal threat" to the government of President Hamid Karzai, General Abizaid said. "But certainly at this stage in the campaign we had hoped to be at a point where we were doing more development and less fighting."

General Abizaid warned that over the last year Pakistan had increasingly been used as a sanctuary by Taliban fighters, who cross the border to mount attacks against NATO forces, who are now deployed in the south. He said he was concerned about the recent promise of the Pakistani president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, to withdraw troops from western Pakistan in return for a promise by tribal leaders there to pursue Qaeda leaders believed to be hiding there.

"I'm very, very skeptical about this notion that people who have been harbored in the tribal areas are no longer going to be harbored," he said. "I'll believe that when I see it."

Pentagon Wary On Iraq (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, September 20, 2006

The Pentagon predicted on Tuesday that there would be no US troop cuts in Iraq until the middle of next year and the co-chairmen of the Iraq Study Group, an influential bipartisan commission, warned that the next three months were "critical", and called the problems "daunting".

DOJ_NMG_0066091

Lee Hamilton, a Democratic former congressman who gained a reputation for independence as joint chair of the commission that investigated the September 11 attacks, said: “Time is short. The level of violence is great. The margins of error are narrow. The government of Iraq must act and show citizens of the US that it is deserving of unified support.”

The challenges were underlined by General John Abizaid, commander of US Central Command, who said because of worsening sectarian violence, current US troop levels of more than 140,000 would be “sustained through the spring and then we’ll re-evaluate”.

Mr Hamilton’s comments came in a rare press conference about the commission created in March to advise the president and Congress on future policy in Iraq. In spite of his sense of urgency, the group’s recommendations – which will include an assessment of the ability of the Iraqi government – will be issued after the midterm congressional elections.

“We didn’t want to be seen to be patently political, and it’s not going to be,” said his colleague, former secretary of state James Baker, who remains close to President George W. Bush’s father, is a realist on foreign policy and a deft political operator. “It is more important frankly to make sure whatever we report is taken out of domestic politics.”

Mr Baker’s role, which was approved by the White House, has created hopes that the commission could chart an exit strategy from Iraq that offered a politically convenient way for the administration to change direction.

In a sign that the commission has more flexibility to consult Iraq’s neighbours, Mr Baker said the group would meet “a high representative of the Iranian government”. Some of the group recently went to Baghdad but, reflecting the poor security, only one member left the protected Green Zone. “We didn’t want a story that we were cowboying around in Iraq,” explained Mr Baker, a Texan.

Number Of U.S. Troops In Iraq Likely To Remain Stable (MCT)

By Drew Brown

McClatchy Newspapers, September 20, 2006

WASHINGTON - U.S. commanders are unlikely to reduce the number of American troops in Iraq before next summer, the top U.S. military officer in the Middle East said Tuesday.

U.S. military leaders had hoped to bring the number of American forces in Iraq down to around 100,000 by year's end, but high levels of sectarian violence probably will prevent any reductions below the current level of 147,000 before the end of next spring, said Gen. John Abizaid, who oversees the U.S. Central Command.

"I think this level will probably have to be sustained through the spring, and then we'll evaluate," Abizaid said during a breakfast with defense reporters. "I think these are prudent force levels. I think they're achieving the military effect."

Abizaid said more American troops could be sent to Iraq. "If it's necessary to do that because the military situation on the ground requires that, we'll do it," he said.

There are about 20,000 more U.S. troops in Iraq than there were a few months ago, partly because of an overlap between some units rotating in and others rotating out. Alaska's 172nd Stryker Brigade had its deployment extended by 120 days in an effort to improve security in Baghdad. Abizaid said military officials didn't plan to extend the unit's deployment a second time.

Also on Tuesday, former Rep. Lee Hamilton, co-chairman of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, said Iraq was facing a crucial time.

"The government of Iraq needs to show its own citizens - and the citizens of the United States - that it is deserving of continued support," he said.

Hamilton and the other co-chairman of the study group, former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, said at a news conference that the next three months would be vital for Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government to show progress in securing Baghdad, pursuing national reconciliation and delivering electricity, water and other basic services.

"No one can expect miracles," Hamilton said, "but the people of Iraq have the right to expect immediate action."

Abizaid said security in Baghdad was "slightly better" now than it was before a U.S.-Iraqi security crackdown started in June. The crackdown was designed to stop a cycle of killings between Sunni and Shiite Muslims since insurgents blew up an important Shiite mosque last February.

Abizaid said it probably wouldn't be known until December whether the crackdown would have any lasting effect.

In Iraq on Tuesday, a car bomb exploded in Baghdad and rockets and mortars hit three neighborhoods, killing more than a dozen people, and sectarian slayings were reported in several other cities.

Despite the violence, Abizaid said Iraqis had become more confident about the country's army, which now numbered around 300,000 soldiers, but that many Sunnis distrusted the police. Iraqi police forces, dominated by majority Shiites, are widely considered corrupt, ineffective and in some cases involved in sectarian killings and other violence.

With 147,000 American troops, 23,000 coalition soldiers, 300,000 Iraqi troops and another 100,000 Iraqi paramilitary forces in the country, Abizaid said he thought there were enough "to bring stability over time, provided that governance and institution-building take place."

Although he said U.S. military leaders were prepared to send more American forces to Iraq if necessary, he warned that having too many Americans on the ground would only "feed extremism" and prevent Iraqis from taking responsibility for their own security.

Hamilton and Baker declined to comment on any of the findings by their commission, which was formed at Congress' request. It's been working since March to formulate a series of recommendations on a way forward in Iraq.

Hamilton, a Democrat from Indiana, and Baker, who served as secretary of state under President Bush's father, George H.W. Bush, said they didn't plan to release any of the recommendations until after the November elections.

Baker said their study was meant to be nonpartisan and "forward-looking" and wouldn't focus on mistakes that had been made in Iraq.

"We are going to come with what we think is the best thing for the country," he said.

The Stubbornly Hopeful President (LAT)

By Max Boot

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2006

THE BODY COUNT continues to mount in Iraq and Afghanistan, and the military situation continues to deteriorate. On the home front, Democrats appear resurgent, and Republicans are bracing themselves for losses in November.

If I were George W. Bush, I would have a hard time getting out of bed in the morning. But if he is plagued by despair or doubt, he gave no sign of it in an Oval Office meeting last week with seven conservative columnists. Leaning forward in an armchair, clad in a pearl gray suit with a blue shirt, crimson tie and an ornate silver belt buckle from Texas, Bush began by declaring: "I've never been more convinced that the decisions I made are the right decisions."

He expressed faith that "over time, the inevitable truth will win" — the truth being that "freedom is universal." He professed no alarm about bad news from Iraq, saying that recent trends (such as a spike in killings) were just a "nanosecond" in historical terms. "I think the politics of Iraq are going to just take a while to settle out." He refused to even speculate about what would happen if Democrats were to gain control of the House. "I don't think they're going to win," he said flatly.

Hearing such talk, critics are apt to say that Bush is out of touch with reality. He's aware of the knock. He knows that people say he's stubborn and starry-eyed. But his confidence isn't rooted in ignorance of the difficulties he faces. "I can understand," he said, referring to the invasion of Iraq, "why people who agreed that we should have done this wonder whether or not we can succeed." He just refuses to be swayed from his grand strategy because of tactical setbacks. "If you don't have a set of principles to fall back on, you flounder and … it creates waves, and the waves rock the decision-making process."

His steadfastness in the face of adversity is admirable. So is his contempt for the conventional wisdom of the day. But there is a certain fatalism that can come from focusing so much on the long term. (Bush spoke repeatedly of how the world would look 50 years from now.) There is a danger that you will not make the necessary short-term adjustments to achieve results here and now.

In the case of Iraq, in particular, even those of us who support the war effort question whether Bush has done enough to win. A strong case can be made that there have never been enough troops to enforce even a modicum of law and order. The U.S. contingent has surged recently to more than 140,000, and more troops have been moved to Baghdad, but only at the cost of denuding other areas of Iraq.

A Marine intelligence report leaked to the Washington Post last week suggested that at least another division is needed in restive Anbar province. The top Marine general in Iraq was rushed out to rebut those findings, but even he acknowledged that he didn't have enough troops to defeat the insurgency.

I asked Bush about the Marine report. He dismissed it as just a "data point." He won't send more troops to Iraq unless asked to do so by Gen. George W. Casey, the U.S. commander on the spot, and Casey has not made any such request. "I'm certainly not a military expert, nor am I in Baghdad," he said, so he will leave those decisions to the "experts."

He cited the Vietnam War on the dangers of "tactical decisions being made out of the White House," even though the real problem was not Lyndon Johnson's micromanagement but Gen. William Westmoreland's flawed strategy. In fact, as Eliot Cohen argued in "Supreme Command," successful war leaders such as Lincoln and Churchill (whose busts adorn the Oval Office) sometimes overruled their generals or fired them altogether.

Not Bush. "If he's wrong," he said of Casey, "I'm wrong." Yet Casey's options are severely circumscribed by the inadequate size of the Army, which declined 30% in the 1990s. I pressed Bush on why he hasn't increased end-strength. He talked of making the existing force "quicker and lighter" and better "able to strike," but recent experience in Iraq and Afghanistan shows that there is no substitute for having an adequate number of boots on the ground. And we've never had enough.

I left the meeting unconvinced by Bush's arguments on troop numbers but impressed by his resiliency and imperturbability.

"Keep punching," he urged the assembled scribes. He is obviously taking his own advice.

Doubts Increase About Strength Of Iraq's Premier (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 19 — Senior Iraqi and American officials are beginning to question whether Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki has the political muscle and decisiveness to hold Iraq together as it hovers on the edge of a full civil war.

Four months into his tenure, Mr. Maliki has failed to take aggressive steps to end the country's sectarian strife because they would alienate fundamentalist Shiite leaders inside his fractious government who have large followings and private armies, senior Iraqi politicians and Western officials say. He is also constrained by the need to woo militant Sunni Arabs connected to the insurgency.

Patience among Iraqis is wearing thin. Many complain that they have seen no improvement in security, the economy or basic services like electricity. Some Sunni Arab neighborhoods seem particularly deprived, fueling distrust of the Shiite-led government.

Concerns about the toughness of the new government seemed reflected in President Bush's comments when he met Tuesday with Iraq's president, Jalal Talabani. Mr. Bush said he wanted Iraqis to know "that the United States of America stands with them, so long as the government continues to make the tough choices necessary for peace to prevail."

Mr. Maliki, a conservative Shiite, took office in May. A senior American diplomat here said the White House still had confidence in him, mainly because "he has articulated goals for Iraq that make sense to us."

Bush administration officials have repeatedly cautioned that Mr. Maliki needs more time. "This is a national unity government of many, many moving parts," said the diplomat, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "He has got to negotiate as he goes."

But diplomats who deal with the Bush administration on Iraq issues, and recently departed officials who stay in contact with their colleagues in the government, say the president's top advisers have a far more pessimistic view.

"The thing you hear the most is that he never makes any decisions," said a former senior official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss internal deliberations. "And that drives Bush crazy. He doesn't take well to anyone who talks about getting something accomplished and then refuses to take the first step."

American officials here say they do not intend to let Mr. Maliki fail and are helping him in a variety of ways. For example, to bolster Iraqis' confidence, American generals are spending money on quick reconstruction projects like trash pickup as the military goes through troubled neighborhoods of Baghdad.

The embassy has advisers who work closely with cabinet ministers and has deployed hundreds of Americans to seven provinces to help Iraqi officials build up the government's political and economic strength. A senior envoy said the biggest effort was simply "Diplomacy 101" — insisting to Iraqi leaders that they resolve their differences.

But increasingly, Iraqi and Western officials say the unity government is one in name only, with the political parties representing different sects and ethnicities constantly at odds, undermining Mr. Maliki's ability to build consensus.

While the United States has military might and political influence, it must rely on the Iraqi government to reach out to the country's political and religious leaders. Trying to placate everyone has kept Mr. Maliki from being able to offer amnesty to Sunni insurgents or forcefully disarm Shiite militias, officials say.

The main Shiite bloc itself is deeply divided, depriving the prime minister of crucial support. So he relies on Moktada al-Sadr, the Shiite cleric who commands the powerful militia called the Mahdi Army, for political backing. The militia has been blamed by many Sunni Arabs for sectarian killings.

To ensure that the minority Sunni Arabs remain involved in the government, Mr. Maliki finds himself compromising on issues like cabinet appointments with conservative Sunni parties that have occasional contact with nationalist guerrillas.

"I think he has said good things, but in practice there has been no change," said Mahmoud Othman, an independent Kurdish legislator. "The security situation is deteriorating and violence is getting worse. He has done nothing against militias. At the same time, the reconciliation dialogue is not moving forward. It doesn't look good, the prospects for the government.

"I thought he'd be stronger, but he looks weak," Mr. Othman said. "He feels frustrated because nobody's cooperating with him."

The same sentiments are heard in the streets of the capital.

"There's no security, no job opportunities, no services, nothing at all," said Muhammad Jabar Abdul Ridha, 18, a construction worker walking through downtown Baghdad on Tuesday afternoon. "This government hasn't done anything better than the previous one."

While some officials in Washington say Mr. Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice still insist in staff meetings that Mr. Maliki must be given more time and support, there is a growing sense that he is not about to change his operating style. A former senior official said the big test would be whether Mr. Maliki could confront Mr. Sadr. "If you don't do that, I don't know how he can succeed," the official said.

The prime minister's aides declined repeated requests for an interview with Mr. Maliki, who emerged as a compromise choice for prime minister during a power struggle last spring in which the White House and Mr. Sadr backed different candidates.

Supporters of Mr. Maliki say it is too soon to judge his tenure. Any unity government requires compromises, they argue. "He's been in office only a short time, and the size and number of problems from the former regime and former cabinets are huge," said Sheik Khalid al-Attiya, a deputy speaker of Parliament.

Mr. Maliki has made efforts to quell the Sunni-led insurgency, including reaching out to some Sunni Arab guerrilla groups, Iraqi officials say. That may help widen a rift in the insurgency between Iraqi nationalists and foreign fighters. Sheiks in rebellious Anbar Province announced last Sunday that 25 of 31 tribes in the province were ready to fight against Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia.

Iraqi and American officials who have dealt with Mr. Maliki say he is much more blunt and expressive in meetings than his predecessor as prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, who leads Mr. Maliki's political party. Mr. Maliki is not given to diplomatic formalities and makes his views known, they say. At the same time, he likes to listen to a range of opinion — often at the expense of making decisions, the officials say.

Mr. Maliki acts as if he is backed into a corner these days, said a moderate legislator who recently spent two and a half hours in a private meeting with him.

"You were one of the hawks," the legislator recalled telling Mr. Maliki. "Now you're one of the doves."

"No, I'm still one of the hawks," the legislator quoted the prime minister as saying. "I just need time."

Mr. Maliki's security plan for Baghdad, now the American military's main effort of the war, intentionally avoids direct confrontation with Mr. Sadr's militia, despite Iraqi Army generals' apparent willingness to attack the militia and despite growing violence by rogue militia elements. The plan, begun last month after an initial failed effort in June, involves military sweeps of violent neighborhoods, generally after fighters have already fled.

The murder rate has dropped in some neighborhoods. But the plan's effectiveness was called into question last week, when more than 165 bodies were found across Baghdad in four days. Shiite militiamen are the main suspects. The Baghdad morgue has said more than 1,500 civilians were killed in August, a 17 percent drop from July but higher than nearly all other months of the war.

Brig. Gen. Dana J. H. Pittard, assigned to help train Iraqi police and army units, said Iraqi Army commanders, who usually have fewer sectarian loyalties than the police, were ready to take on the militias but had not gotten approval from the government.

"There's this obvious question that the army guys are asking, about 'When are we going to get rid of the militias?' " General Pittard said in an interview while meeting with American military advisers at a base in Taji. "If you talk to the leaders of the Iraqi Army, they'll say, 'We need to be given an order to disarm the militias.' "

Last month, after American and Iraqi soldiers attacked a militia safe house in the Sadr City neighborhood of Baghdad, the prime minister denounced the action and promised compensation to families of Iraqis killed or wounded in the assault.

Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the second-ranking commander in Iraq, said American and Iraqi generals were waiting for Mr. Maliki to find a political solution to the militias.

"How long will that process take?" he said. "I don't know."

Mr. Maliki has little obvious leverage over Mr. Sadr, who controls at least 30 seats in Parliament and six ministries, making him one of the most powerful figures in the government. Mr. Sadr has no intention of disbanding the Mahdi Army, because it is now part of the government, said Bahaa al-Aaraji, a senior legislator allied with him.

"They are just volunteers defending their country," Mr. Aaraji said.

Mr. Maliki is also tiptoeing around other powerful Shiite leaders with militias. Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, the head of the Parliament's Shiite bloc, has ignited a political firestorm by calling for the legislature to approve a mechanism to create autonomous regions. Many are opposed, and the move threatens to splinter the government. But rather than rein Mr. Hakim in, Mr. Maliki has kept quiet.

As a centerpiece of his reconciliation project to end the Sunni insurgency, Mr. Maliki wants to forge an amnesty policy that would draw into politics some militant Sunni Arabs and former officials from Saddam Hussein's Baath Party, Iraqi politicians say.

But the proposal has been attacked by hard-line Shiites like Mr. Hakim, who is opposed to leniency for killers of Iraqis, and American politicians outraged at the idea of amnesty for those who have attacked American troops.

That could doom Mr. Maliki's plan, said Ayad Jamaladin, a moderate Shiite legislator on the government's reconciliation committee.

"Innocent people don't need amnesty," he said. "Guilty people need amnesty."

Some conservative Sunni leaders are also resisting Mr. Maliki's efforts. Politicians in Baghdad and tribal sheiks in restive areas insist that he meet a long list of demands that includes releasing all detainees and setting a timetable for the withdrawal of American troops. Many Sunnis also fear that Mr. Maliki is beholden to Iran, and his trip there last week further stirred concerns.

"With whom should we reconcile?" asked Sheik Muhammad Saleh al-Bajari, a spokesman for tribes in Falluja, the Sunni Arab stronghold. "With those who brought the occupier and killed and destroyed the future of this country?"

Group Says Iraq Needs To Prove Itself (AP)

By Pauline Jelinek

AP, September 19, 2006

U.S. experts studying what to do next in Iraq said Tuesday that the next three months are critical and Baghdad's government must make more progress toward controlling the violence and rebuilding the nation.

"The Iraqi government must act," said Lee H. Hamilton, co-chair of the independent, bipartisan Iraq Study Group. "The government of Iraq needs to show its own citizens soon — and the citizens of the United States — that it is deserving of continued support."

Hamilton and his co-chair, former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, said Baghdad's government needs to secure a capital reeling in sectarian violence, make progress on national reconciliation, and provide electricity, water, and other services that Iraqis need.

The 10-member panel is working at the request of Congress to advise lawmakers and the Bush administration on the way forward in the beleaguered Iraq campaign. The commission has been working quietly for six months, meeting with more than 100 U.S. and Iraqi military and civilian officials and others to assess progress in the war and make recommendations.

It expects to meet with representatives of Syria, Iran and Saudi Arabia and soon move on from fact-finding to the task of devising recommendations.

At a downtown Washington news conference, Hamilton and Baker declined to say what their assessment is of the situation in Iraq now or to indicate anything about their upcoming recommendations. They said recommendations won't be given to the government or made public until after the November election — to avoid politicizing them. They said they would not be more specific about when the findings might be released.

But Hamilton said the study group agreed that the next three months in the campaign are important.

"Each of us agrees that the next three months are critical," Hamilton said. "The challenges ... are many and they are daunting."

"Prime Minister (Nouri al-) Maliki has been in office since April and his government has been complete since June," Hamilton said. "The people of Iraq are looking to him urgently for leadership."

"No one can expect miracles, but the people of Iraq have the right to expect immediate action," Hamilton said.

Relentless Violence Irks Iraq Lawmakers (AP)

By Patrick Quinn

AP, September 19, 2006

Lawmakers angered by relentless violence in Iraq demanded Tuesday that the defense and interior ministers explain what they are doing to put an end to the death squads that have killed hundreds of Iraqis.

Violence around Iraq killed at least 16 Iraqis on Tuesday, including 10 people killed in a rocket attack on a Shiite neighborhood of Baghdad. An American soldier died in a suicide car bombing in northern Iraq.

Nearly 200 bodies of Iraqis who had been tortured and shot have turned up around Baghdad in the past week, including three found Tuesday in an eastern section of the capital. Most are found bound and blindfolded, apparent victims of sectarian violence.

Both Sunni and Shiite lawmakers called Tuesday for the defense and interior ministers to explain how they plan to stop the killings.

"I demand the defense and interior ministers be summoned to let us know their plans to stop these criminal acts: kidnappings, killings and assassinations against our people," said Hassan Bejar, a lawmaker with the Iraqi Accordance Front, the largest Sunni bloc in government.

Shiite lawmaker Haider al-Safar said: "We are just sitting here and seeing these dead bodies being thrown every day in the streets."

"We need to see real achievements from the defense and interior ministries to stop the daily kidnapping and bloodletting," he said.

Abdul-Karim al-Enizi, another Shiite, proposed special security teams to investigate the killings. There was no immediate response from the ministries.

The U.S. military command, meanwhile, said a soldier was killed Tuesday by a suicide car bomber in northern Iraq. It said another soldier died of non-battle related injuries Monday and two U.S. soldiers were killed Sunday afternoon.

The top U.S. military commander in the Middle East said that because of the increased violence, the U.S. military will likely maintain or possibly even increase the current force levels of more than 140,000 troops in Iraq through next spring.

Gen. John Abizaid, commander of U.S. Central Command, said military leaders would consider adding troops or extending the Iraq deployments of other units if needed.

"If it's necessary to do that because the military situation on the ground requires that, we'll do it," he said. "If we have to call in more forces because it's our military judgment that we need more forces, we'll do it."

The rocket attack in Baghdad's southern Dora district killed 10 people and wounded 19, police said.

In a separate attack, a mortar round hit a house in the Shiite neighborhood of Abu Sayfeen in central Baghdad, killing one person outside the building and wounding three boys, aged between 11 and 15, and their father inside the house, said police 1st Lt. Ahmed Mohammed of the Risafa police station.

About 20 minutes later, another mortar struck near a police checkpoint in Zayouna Street in central Baghdad, killing a policeman and wounding five other people, said police Capt. Mohammed Abdul Ghani.

Earlier, a car bomb exploded near a gas station in Baghdad, killing two civilians and wounding 25.

Elsewhere, gunmen killed Faris Egab, the mayor of Udhaym town, about 40 miles north of the Diyala provincial capital of Baqouba, as he drove to work, the province's police said.

Gunmen also struck in Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, firing on a police patrol near the city prison, killing one policeman and wounding three, the police said.

Iraq Must Act On Security Now, U.S. Advisory Panel Chief Says (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 19 — A leader of a high-level panel studying American policy toward Iraq said Tuesday that Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki must take immediate action to improve security, end sectarian killings, reduce corruption and deliver basic services if he wants to retain United States support.

The independent panel, led by former Representative Lee H. Hamilton of Indiana and former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, said it would make detailed recommendations to President Bush and Congress after the midterm elections.

The group, formed at the request of Congress and with the approval of the Bush administration, visited Iraq for four days this month. Members said they had met with more than three dozen Iraqi officials, including Mr. Maliki. The group has also met with Mr. Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. Panel members expect to meet soon with an Iranian official, whom they did not identify, with the Saudi ambassador to the United States and with the foreign minister of Syria.

If Mr. Bush is looking for an opportunity to revise American policy in Iraq, the panel, known as the Iraq Study Group, could be a catalyst.

At a news conference here, Mr. Baker said he wanted the 10-member, bipartisan panel to forge a consensus because "our report will not be particularly meaningful if it has dissenting views."

Mr. Hamilton, a former chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, summarized findings from the panel's first six months of work this way: "Iraqis want a safer Baghdad and safer communities. They want an end to sectarian killings. They want electricity, water and a government that fights corruption. No one can expect miracles, but the people of Iraq have the right to expect immediate action. They want to see progress on security, progress on national reconciliation and progress on the delivery of basic services. And so do we."

Moreover, Mr. Hamilton said: "The government of Iraq must act. The government of Iraq needs to show its own citizens soon, and the citizens of the United States, that it is deserving of continued support. The next three months are critical. Before the end of this year, this government needs to show progress in securing Baghdad, pursuing national reconciliation and delivering basic services."

Mr. Baker said he agreed with this assessment.

A longtime political adviser to the Bush family, Mr. Baker could play a pivotal role in helping the White House weigh policy changes, including a possible exit strategy. On Tuesday, Mr. Baker reaffirmed his view that the administration had "seriously misjudged the difficulty of winning the peace" in Iraq. But he said that the panel would focus on the future and that it had not spent any time "wringing our hands over what mistakes might or might not have been created in the past."

In his 1995 memoir, Mr. Baker said he opposed ousting Saddam Hussein in the Persian Gulf war in 1991 because he feared that such action might lead to an Iraqi civil war, to "criticism from many of our allies" and to an eventual loss of American support for an occupation.

"Marching on Baghdad was ridiculous from a practical standpoint," Mr. Baker wrote. In the memoir he also recalled arguing that "even if Saddam were captured and his regime toppled, American forces would still be confronted with the specter of a military occupation of indefinite duration to pacify the country and sustain a new government."

Only one member of the panel, former Senator Charles S. Robb of Virginia, ventured outside the heavily fortified Green Zone when the group went to Iraq this month. Mr. Robb visited Anbar Province, where the insurgents have been particularly active and the security situation has become dire.

Wave Of Attacks Kills At Least 2 Dozen In Iraq (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, September 20, 2006

BAGHDAD — At least two dozen people were killed in Iraq on Tuesday — the latest victims of a cycle of violence that the top U.S. military commander said could force the U.S. military to maintain or increase troop levels in Iraq through spring.

"If we have to call in more forces because it's our military judgment that we need more forces, we'll do it," Gen. John Abizaid, commander of U.S. Central Command, said in Washington. U.S. troop strength currently is 140,000.

Violence has grown despite a security crackdown in Baghdad that began Aug. 7, when 12,000 more Iraqi and U.S. troops were brought into the city. On Tuesday, a rocket attack on a Shiite neighborhood in southern Baghdad killed 10 people and wounded another 19, police told the Associated Press.

Four U.S. servicemembers have died since Sunday, the U.S. military command said, including one killed Tuesday by a suicide car bomber in northern Iraq.

In a separate attack in a Shiite neighborhood in central Baghdad, a mortar round hit a house, killing one person, police 1st Lt. Ahmed Mohammed said. About 20 minutes later, a mortar that hit near a police checkpoint in central Baghdad killed a policeman, police Capt. Mohammed Abdul Ghani said.

Earlier, a car bomb exploded near a gas station in Baghdad. Two civilians died and 25 were hurt. Police also recovered the blindfolded bodies of three people from eastern parts of the city.

Elsewhere, gunmen killed Faris Egab, the mayor of Udhaym, about 40 miles north of the Diyala provincial capital of Baqouba, the province's police said. Gunmen also fired on a police patrol near the city's prison, killing one policeman and wounding three others.

Iraqi lawmakers angered by the relentless violence demanded that the Defense and Interior ministers appear before parliament to explain what they are doing to stop death-squad attacks and kidnappings. Nearly 200 bodies have turned up around Baghdad in the past week — part of a surge in violence since early September.

"I demand the Defense and Interior ministers be summoned to let us know their plans to stop these criminal acts," Hassan Bejar, a lawmaker with the Iraqi Accordance Front, the largest Sunni Arab bloc in government, told the parliament. "We need to see real achievements from the Defense and Interior ministries to stop the daily kidnapping and bloodletting," Shiite lawmaker Haider al-Safar said.

•The chief judge in Saddam Hussein's trial was replaced amid complaints from Shiite and Kurdish officials that he was too soft on the former Iraqi leader. Judge Abdullah al-Amiri was replaced with Mohammed al-Uraibiy, who was his deputy in the trial, a court official told the AP. The official asked not to be named because he was not authorized to speak to the media.

Hussein al-Duri, an aide to the prime minister, said one reason for al-Amiri's dismissal was the judge's comments last week in a court session in which he told Saddam, "You were not a dictator."

Saddam and six co-defendants could each face the death penalty if convicted on genocide charges over the Anfal military offensive against Iraqi Kurds in the 1980s.

•The Iraqi government announced it will shut down all offices belonging to the Kurdistan Workers Party, or PKK. Government spokesman Ali Al-Dabagh said the decision was taken during a Cabinet meeting because "Iraq wants good relations with Turkey and all neighboring countries."

The PKK has recently been blamed or has taken responsibility for attacks in Turkey. Kurdish rebels have been fighting for autonomy in southeastern Turkey since 1984. The conflict has killed more than 37,000.

Bombings Kill 28 In Baghdad, Mosul (AP)

AP, September 20, 2006

Separate bombings near an army base and a police building killed at least 28 people and wounded at least 56, Iraqi police said Wednesday.

A bomb in a parked car detonated Tuesday night near an Iraqi army base in Sharqat, about 45 miles from the northern city of Mosul, police said. A suicide bomber detonated his explosives as a crowd gathered at the scene. At least 21 people were killed and 50 wounded, police said.

A suicide truck bomb slammed into a police headquarters building in Baghdad Wednesday morning, destroying the building and killing seven policemen, police said.

Another six people, including a civilian, were wounded in the attack in the southern Baghdad neighborhood of Dora, said police Capt. Jamil Hussein.

Meanwhile, lawmakers angered by relentless violence in Iraq demanded Tuesday that the defense and interior ministers explain what they are doing to put an end to the death squads that have killed hundreds of Iraqis.

BAGHDAD, Iraq - American 1st Lt. Jake Hughes and his platoon from Apache Company of the 1-23rd Infantry had high hopes as they contemplated the predawn raid that was about to take place on the walled-in Shiite Muslim mosque in the Baghdad neighborhood of Ghazaliyah.

This was how it was supposed to work, as Americans begin ceding more responsibility to Iraqis one month into an aggressive campaign to bring peace to Baghdad. The Iraqi Interior Ministry had provided the intelligence. A dozen Iraqi soldiers were to conduct the raid. The Americans were there strictly as backup.

But in Baghdad, hope comes in small doses.

It took the Iraqis 15 minutes just to get into the mosque They used a piece of wood as a makeshift wedge in an attempt to open an iron gate, then gave up and scaled a wall.

As Hughes and the rest of his platoon retreated to the safety of their Stryker armored vehicles, the Iraqis spent another 30 minutes searching the mosque, only to discover no one inside. Nothing was found. It looked as if someone had been tipped off about the operation.

The results were similar later that morning after a house-to-house search in another part of Ghazaliyah, a mixed Sunni Muslim/Shiite neighborhood. Iraqi intelligence, with ties to the country's dominant Shiite political parties, appeared to focus exclusively on the homes of Sunni families who'd just moved into abandoned houses. Four people eventually were taken into custody, whisked away by Iraqi police, though it wasn't clear why.

Ghazaliyah is one of seven Baghdad neighborhoods initially targeted in Operation Together Forward, a security campaign launched Aug. 7 with 12,000 American and Iraqi soldiers.

Through last week, the U.S. military said 53,000 buildings had been searched, including 54 mosques. More than 1,200 weapons have been seized, and 91 people detained.

Officials point to the relative calm in nearby Ameriyah, a west Baghdad neighborhood, as evidence of the operation's success. But another neighborhood, Dora, in southern Baghdad, appears to be seeing more violence. On Sunday, as many as 50 homemade bombs were found during raids there.

Bodies continue to show up daily throughout Baghdad: 35 on Tuesday, bringing the total in the past five days to at least 170. Most of the victims have been found shot, blindfolded and with their hands tied behind their backs.

At a news conference Monday, Ministry of Defense spokesman Ali Askari said the increase in violence against civilians should be seen as evidence of the failure of insurgents to reach their real targets: Iraqi security forces.

"The terrorists moved to attack the civilians to increase the sectarian violence," Askari said.

Ghazaliyah is a good example of the hurdles that the campaign faces. Once a neighborhood where Saddam Hussein rewarded midlevel bureaucrats and military commanders with upscale homes and larger than average lots, parts of it now are the front lines of a battle between sectarian militias and death squads.

American officials and residents say a northern part of the neighborhood is a target of anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militia. Black crosses have been sprayed on the doors of Sunni residents, a warning that they should leave. Pro-Sadr graffiti are common.

Hughes, who's from Sullivan, Ill., can't wait to turn over the operation to the Iraqis. The 1-23rd, based at Fort Lewis, Wash., is trained for combat, with huge 16-ton, 8-wheeled Stryker vehicles that are equipped with .50-caliber machine guns and grenade launchers.

For the past month, though, the 1-23rd has been performing searches and setting up roadblocks in Baghdad during the day and patrolling for curfew violations and illegal weapons movements at night.

"I signed up for something different than this," Hughes lamented. "This is more of a policing action than a military action. But we're making progress. It may not seem like it on days like this, but you can see it in the longer run."

Sorting out who's doing what to whom remains difficult, however.

DOJ_NMG_0066099

One man, a Sunni, showed Apache Company's commanding officer, Capt. Kevin Salge, a scar on his right arm. He said he'd been shot by a member of a death squad to drive home the point that his family should leave the nearby Shula neighborhood. That's when he fled to Ghazaliyah. Since he moved in April, his home has been raided three times, but he insists that any violence must come from outsiders, driving on the nearby highway.

"We had gunfire from here this past week and it wasn't coming from the highway," said Salge, 30, who's from Iowa City, Iowa.

"I would not know about that," said the man, who wrote his name on a piece of paper and promised to let the captain know of anything new.

But progress can be measured in many ways. Battalion commander Lt. Col. Avanulas Smiley, 40, of Tacoma, Wash., pointed out that even the Iraqi police, often the wild card in the operations, showed up to provide protection along the perimeters of the search, the first time that all elements of the Iraqi security forces had participated.

For some residents of Ghazaliyah, Iraqis taking over the searches from Americans also is a good sign, though for reasons different from Hughes'.

"There's a lot of resistance in our area," said Muhammed Saleh, a 28-year-old Sunni engineer in Ghazaliyah, referring to insurgents. "American presence usually means trouble because there will be a lot of operations against Americans, which means unrest for the rest of us."

No One Dares To Help (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2006

Because this account of daily life in Baghdad reveals where the writer lives, his name is not being used to protect his safety. He is a 54-year-old Iraqi reporter in The Times' Baghdad Bureau.

BAGHDAD — On a recent Sunday, I was buying groceries in my beloved Amariya neighborhood in western Baghdad when I heard the sound of an AK-47 for about three seconds. It was close but not very close, so I continued shopping.

As I took a right turn on Munadhama Street, I saw a man lying on the ground in a small pool of blood. He wasn't dead.

The idea of stopping to help or to take him to a hospital crossed my mind, but I didn't dare. Cars passed without stopping. Pedestrians and shop owners kept doing what they were doing, pretending nothing had happened.

I was still looking at the wounded man and blaming myself for not stopping to help. Other shoppers peered at him from a distance, sorrowful and compassionate, but did nothing.

I went on to another grocery store, staying for about five minutes while shopping for tomatoes, onions and other vegetables. During that time, the man managed to sit up and wave to passing cars. No one stopped. Then, a white Volkswagen pulled up. A passenger stepped out with a gun, walked steadily to the wounded man and shot him three times. The car took off down a side road and vanished.

No one did anything. No one lifted a finger. The only reaction came from a woman in the grocery store. In a low voice, she said, "My God, bless his soul."

I went home and didn't dare tell my wife. I did not want to frighten her.

I've lived in my neighborhood for 25 years. My daughters went to kindergarten and elementary school here. I'm a Christian. My neighbors are mostly Sunni Arabs. We had always lived in harmony. Before the U.S.-led invasion, we would visit for tea and a chat. On summer afternoons, we would meet on the corner to joke and talk politics.

It used to be a nice upper-middle-class neighborhood, bustling with commerce and traffic. On the main street, ice cream parlors, hamburger stands and take-away restaurants competed for space. We would rent videos and buy household appliances.

Until 2005, we were mostly unaffected by violence. We would hear shootings and explosions now and again, but compared with other places in Baghdad, it was relatively peaceful.

Then, late in 2005, someone blew up three supermarkets in the area. Shops started closing. Most of the small number of Shiite Muslim families moved out. The commercial street became a ghost road.

On Christmas Day last year, we visited — as always — our local church, St. Thomas, in Mansour. It was half-empty. Some members of the congregation had left the country; others feared coming to church after a series of attacks against Christians.

American troops, who patrol the neighborhood in Humvees, have also become edgy. Get too close, and they'll shoot. A colleague — an interpreter and physician — was shot and killed by soldiers last year on his way home from a shopping trip. He hadn't noticed the Humvees parked on the street.

By early this year, living in my neighborhood had become a nightmare. In addition to anti-American graffiti, there were fliers telling women to wear conservative clothes and to cover their hair. Men were told not to wear shorts or jeans.

For me, as a Christian, it was unacceptable that someone would tell my wife and daughters what to wear. What's the use of freedom if someone is telling you what to wear, how to behave or what to do in your life?

But coming home one day, I saw my wife on the street. I didn't recognize her. She had covered up.

After the attack on the Shiite shrine of the Golden Dome in Samarra in February, Shiite gunmen tried to raid Sunni mosques in my neighborhood. One night, against the backdrop of heavy shooting, we heard the cleric calling for help through the mosque's loudspeakers.

DOJ_NMG_0066100

We stayed up all night, listening as they battled for the mosque. It made me feel unsafe. If a Muslim would shoot another Muslim, what would they do to a Christian?

Fear dictates everything we do.

I see my neighbors less and less. When I go out, I say hello and that's it. I fear someone will ask questions about my job working for Americans, which could put me in danger. Even if he had no ill will toward me, he might talk and reveal an identifying detail. We're afraid of an enemy among us. Someone we don't know. It's a cancer.

In March, assassinations started in our neighborhood. Early one evening, I was sitting in my garden with my wife when we heard several gunshots. I rushed to the gate to see what was going on, despite my wife's pleas to stay inside. My neighbors told me that gunmen had dropped three men from a car and shot them in the street before driving off. No one dared approach the victims to find out who they were.

The bodies remained there until the next morning. The police or the American military probably picked them up, but I don't know. They simply disappeared.

The sounds of shootings and explosions are now commonplace. We don't know who is shooting whom, or who has been targeted. We don't know why, and we're afraid to ask or help. We too could get shot. Bringing someone to the hospital or to the police is out of the question. Nobody trusts the police, and nobody wants to answer questions.

I feel sad, bitter and frustrated — sad because a human life is now worth nothing in this country; bitter because people no longer help each other; and frustrated because I can't help either. If I'm targeted one day, I'm sure no one will help me.

I was very happy when my eldest daughter married an American. First, because there was love between them, but also because she would be able to leave Iraq, and I wouldn't have to worry about her safety day after day. She left last year.

If you had asked me a year ago whether I would consider leaving Iraq, I would have said maybe, but without enthusiasm. Now it's a definite yes. Things are going from bad to worse, and I can't see any light at the end of the tunnel.

Four weeks ago, I came home from work. As I reached my street, I saw a man lying in a pool of blood. Someone had covered him with bits of cardboard. This was the best they could do. No one dared move him.

I drove on.

Senators Seek To Declassify Report Info (AP)

By Sam Hananel

AP, September 20, 2006

Senators on an intelligence panel are seeking to declassify more information from two Senate reports on prewar intelligence on Iraq, saying too much was kept secret.

The bipartisan group on Tuesday asked a government commission to consider whether portions of the reports could be made public without harming national security.

It's the first time lawmakers have appealed to the Public Interest Declassification Board since it was established in 2004 as a place for members of Congress to appeal if they think federal agencies are unnecessarily classifying material in the name of national security.

The two reports, released earlier this month, concluded there was no evidence Saddam Hussein had ties with al-Qaida before the U.S. invasion of Iraq. They also found that Saddam's regime did not have weapons of mass destruction and was not actively seeking to acquire them.

Democrats claim the reports undercut President Bush's justification for invading Iraq. Republicans say the reports contain little new information and accuse Democrats of trying to score political points in an election year.

When the reports were issued, Sen. Ron Wyden, D-Ore., said he was concerned that some information was classified to shield officials from being held accountable, not for national security reasons.

"The American people have the right to know the rest of this story, so that they can decide for themselves whether to hold public officials accountable for the statements that were made and actions that were taken that led us to war," Wyden said Tuesday.

Sen. Kit Bond, R-Mo., said although he disagrees with many of the conclusions reached in the reports, "I do agree with my colleagues that too much of the report remains classified, and I am a firm believer that whatever need not remain classified, should not remain classified."

The letter is signed by about half of the Senate Intelligence Committee members: Bond; Wyden; Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif.; Mike DeWine, R-Ohio; Russ Feingold, D-Wis.; Orrin Hatch, R-Utah; and Jay Rockefeller, D-W.Va.

The group did not identify which sections of the report it seeks to declassify.

The Public Interest Declassification Board is made up of nine national security experts — five appointed by the White House and four appointed by Republican and Democratic leaders in Congress.

After Remark, Judge In Trial Of Hussein Loses His Post (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0066101

BAGHDAD, Sept. 19 — Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki on Tuesday fired the judge overseeing the second phase of the trial of Saddam Hussein, accusing him of bias toward the deposed Iraqi ruler.

Aides to Mr. Maliki said pressure had been building from Kurds and others to oust the judge after he told Mr. Hussein in court that he was not a dictator.

The firing was condemned by human rights advocates as improper political interference by Mr. Maliki's government, which is dominated by Shiites and Kurds persecuted during Mr. Hussein's rule. Human Rights Watch said the firing "sends a chilling message to all judges: toe the line or risk removal."

Bassam al-Husseini, an aide to Mr. Maliki, said the prime minister's office asked the Iraqi High Tribunal to remove the judge, Abdullah al-Amiri, a Shiite who was also a judge under the Hussein government.

Mr. Husseini said the new chief judge will be Mr. Amiri's assistant, Muhammad al-Uraibi, also a Shiite Arab.

"The government is taking into regard the feelings of the Iraqi people," Mr. Husseini said. "When the judge told Saddam, 'You are not a dictator,' he hurt the feelings of the Iraqi people."

"There was pressure from the Iraqi people and people in Kurdistan because their feelings were hurt," he said, adding that the prime minister has the authority to remove judges from the tribunal. "The government had to respond to this pressure."

But international human rights groups said the firing undermines the tribunal's credibility and could influence other judges to favor the prosecution. They also questioned whether the tribunal's procedures for handling allegations of judicial bias and misconduct were followed.

"This shows the court is not immune from political interference and may be open to being manipulated by public opinion or politicians," said Hanny Megally, director of the Middle East and North Africa program for the International Center for Transitional Justice, which is an observer in the tribunal.

In the current phase of the trial, Mr. Hussein stands accused of genocide in the killing and gassing of more than 50,000 Kurds during the so-called Anfal military campaign of 1988. It is separate from his prosecution earlier this year on charges of ordering the murder of 148 people in the Shiite village of Dujail in 1982. That verdict is expected as early as next month.

Criticism of Judge Amiri began to build last Tuesday, when Mr. Hussein described Kurdish witnesses testifying against him as agents of "Zionism" and then threatened to "crush your heads." The next day, a prosecutor, Munqith al-Faroon, demanded that the judge step down, accusing him of allowing Mr. Hussein "to go too far, with unacceptable expressions and words."

Then, during testimony on Thursday from a Kurdish farmer who recounted how he had pleaded with Mr. Hussein to spare the life of his family, Mr. Hussein leaped up in the dock to defend himself.

"Why did he try to see Saddam Hussein?" Mr. Hussein said. "Wasn't Saddam a dictator and an enemy to the Kurdish people, as they say?"

Judge Amiri then said: "I will answer you: you are not a dictator. Not a dictator." Smiling, Mr. Hussein replied, "Thank you."

The exchange outraged many in the Iraqi government. After the "not a dictator" exchange, members of Parliament began putting pressure on a committee of judges within the tribunal to remove Judge Amiri, said Jalaladin al-Sagheir, a Shiite member of Parliament.

The statute governing the tribunal says the Presidency Council — the Iraqi president and two vice presidents — can transfer judges out of the tribunal "for any reason" on recommendation by the Council of Ministers. It was unclear whether President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, played a role in the judge's firing.

But the tribunal also has other rules and procedures devised specifically for handling allegations of bias or misconduct, human rights advocates said.

"It's not clear whether the proper procedure was used or not," said Richard Dicker, the director of the international justice program at Human Rights Watch.

Government Ousts Chief Judge In Hussein Trial (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, September 20, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 19 -- The Iraqi government ordered the chief judge in the genocide trial of Saddam Hussein to step down Tuesday because he said last week that Hussein was "not a dictator," prompting legal experts to voice concern that the dismissal could undermine the independence of the tribunal hearing the case.

The Iraqi cabinet voted unanimously to remove the judge, Abdullah al-Amiri, a Shiite Muslim who had served as a judge during Hussein's rule, because it felt he was no longer impartial and his conduct had "injured the feelings of the victims in the case," government spokesman Ali al-Dabbagh said.

"The government wants to maintain the independence of the court without interfering with their daily work and their decisions," Dabbagh said. "But at the same time, they want the court to keep neutral."

Amiri issued his controversial declaration, which angered many Iraqis, during a courtroom exchange on Thursday, one day after the prosecution accused him of bias and asked him to step down because he had "allowed the defendants to treat the chamber as a political forum."

When a Kurdish farmer testified that he had begged Hussein in 1988 to spare the lives of his family, Hussein leapt out of his seat and asked why the farmer would have tried to plead with him if he was, in fact, a dictator.

"You were not a dictator," the judge replied, adding that those around Hussein had made him one.

Hussein smiled and replied, "Thank you."

Dabbagh said the government has the authority, under the statute that created the Iraqi Special Tribunal, to remove judges and prosecutors from the tribunal "for any reason." He said Amiri would be transferred to another court.

International legal observers said that although the executive branch may have the authority to remove Amiri, its action threatened to stain the tribunal's credibility and bolster claims by Hussein's defense team that the court is illegitimate and lacks independence.

"This raises alarm bells," said Michael P. Scharf, a professor at Case Western Reserve University School of Law and an adviser to the tribunal. "It looks like the government is trying to meddle with the tribunal. This will erode the tribunal's independence and legitimacy further in the eyes of the international community and the Iraqi people."

An official close to the court said Amiri would be replaced on Wednesday by Mohammed al-Uraibiy, another member of the court's five-judge panel. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak about the matter publicly.

Badiyeh Aref, a lawyer on Hussein's defense team, said Tuesday night that the government did not have a right to replace the judge because of his comments.

"If the judge told Saddam Hussein that he is innocent, then they should change the judge," he told al-Arabiya television. But the comments about Hussein being a dictator, he said, were irrelevant. "This court is not charged with determining whether Saddam is a dictator or not."

Michael A. Newton, a law professor at Vanderbilt University Law School and another adviser to the tribunal, said the government's action violated the spirit, if not the letter, of the law that was supposed to grant the court independence.

"For the government to attempt to do this in some sense plays into the defendants' hands, strengthening the argument that the court is a function of politics and not of law," he said. "An equally serious concern is the degree of intensive preparation that this judge has done which will be very difficult to simulate with any rapidity."

Court officials could not be reached for comment Tuesday evening, and the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad declined to comment.

Meanwhile, a group of tribal leaders from Anbar province asked Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki on Tuesday to recognize a newly formed council of chieftains and its force of 20,000 fighters as the new provincial government in the volatile Sunni insurgent stronghold.

Sheik Fasal Gaood, a prominent tribal leader, said about 1,000 sheiks and other local officials attended a meeting in Ramadi last Thursday and formed a 43-member Anbar Salvation Council, representing 18 major tribes, to fight al-Qaeda and other insurgents.

"The situation right now in Anbar is total chaos. There is no government, there is no authority, there is no law," he said. "We want to launch a strike to end the terrorists once and for all in Anbar."

The conference, known as the Anbar Awakening, called on Maliki to sack the existing provincial government and replace it with the Salvation Council. "The governor of Anbar is an extremist and Islamist, and he has links to the terrorists," said Sheik Hameed al-Haes, the leader of al-Boodyat, one of the major tribes in Anbar. "That's why we want to replace him."

Dabbagh, the government spokesman, said the prime minister welcomed the support of the tribes in combating insurgents and would consider their requests.

Also Tuesday, parliament issued a statement calling on Pope Benedict XVI to issue a full apology for a speech last week in which he quoted a 14th-century Byzantine emperor as saying that the prophet Muhammad brought "only evil and inhuman" things to the world. Members of parliament said a statement the pope made Sunday, in which he said he was "deeply sorry" about the reaction in some countries to his remarks, did not go far enough.

The U.S. military announced on Tuesday that a soldier from the 89th Military Police Brigade was killed when his vehicle was struck by a suicide car bomb in Mosul, and a soldier with Multinational Division-Baghdad was killed when his vehicle was struck by a roadside bomb. No further details were released.

Chief Judge In Saddam Trial Replaced (AP)

By Sameer N. Yacoub And Jamal Halaby

AP, September 19, 2006

The chief judge in Saddam Hussein's genocide trial was replaced Tuesday amid complaints from Shiite and Kurdish officials that he was too easy on the deposed Iraqi leader.

It was the second time that a chief judge was changed while Saddam was on trial; in each case there were accusations that Saddam was allowed too much leeway in court.

Abdullah al-Amiri was replaced on the five-member panel by his deputy in the trial, Mohammed al-Uraibiy, a court official said. The new chief judge is a Shiite Arab, as is al-Amiri.

The Iraqi High Tribunal, the country's supreme court, sought the change and Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki approved it, a government official said. Both officials asked not to be named because they are not authorized to speak to the media.

An attorney defending senior officials in Saddam's former regime decried the change as purely political.

DOJ_NMG_0066103

"This was a coup that succeeded. There was no legal reason for removing him (al-Amiri)," defense lawyer Badee Izzat Aref told The Associated Press. "They (court officials) felt that he would not respond to their demands."

Hussein al-Duri, an aide to al-Maliki, said one reason for the change was al-Amiri's statement in court last week, in which he told Saddam, "You were not a dictator."

In Iraq, al-Duri told Al-Arabiya television, "it is not allowed for the judge to express his opinion."

Al-Amiri's comment angered many Kurds and Shiites and fueled criticism that he was too lenient with Saddam. Prosecutors had earlier asked for al-Amiri to be replaced after he allowed Saddam to lash out at Kurdish witnesses in court.

The change could revive complaints that the government is interferring with the trial in the hope that Saddam and his co-defendants will be convicted quickly. Saddam faces a possible death penalty if convicted on genocide charges over the Anfal military offensive against Iraqi Kurds in the 1980s.

In Saddam's first trial — over alleged atrocities against Shiites in the town of Dujail — the chief judge stepped down halfway through the proceedings, saying he could no longer put up with criticism from officials who said he allowed too many courtroom outbursts by Saddam and his co-defendants.

He was followed by a far tougher judge who repeatedly threw defendants and defense lawyers out of court.

A verdict in the Dujail trial is expected Oct. 16.

Al-Amiri presided over the latest session of the current trial Tuesday, in which Kurdish survivors of Anfal recounted the bombardment of their villages by the Iraqi military.

One witness, Iskandar Mahmoud Abdul-Rahman, a major in the Kurdish security force, testified that an attack on his village began on March 20, 1988, when Iraqi aircraft appeared in the sky.

"We dropped to the floor; white smoke covered us, it smelled awful," Abdul-Rahman said. "My heart raced. I started to vomit. I felt dizzy. My eyes burned and I couldn't stand on my feet."

He said he was treated at two hospitals in Iran, and lost consciousness for 10 days.

"The doctors were frequently giving me injections and medication, including eye drops. They cut the burned skin with scissors," he said, adding that his eyesight remains poor.

Abdul-Rahman then removed his blue shirt. There were several dark scars, each about 8 inches long, on his back.

Saddam and six other defendants are on trial for alleged atrocities against Kurds during Operation Anfal, a crackdown on Kurdish guerrillas in the late 1980s. The prosecution alleges some 180,000 people died in the campaign, many of them civilians killed by poison gas.

Saddam and his cousin "Chemical" Ali al-Majid are charged with genocide, and the others are accused of various offenses. All could face death by hanging if convicted.

Two other witnesses also testified Tuesday, repeating allegations of abuse in the crackdown.

Raouf Faraj Abdullah, a 55-year-old farmer, told of poor living conditions and a shortage of food in a detention camp in the northern city of Irbil.

"The people of Irbil tossed food over the barbed wire," said Abdullah.

He said he was moved to another camp, where he was separated from his 2-year-old son and his wife, who later gave birth in her prison cell.

"When I went to see her, I found out that my newborn baby had died," he said.

Abdullah said 28 people were killed in attacks on his village.

A third witness, Ubeyd Mahmoud Mohammed, said 70 people, including his wife and six children, were killed by an attack on his village March 22, 1988.

Saddam sat silently throughout the testimony, taking notes.

However, the session was marked by a heated exchange between the senior prosecutor, Jaafar al-Moussawi, and defense lawyer Aref, who accused prosecutors of misleading the court by presenting a witness who allegedly had a forged passport.

He referred to an Iraqi Kurd who testified Monday that he sought asylum in the Netherlands, where he acquired Dutch citizenship in 1994.

Saddam and his lawyers argued Iraqi law barred dual nationality, and asked that the man's testimony be stricken from the record.

British Soldier Pleads Guilty To War Crime (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

LONDON, Sept. 19 — A British soldier pleaded guilty today to inhumanely treating civilians detained in Iraq, the first member of the British armed forces to admit to a war crime.

The plea came at the opening of a court martial of seven soldiers on war crimes charges, the first trial of British soldiers under laws binding this country to the International Criminal Court.

The Bush administration has refused to accept the jurisdiction of the court, arguing that the treaty under which it was set up would require the United States to cede part of its sovereignty and that it could invite spurious prosecutions of American officials and military officers.

Three of the seven soldiers faced war crimes charges; only one, Corporal Donald Payne, 35, pleaded guilty. But he denied charges of manslaughter and perverting the court of justice. Three officers among the seven accused soldiers denied charges of "negligently performing a duty," meaning that they failed to control personnel under their command.

The trial revolves around events six months after the invasion of Iraq, as British forces patrolled Basra in the south to support American forces farther north. Between September 14, 2003, and September 16, 2003, the prosecution said, British troops at a temporary detention facility in a three-room building in Basra questioned detainees to establish whether they were a threat.

The interrogation followed raids on several hotels in Basra as British troops tried to seek out insurgents. Most of the detainees were taken from the Haitham Hotel, where troops found a cache of weapons including rifles, grenades, bayonets and timers, said Julian Bevan, the prosecuting lawyer.

"The belief that those in custody were a significant threat undoubtedly fueled the way in which they were treated," he said.

While the case has not drawn the same outrage in Britain as disclosures about American abuses of Iraqis at Abu Ghraib prison, it has shocked some Britons used to thinking of their soldiers as behaving with restraint. Moreover, it has raised concerns about the impact of the court martial on the 7,000 to 8,000 British soldiers still serving in Iraq.

Mr. Bevan, the prosecution lawyer, said detainees at the Basra facility were repeatedly beaten, punched and kicked while their heads were covered with sacks and their hands were bound with handcuffs. Some suffered sleep deprivation and one civilian, Baha Musa, died after receiving multiple injuries. A post mortem examination of Mr. Musa, a hotel worker, found 93 wounds on his body, including a broken nose and fractured ribs, the prosecution lawyer said.

Another detainee suffered renal failure. "We are not dealing in this case with robust or rough handling which is bound to happen in the theater that existed in Iraq, but something far more serious," Mr. Bevan said.

"We are not dealing with the action of a soldier or soldiers in the heat of the moment whilst on patrol in a hostile environment whose conduct is questionable," he said. "We are dealing with systematic abuse against prisoners involving unacceptable violence against persons who were detained in custody, hooded and cuffed and wholly unable to protect themselves over a very long period of time."

Referring to Mr. Musa, Mr. Bevan said: "Before he died, he had removed his handcuffs, and it was believed by Corporal Payne that he was trying to escape," he said. "Certain measures were taken by Corporal Payne" who went on to tell people who had witnessed the beating to not to discuss the events with investigators, Mr. Bevan said.

The prosecutor also referred to the "sheer openness" of the beatings, indicating that senior officers had failed to protect the detainees.

The defense lawyers have not yet presented their case.

For Iraqi Farmers, A Harvest Of Hope (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, September 20, 2006

BAQUBAH, Iraq -- Inside the festival hall, on long tables covered with white cloth, Aboud Ahdim Abbas Mohammad saw a glimpse of the future: baskets filled with different kinds of ripe, delicious dates. They held the twin promise of reviving an ancient industry and Iraq's devastated economy.

But once outside, Mohammad wondered whether Iraq would ever realize such aspirations. Violence had emptied nearby villages filled with date farmers. His cousins had been slain on the way to sell their harvest. Gunmen had recently ambushed him. He shot his way out to safety, but not before a bullet rammed into his left arm.

"They don't want a new Iraq based on freedom and a country that produces," said Mohammad, 56, who looked regal with bronzed skin, a pepper gray moustache and a white and black checkered tribal head scarf.

Across a volatile landscape brimming with militias and insurgents, farmers like Mohammad are trying to restore the glory days when Iraq produced about 30 percent of the world's supply of dates. The fruit has been a symbol of daily life since the time of the civilizations of Babylon and Sumer, more than 5,000 years ago.

In the calculus of preventing Iraq's slide toward civil war, reconstructing Iraq's economy is a top priority. And dates are Iraq's second-biggest export, after oil. Revitalizing the industry could help reduce sectarian tensions by creating thousands of jobs while generating revenue to rebuild Iraq, improve security and lessen the country's dependence on U.S. reconstruction dollars.

Now, after years of neglect, war and sanctions, the date industry is showing signs of recovery, partly through U.S. efforts. Farmers are being introduced to market-oriented capitalism after years of depending on state subsidies under the government of Saddam Hussein.

In May, helicopters contracted by the U.S. military sprayed thousands of acres of date palm trees across Iraq with pesticides to eradicate insects that had caused major damage. After the 2003 invasion, security concerns prevented large-scale aerial spraying, Iraq's small crop-dusting helicopter fleet was destroyed, and looters stole pesticides from the Agricultural Ministry warehouses.

On Monday, the fruits of the spraying campaign were displayed at a date festival in Baqubah, an insurgent stronghold 35 miles northeast of Baghdad. In a high-ceilinged, brightly lit room, farmers proudly showcased more than 60 varieties of dates in baskets made from palm fronds. Outside, dignitaries sat under a tan tent, eating dates and plain yogurt.

This year the date harvest in Iraq's Diyala province -- Baqubah is its capital -- is expected to be about 70,000 tons -- "50 percent better than last year," said Abbas al-Tamimi, the provincial director general of agriculture. Sold below production cost under Hussein, dates are now sold competitively in local markets and exported to neighboring Jordan and Dubai, he said.

Yet tight security cast a shadow over the date festival. Eight U.S. Humvees were parked outside, as Iraqi security forces guarded the street. There were empty seats in the tent. A sudden burst of gunfire outside the compound prompted heavily armed U.S. soldiers to run out, poised for action. It was not an attack.

Attacks in Diyala have surged, from about 200 each month before the February bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra to just under 500 this summer, according to U.S. military statistics. The province is especially vulnerable to sectarian violence, given its mix of Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish populations. In recent weeks, there have been assassinations of leaders, kidnappings and mosque bombings.

Tamimi, dressed in a blue suit and yellow tie, said date farmers who populated several villages were forced to leave "because of sectarian tensions."

"Some of them were threatened by terrorists and had to leave," he said.

Khalid al-Sanjary, the mayor of Baqubah, said 40 families had recently been driven out of their villages by the violence.

In his address to the guests, Tamimi made an impassioned plea for calm. "This is a cancer for the farmers," he said. "We don't want the farmers to leave. We want peace in our country."

Seated in the audience was Abu Alla, a member of the local agricultural chamber. For him, the violence was not the only concern. He said the harvest is much less than prewar yields. "It should be twice as much," he said.

"There's no actual support once we treated the dates with planes," added Abu Alla, who asked that his full name not be used. "But our palms are sick and they need further treatment. All agriculture in Iraq needs equipment and treatment. We have the experience but we have lack of equipment."

More than two decades ago, Iraq, known as the "land of the palms," had 30 million trees, more than anywhere else in the world. But the Iran-Iraq war of the 1980s and Hussein's campaign to destroy Shiite marshes and farmland cut the number of palm trees in half. U.N. sanctions imposed in the 1990s further slashed exports. Iraq once supplied the world market with 600,000 tons of dates a year. Today, it produces an estimated 250,000 tons.

For Abu Alla, reviving the date palm industry has religious significance. The palm tree is mentioned 21 times in Islam's holy book, the Koran. Muslims eat dates to break fasts during the holy month of Ramadan. "Our dates are very sacred. They are blessed. They are a symbol. They are a part of Islam," he said.

U.S. Army Maj. Marcus Snow, a member of the State Department Provincial Reconstruction Team in Diyala, is a stockbroker from Lancaster, Pa., who has worked with the date farmers since May. "This place could have fed the Middle East," he said with enthusiasm. "The soil is fantastic. They have so much potential, it kills me. This is, literally, the Garden of Eden."

Tapping that potential, he said, will require more action than simply growing dates. The farmers need to adopt better accounting, production and marketing practices and to use better packaging and transportation systems, he said. For starters, they need to process their dates in Baqubah, he said. Unprocessed dates are sold to Dubai for $300 a ton, he said. Processed dates could yield $3,000 a ton.

Before the invasion, there were several processing plants in Baqubah. But the owners fled the violence. Snow said he has approached some of them to come back and reopen their plants. No luck.

"They know they can make more money investing elsewhere than here," Snow said. "They are bait for kidnappers. They want to play it safe."

Mohammad, whose family has grown dates here since the 18th century, has no plans to flee, despite the attempt on his life. He predicts his harvest this year will be 70 percent more than last year, although that's still a third less than what he produced in 2000.

He can only imagine how it would be if there were peace.

"If the situation was better, I would have a very beautiful garden," Mohammad said, with a smile.

Under Guard, Dates Make A Comeback (LAT)

By Solomon Moore, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 19, 2006

A festival celebrating the best crop in years is held amid tight security. The U.S. sees hope in the industry's revival, but farmers remain fearful.

BAQUBAH, Iraq — The view from a Black Hawk helicopter is of a lush triple canopy — vegetables carpeting the ground in square green swatches, orange trees crouching over them in verdant rows, and towering above them all, Iraq's king crop, date palms.

But farmers have a different perspective on the ground — one of internecine political violence and gunmen waiting for them on the way to market.

The U.S. military is attempting to revive Iraq's date palm industry, which has been badly neglected since 2003, and on Monday arranged a trip for reporters to see the fruits of its labor at a date palm festival in Baqubah.

"Festival" might have been a bit of an overstatement. The exhibition hall was surrounded by Iraqi security forces, and eight Humvees were parked outside its tall walls. Reporters were advised to wear flak jackets in case of attack, and inside, there appeared to be more empty seats than full. Those browsing on baskets of the sticky, sweet fruit were mostly American troops or State Department employees.

Iraq's dates are traditionally used to break fasts during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan. They have been a source of national pride since the time of Hammurabi, about 3,700 years ago. Baqubah, which is also known as the "City of Oranges," was famous for its dates until 2003, when neglect exposed the trees to pests. Harvests were good for little more than coarse date-seed bread and animal feed.

Processing plants for date-palm oil, syrup and honey have moldered since the U.S.-led invasion. Factory owners have fled Baqubah, fearing the daily kidnappings, killings and bombings.

The U.S. military, however, believes the date industry is key to creating jobs and damping the sectarian violence that has rocketed in Baqubah in recent weeks.

The festival was held to celebrate the best crop in years — about 70,000 tons, up 50% from 2005.

The bumper crop, which came after U.S. forces helped restart pesticide spraying, is still a far cry from prewar yields.

"That's a very small harvest," said Chamber of Commerce member Abu Alla, whose name means "father of Alla." Abu Alla, who declined to give his family name for fear of being targeted for attack, said the harvest "should be twice as large."

"Really there is no actual support for the date palm farmers," Abu Alla said. "We've treated the dates with crop dusters, but our palms are sick and need further treatment. All agriculture in Iraq needs equipment and treatment. We have experience, but we lack equipment."

Once a breadbasket for much of the Middle East, Iraq saw its agriculture decline steeply under Saddam Hussein, falling victim to U.S.-backed economic sanctions and the regime's frivolous spending. Ruthless scorched-earth campaigns against Shiite farmland laid waste to thousands of palms. Iraq, once the world's largest producer of dates, lost 30 million trees over two decades.

Now, farmers say that Iraq's many-sided conflict is hampering yields.

Splendidly robed and adorned with a checkered headdress, Abu Adhim Abbas Mohammed, one of Diyala province's most prosperous farmers, said he was pleased with this year's harvest. But he acknowledged that he was still not seeing normal yields. Mohammed said that his 37 acres should yield 45 tons, but he was expecting to reap two-thirds that amount.

And the cost for that modest success has been high.

Several of Mohammed's relatives were killed while going to market or trying to buy equipment in Baqubah, he said.

Mohammed nearly met the same fate when gunmen attacked him as he drove to his farm, wounding him in the left arm. He escaped by firing back.

Sectarian clashes at Baqubah's northern and southern outskirts have displaced entire date-producing villages, said local Agriculture Ministry Director General Abbas Thamimi.

"Some of the people were forced to leave by the terrorists," Thamimi said.

Baqubah Mayor Khalid Sanjary said that he knew of at least 40 farming families that had left the area in recent weeks.

Home to significant populations of Shiites, Kurds and Sunni Arabs, Baqubah and its environs have recently been rocked by a series of assassinations and gun battles between Shiite militias and Sunni Arab insurgents.

On Monday, assassins killed the mayor of Udaim, a town 20 miles north of Baqubah. Last month, gunmen killed about two dozen people in a restaurant in nearby Khalis, once a date-processing center.

Al Qaeda in Iraq continues to operate in the Baqubah area three months after the U.S. Air Force dropped two bombs on its leader, Abu Musab Zarqawi. He had been hiding in the Baqubah suburb of Hibhib, known for its date wine.

"These assassinations are taking place on Baqubah's main streets," the mayor said. "These are political conflicts. All the militias and gunmen are here."

Lt. Col. James Rice, deputy commander of the 3rd Heavy Brigade Combat Team, said the violence in Baqubah was designed to alter electoral demographics.

"They're maneuvering around so that as elections come up, people can be in a position to win a majority," Rice said. "I think some of this displacement is politically motivated as people try to right-size the population in a particular area so that they will be ready for the next elections."

No date has been set for the elections. In the meantime, Baqubah's farmers struggle to find investors willing to rebuild their processing plants, and scramble in search of outside markets for their 600 varieties of dates.

A small number of farmers has begun exporting to other Iraqi cities and neighboring countries such as the United Arab Emirates.

But Army Maj. Marcus Snow, a member of the State Department Provincial Reconstruction Team in Diyala, said that attempts to reach out to a dozen leading factory-owning families had not resulted in renewed investment.

DOJ_NMG_0066107

Snow, a reservist who works as a stockbroker in Pennsylvania, said he sympathized with the factory owners' reluctance to return to Baqubah with capital.

"They're businessmen," he said.

"They know they can make more money elsewhere, and with security the way it is here, they're kidnapping bait."

Building Bridges To Locals In Afghanistan (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, September 20, 2006

KANDAGAL, AFGHANISTAN

The generals and governor strode across the 230-ft. span in eastern Afghanistan - the longest Bailey Bridge built during combat since World War II, the military says - with an optimism they want to spread across this divided valley where US and Afghan troops fight almost daily battles against the Taliban.

"Once they see the joy of reconstruction, many people will come to our side," provincial governor Didar Shalizai tells US Army Maj. Gen. Benjamin Freakley. "They will run toward us."

" Inshallah (God willing)," replies General Freakley, commander of US forces in Afghanistan, using a Muslim affirmation of hope for the future.

This new bridge over the Pech River was inaugurated Monday and marks an early step in a shifting US strategy: Clear Taliban strongholds, stay on the ground long enough to reestablish government rule, deploy Afghan forces, and show fruit of reconstruction.

But the stakes are high in a region that - already five years after US-led forces toppled the Taliban and their Al Qaeda allies - the American military has visited again and again, only to watch the Taliban filter back.

"Our persistence in staying here, versus hopscotching around Afghanistan, is that other valleys [hear] what's going on," says Freakley, in a later interview. "There were some valleys here that we were told we would have to fight our way into. And the elders came to the governor and said: 'When are you going to come help us?' "

A similar fight-and-build strategy is being pursued by NATO troops in southern provinces. They declared Operation Medusa a "significant success" over the weekend, and claimed to have killed more than 500 insurgents.

But four Canadian soldiers were killed by a suicide bomber Monday in Kandahar, who struck on a bicycle while children scrambled for pen and notebook gifts from the soldiers. Also Monday, two other bombings killed 20 civilians.

Tuesday, British defense chief Des Brown admitted that fighting was "even harder" than expected, and that "the Taliban's tenacity in the face of massive losses has been a surprise, absorbing more of our effort than we predicted it would, and consequently slowing progress on reconstruction."

Trying to turn the tide in Kunar Province, the governor - himself a past Taliban supporter, with a thick black beard - speaks to elders gathered on the ground under the trees near the newly built bridge.

"I can assure you, we will serve you in a better way - the government will serve you," promises Governor Shalizai. "We have plans to build roads ... the water system, and to provide job opportunities for your sons and people."

The people from Kunar are the "bravest people of Afghanistan, [and] I ask you to help your government bring security," says Shalizai. "Don't do things that make our enemy happy. This is a great opportunity for Afghanistan. Don't let it go."

But not all the men here are convinced. The adjacent Korengal Valley is divided, with villages to the north generally pro-government. Three villages in the south are deemed sympathetic to the Taliban and have been blocked by US and Afghan forces for weeks, ostensibly on the governor's orders.

Elders from the sanctioned villages deny they support insurgents who have carried out several killings of civilians - including murdering the child of one elder - in the past year.

"That's not true. The people of Korengal do not support the Taliban," says Zarawar Khan, head of the local governing council. "There are small pockets, of five to 10 Taliban. They attack and go back."

"I'm not happy about the American forces here, because they create a lot of problems for us," says Mr. Khan. He welcomes the bridge and other building projects, but not the blockade that, he says, has prevented vehicle traffic and led to unnecessary detentions.

"We support the Afghan government and don't allow any [insurgents] to come from our side," insists Khan. "We've said this many times."

"The people [Taliban] who are fighting there are our enemies," says Mohamed Jabar, another council member, with a long white beard half dyed orange. "I swear we don't have any relations with those people."

Encouraging just those sentiments is one aim of the US strategy in Kunar and four other eastern provinces, where $43 million has been earmarked for immediate reconstruction projects as part of Operation Mountain Fury, announced over the weekend.

In this valley alone - where rough-hewn rock mountains define the landscape - four bridges are planned for the Pech River, and a seven-mile, $500,000 road project to go the length of the valley was launched last Friday. The province has 317 schools, but only 56 with buildings - another statistic that the Army says it wants to change.

"It has been a process of separating the enemy from the people ... long enough to create breathing space to connect the people to their government," says Lt. Col. Chris Cavoli, commander of the 1st Battalion 32nd Infantry, of the US Army's 10th Mountain Division in Kunar Province.

Until his units arrived last April, the Korengal Valley was a "serious sanctuary" for the Taliban, says Lt. Col. Cavoli. Now, the blockade focuses on where "some elders and their families collude with the enemies," and is "designed to prevent movement of enemy supplies" into the valley.

The last five roadside bombs to be found were turned in by locals or Afghan forces. "For the first time ever," says Cavoli, "in the last few weeks we started to get walk-in information on the enemy deep in the Korengal."

Despite limited troop numbers, the US plan this time differs markedly from past efforts in these remote provinces, where Taliban - often based and supported on the Pakistani side of the border - have increased attacks this year.

"We've been in Korengal a multitude of times in the last four years," says Lt. Col. Paul Fitzpatrick, a US spokesman. "We push the bad guys out, ask people to support the government, and they say they will. Then we leave and the Taliban come back, and the people are in the middle."

US forces are "trying to get over the hopscotch thing," says Colonel Fitzpatrick, and "will stay until the government is capable of putting in robust enough forces."

But that is not deemed good news by all. Among the men who joined the crowd at the bridge opening was Mohamed Zahir, who complained of civilian casualties during US bombardments.

"[The American] presence will not help bring security. If they stay here, there will be a lot of security challenges for us," says Mr. Zahir. "As a result of one or two [insurgents] they bomb our area, destroy our crops and destroy our business."

Battalion commander Cavoli counters that permanent security will depend on Afghan forces, not the US. There have been "very few" civilian casualties, he says, though he is paying compensation for a herd of goats killed in one US strike. "We strive that there be no civilian casualties," says Cavoli. "It's enormously counter-productive."

Afghanistan's Drug Habit (NYT)

By Joel Hafvenstein

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

London

AS if there hadn't been enough bad news from Afghanistan of late, now the country's drug dependency is back in the headlines. On Sept. 2, the head of the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime reported that the shattered country is now producing 92 percent of the world's supply of illegal opium, up from 87 percent in 2004. This deplorable new record will not be reversed by more belligerent counternarcotics measures. Instead, America, NATO and the Afghan government must reform a vital but neglected institution: the local police.

In 2004, for the first time in history, farmers in every province of Afghanistan chose to cultivate opium poppies. The American and Afghan governments promised a major poppy eradication campaign. Aid agencies scrambled to create an economic alternative for the thousands of Afghans who depended on poppy farming to survive.

Thus in November 2004, I traveled to Lashkargah, the capital of Helmand Province, the opium heartland of Afghanistan, as the deputy leader of an "alternative livelihoods" project financed by the United States Agency for International Development. Our core team was made up of six Western aid workers, and we hired some 80 Afghan staff members.

In the long-term plan, alternative livelihoods meant helping Afghan farmers export high-value crops like saffron and cumin. It meant restoring the orchards and vineyards that had once made Afghanistan a power in the raisin and almond markets. It meant providing credit to farmers who had relied on traffickers for affordable loans.

In the short run, however, with the first eradication tractors already plowing up poppy fields, we had no time for those approaches. Instead, we created public-works jobs. Like a New Deal agency, we handed out shovels to thousands of local Afghans and paid them $4 per day to repair canals and roads. We found plenty of work on Helmand's grand but dilapidated irrigation system, a legacy of early cold-war American aid. By May 2005, we had paid out millions of dollars and had some 14,000 men on the payroll simultaneously. The program buoyed the provincial economy, and would have made a fine launching pad for long-term alternatives to poppy.

Security was our Achilles' heel. There was a new American military base by the graveyard on the edge of town, but the few score Iowa National Guard members there lacked the manpower and the local knowledge to protect us. We could not afford the professional security companies in Kabul, most run by brash veterans of Western militaries. Then, just before Christmas, some of our engineers were carjacked. We resorted to the only remaining source of protection: the provincial police.

We soon found that at their best, the Helmand police forces were half-organized militias with charismatic leadership and years of combat experience. At their worst, the policemen were bandits, pederasts and hashish addicts. Our local guard captain was one of the better ones, but he was still far from reliable.

Once I asked him what he earned as a district police commander. "The governor paid us no salary," he curtly replied. "The people gave us money. To thank us for solving their problems." I was never sure if we were paying him enough to solve our problems.

When the attacks came, our security was useless. On May 18, five of our Afghan staff members were murdered in the field. The next morning, one of the funeral convoys was ambushed, leaving six more of our workers and their relatives dead. The police responded with indiscriminate arrests and bluster, but they lacked the investigative skills to catch the killers.

We heard rumors that the attackers were Taliban troops — and indeed, the attacks were harbingers of the Taliban resurgence that Helmand has seen in the last year. We also heard that the Taliban had been paid by local drug barons to attack our project. All we knew was that we were targets, and that we could not protect ourselves. Within days, we had stopped all our projects and most of the staff went home.

To reduce Afghanistan's poppy cultivation, Western governments must keep their focus on improving security. Aid agencies and the Afghan government cannot foster alternatives to opium while under fire. In chaotic times, Afghan farmers are more likely to plant poppy, which offers the surest and highest returns on investment. Some remote areas of Afghanistan have grown poppy since the time of Alexander the Great, but in the irrigated plains of Helmand it caught on only during the breakdown of order in the 1980's. With security restored, the farmers of Helmand could rebuild their province and return to licit crops.

Local police forces are the weakest link in Afghanistan's security net. After the fall of the Taliban, the United States and NATO put most of their energy into building a professional Afghan Army. The police forces were essentially surrendered to local warlords — not through any malign plan, but by lack of money and attention.

Most Afghan policemen have now gone through a basic training course run by American and German police officers, but they return to units that are ill equipped, badly organized, founded on personal loyalty to a commander and accountable to no one.

The 4,500 British troops now fighting alongside Afghan soldiers in Helmand can defeat insurgents who muster in large numbers, but they cannot counter the Taliban's shrewder tactics — urban ambushes, suicide bombings and strikes on "soft" civilian targets like our project. For that, the police are necessary.

The Afghan Army and foreign powers must create space in which a professional, accountable police force can take root. This means continued military action against large Taliban incursions, diplomatic pressure on Pakistan to stop providing a haven for insurgents, and a focus on shielding the large cities of southern Afghanistan — Lashkargah, Kandahar and Ghazni — long enough for the Afghan government to establish the kernels of an improved police force there. It will also require an end to the impunity enjoyed by warlords and major traffickers, who can order an attack safe in the knowledge that the Taliban will be blamed.

The new Afghan police force needs clear lines of authority, formal disciplinary procedures and methods for internal oversight and public complaint. The officers need adequate pay and equipment, which can come only from Western sources, and better training in investigation and civilian protection. To ensure that all this makes a difference, the United States and its allies must commit experienced Western police officers to field-based mentoring programs with provincial police forces.

The poppy boom won't be solved by police reform alone, of course. The Afghan government must purge drug kingpins from the federal and provincial governments, and continue disarming militias (friendly as well as hostile).

Nothing has cost President Hamid Karzai more popularity in the south than the sense that unscrupulous gunmen are back in control. Security was the Taliban's main selling point when it took control of the country in the 1990's; it could be again.

Saying Thank You To Those Who Answered The Call Of Duty (NYT)

By Katie Zezima

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

BANGOR, Me. — Shortly before 11 on a recent Monday night, Cathy Czarnecki made sure the macadamia nut cookies were on the table of treats in a room at Bangor International Airport. The commercial passengers had all left, but 260 soldiers would soon arrive to a welcome that few of them expected.

"Here they come!" someone shouted, and a dozen or so volunteers went out into the hallway and applauded as a line of soldiers in desert camouflage and tan boots poured into the small terminal.

"Thank you for your service," one man said to a soldier while shaking his hand. "Welcome to Maine," another greeter said.

"I think I'm going to cry," a female soldier said after being hugged and cheered in the terminal.

The volunteers are members of Maine Troop Greeters, which was founded in 1991 to greet troops headed to the Persian Gulf war. Since May 2003, shortly after the start of the Iraq war, the group has welcomed every military transport flight that has arrived here.

The group came about, in part, because this is the country's easternmost airport and it has one of the longest runways in the nation, making it a favored military refueling and transfer location.

The founder of the group, Bill Knight, 84, is a World War II veteran. He recalled how soldiers were treated after Vietnam and said he wanted to ensure that troops were thanked.

"The way they treated those troops was horrible," Mr. Knight said. "We can't go back, but we can try to make a difference from here on out."

Maine Troop Greeters has about 100 volunteers who operate out of the small room, which is lined with American flags, signed military T-shirts and maps of Iraq. They arrive about three hours before a flight to set out cookies donated by a local Sam's Club, pies baked by volunteers, and candy and donuts. They also make sure free cellphones donated by local providers are available for troops to use.

The greeters here on the recent Monday night had various reasons for donating their time.

Ms. Czarnecki joined in 2004 after her son was deployed to Iraq. “It was my security blanket,” she said. “It was my way to stay connected with what was going on over there.”

Her son has returned safely, and she continues to volunteer.

Peter Jones, 51, started greeting troops here in March, shortly after his father, Freeland, died at age 82. Freeland Jones, a World War II veteran, volunteered until he was not strong enough, and his son said he felt that coming here honored both his father and the troops.

Mr. Jones said he became hooked his first day, when members of a New Jersey National Guard unit wept as greeters hugged them and shook their hands. “It lifts my spirit to know I can come out here and make a difference,” Mr. Jones said.

The plane on that Monday night brought troops from bases in California, Nevada, Utah and Washington, and was headed to Ramstein Air Base in Germany and then to the Middle East. It was the 1,774th flight greeted since May 2003, with 335,195 men and women and 35 military dogs having passed through the airport.

“Use a cellphone, call home,” Mr. Knight said as he doled them out. “Have something,” he added, motioning to the food.

Lt. Col. Eric Shalita, 43, did both, helping himself to a powdered donut after calling his wife and two daughters at Nellis Air Force Base in Nevada. “It was amazing,” Colonel Shalita said. “We were completely not expecting this.”

“It’s nice to know that people genuinely support us,” he added.

Staff Sgt. Stanley Siaosi, 26, was tired from the trip and missed his wife and children, who live at Hill Air Force Base in Utah. Sergeant Siaosi said the greeting made him resolute about his mission.

“This is really motivating for us to go out there and do our job,” he said. “You come here on the other side of the U.S., and there are greeters there ready to shake your hand. It gives you that patriotic feeling.”

The airport’s restaurant and gift shop stayed open late, and the troops eagerly dug into cheeseburgers and chicken fingers, some washing them down with the last Budweisers and Coronas they will have for a while.

Others sat in the terminal, chatting with the greeters about life, family and Bangor’s most famous resident, Stephen King. Some said they really like Maine, despite having never set foot outside the airport, and most vowed to come back for lobster. Two hours after the troops arrived, the beer still flowed and most of the greeters remained, eagerly chatting.

“This is really good for the young kids,” Chaplain Jeff Neuberger, 56, said as he motioned to a room filled with baby-faced soldiers. “It’s one little gesture, but the support means everything to these guys and gals.”

The Moutons Remain Close — Even In Iraq (USAT/AP)

By Jeff Carlton, The Associated Press

USA Today, September 20, 2006

FORT HOOD, Texas — When Michael, Allen and Reginald Mouton were ordered to Iraq by the Army, the brothers could have asked to be split up. They say they never considered it.

So all three of them will ship out for the Middle East next month. It's an extremely rare instance of three brothers being sent to the same base in a combat zone.

They will be, in every sense, brothers in arms.

“Lord forbid if the ultimate price is paid. It is hard to imagine that,” says Staff Sgt. Reginald Mouton, 31. If the worst should happen, he says, it is good “to be there with your brother and know you can support the other brother and you can tell your family, ‘I was there with him and he didn't suffer.' ”

Reginald is a medic who runs a battalion aid station for about 1,000 troops. Allen, 40, a first sergeant, leads about 100 soldiers in a combat group. Michael, 42, also a first sergeant, does the same in a logistical support group.

In World War II, five brothers from Waterloo, Iowa, died together when their cruiser was torpedoed by a Japanese submarine. They were immortalized in a 1944 film as The Fighting Sullivans. After their deaths, Congress considered forbidding siblings to serve together in wartime. Today the Army permits family members to serve together, but they can ask to be separated.

The Moutons say they take comfort in knowing they'll be together in the 3,800-member Ironhorse Brigade — the 1st Brigade of the 1st Cavalry Division — although Allen says that for the family, it amounts to “putting all your eggs in one basket.” They are their mother's only offspring. She also has a stepson.

“I am just going to have a lot of my worry and prayers focused in one area,” says their mother, Peggy Austin, a nursing supervisor in Houston. “That is the best way I can look at it.”

The Army does not track how often family members serve together. The deployment of three brothers from the same brigade to the same forward operating base — the military would not say exactly where — is “very rare,” says Lt. Col. Lee Packnett, an Army spokesman. “There are many siblings in the Army, but rarely do you have even two in the same unit.”

It will be the second tour in Iraq for each brother but the first time all three have been there at the same time. Reginald took part in the initial invasion but was back in the States by the time Michael and Allen shipped out.

The brothers say they have always been close. Michael and Allen used to race motorcycles against each other, and they still compete in video games. Michael is building a house in Killeen, Texas, down the street from Allen's place.

"We're not only like brothers but we're best friends," Allen says. "We're always there to help each other, whether it's moving or working on cars."

Allen was the first to enlist; he signed up after high school in 1984. He had planned to serve only three years and join the Houston Police Department when he got out, but he found that Army life suited him. Michael enlisted three months later. Allen eventually became a recruiter and helped Reginald sign up after the youngest brother had taken nursing classes.

Three generations of the family have served in uniform. Two uncles fought in Vietnam. Allen's daughter, Meagan, 18, is in the Air Force.

The brothers, all married with children, said they have no qualms about returning to Iraq. The hardest part of a deployment is separation from family, they say, which is another reason they're happy they'll be together.

"When times get hard and you get lonely and you miss home," Reginald says, "you have someone from home that you can talk to."

From Venice, A Lesson On Empire (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, September 20, 2006

What do the struggles of 15th-century Venice have to do with America's troubles in Iraq? A lot, in the view of a group of old-guard Washington conservatives who sponsored a conference last week to discuss the lessons for today of La Serenissima , as the "serene republic" of Venice was known.

The sponsors of the conference, about whom more later, began with a question: How did the Venetians maintain their far-flung Mediterranean empire and also prosper as a free republic for over five centuries? Was their model of empire -- heavy on mercantile trading relationships, lighter on military intervention -- an example for the United States in the era of globalization? Did Venice practice a version of "Empire Lite" that America might emulate?

The conference organizers had gathered a retinue of professional historians, so the answers were far more hedged than the questions. The scholars described a Venetian republic that was far from democratic, vesting political power in a small circle of aristocratic families. The imperial ambitions of the city-state were founded on a carefully cultivated myth of Venice's divine right to power, backed by the strongest fleet in the Mediterranean.

But compared with America's current imperial troubles, Venice was serenity itself. One secret was that its empire sought trade, not territory. "The Venetians tried to keep local people and institutions in power. It was very much a hands-off model," explained Edward Muir, a professor at Northwestern University who spoke at the conference.

The Venetians' imperial difficulties came on dry land -- "Terrafirma," as the island state called the territories it administered in northeast Italy. But even there, says Muir, the Venetians sought to extend their power through a system of laws and patronage, rather than military occupation. "The Venetian empire was a judicial network, more than an economic or political one," he argued.

John Martin, a history professor at Trinity University in San Antonio, suggested a comparison between Rome and Venice. If the Roman Empire was about hard military power, imposed by the Roman legions, Venice was "soft power," to use the term popularized by Harvard professor Joseph Nye. It survived so long because it recognized limits to its ability to impose its will abroad.

The canny mercantilism of Venice's ruling families was another advantage for La Serenissima. The merchant families protected their republican form of government at home, even as their trading empire expanded. In contrast to imperial Rome, whose senate became a shell, Venice maintained its system of a non-hereditary ruler, known as the "doge"; its Great Council, where every adult male aristocrat was represented; and its secretive Council of Ten, which supervised a vast intelligence network. A far-flung empire required a strong executive, but Venetians resisted the temptation to turn their doge into an emperor or king, noted Martin.

Now, who might be inquiring into the contemporary lessons of an empire that died more than 200 years ago? The answer is as intriguing as the conference itself. The sponsor was a little-known group called the Committee for the Republic, which was formed back in 2003 by a group of establishment Washingtonians -- paleoconservatives, one might call them -- who were concerned about neoconservative enthusiasm for foreign interventions. The group briefly got into trouble in 2005 after it sponsored a discussion of the Palestinian issue that riled pro-Israel groups in Washington.

A leading member is C. Boyden Gray, former White House counsel in the Bush 41 administration and a longtime amateur historian of Venice. Gray, now the U.S. representative to the European Union in Brussels, wasn't able to attend the gathering. Presiding in his place was William Nitze, the son of former arms negotiator Paul Nitze.

Gray explained his interest in the Venetian model in an e-mail to other members of the group: "Whenever Venice won a naval battle, it asked not for territory, taxes or tribute but free-trade zones," he noted. "As part of its commercial empire, Venice had to rely on extensive intelligence in order to avoid foreign troop basing. As a result, its intelligence service was unmatched and its diplomacy unrivaled."

The quirky Venice conference is important less for any precise parallels it may offer for contemporary America than as an example of the debate that's growing among both liberals and conservatives in the wake of the Iraq war about the limits of American power. It raises the big strategic questions that too often get overlooked in Washington's endless round of seminars: How does a nation maintain a far-flung network of commercial interests without subverting its values at home? How does a nation have the benefits of imperial reach without the ruinous costs of empire? It's a debate that will widen as America moves toward its post-Iraq introspection.

Keane Secures Justice Grant Management Deal (WASHTECH)

By William Welsh, Deputy Editor

Washington Technology, September 20, 2006

Keane Inc. won a contract from the Justice Department to deliver IT support services for a key grant program, under a contract worth $14 million over five years.

Keane of Boston will supply program management and application maintenance to support help desk and network operations for the Community Oriented Policing Services Office's management system.

Keane's Public Sector practice will run the project. Teamed with Keane are Turner Consulting Group of Washington and Apptis Inc. of Chantilly, Va.

The Community Oriented Policing Services Office gives grants to local governments to enhance neighborhood policing. These grants have resulted in the hiring of 118,000 police officers and the purchase of numerous technical resources since 1995.

"CMS will allow the Department of Justice users to more effectively manage the lifecycle of the grants process: from issuance to search, to approvals in a data protected environment," Glenn Giles, vice president and general manager of Keane's Public Sector Practice, said in a statement announcing the award.

Justice Awards Keane New IT Task Order (FCW)

By David Hubler

Federal Computer Week, September 20, 2006

The Justice Department has awarded Keane, a business process and information technology services firm, a task order to provide IT support services to the Office of Community Oriented Policing Services (COPS) Management System.

The task order was awarded through Keane's existing Justice IT Support Services contract.

According to a statement from Keane, the $14 million task order covers one base year plus four, one-year options.

During that time, the Boston-based integrator will provide a full-range of IT services -- including IT program management and application maintenance, help-desk support, and network operations -- for the COPS Management System (CMS), which oversees the agency's grant-making process and other business services.

Since 1995, COPS has invested $11.9 billion to advance community policing, providing nearly 36,000 state and local grants to hire more than 118,000 police officers and provide numerous technical assistance resources.

The CMS work will be performed by Keane's Public Sector practice. Turner Consulting Group and Apptis are partnering with Keane.

"Law enforcement has found community policing to be a critical component in responding to crime, gang activity, and homeland security," said Carl Peed, director of COPS at Justice, in a statement.

"CMS will allow Department of Justice users to more effectively manage the life cycle of the grants process, from issuance to search, to approvals in a data protected environment," said Glenn Giles, vice president and general manager of Keane's Public Sector practice.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Emails Point To Prime Role Of Chairman, Top Counsel In Setting Direction, Tactics (WSJ)

By Peter Waldman

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

As early as summer 2005, Hewlett-Packard Co. Chairman Patricia Dunn and General Counsel Ann Baskins helped direct the company's board-leak investigation, as part of the planning and execution of many steps of the probe, internal H-P emails suggest.

H-P has disclosed only that Ms. Dunn and an "internal group" inside the Palo Alto, Calif., company, working with outside investigators, conducted the leak probes in 2005 and 2006. Ms. Dunn has said in interviews that she couldn't supervise the investigation because, as one of the H-P directors being investigated for leaking information to the media, she was a potential target of the probe. Instead, Ms. Dunn has said, she turned to H-P's security department to handle it.

However, H-P emails reviewed by The Wall Street Journal suggest that Ms. Dunn and Ms. Baskins were closely involved in helping direct the course of the investigation. The emails indicate that the two were kept well informed of the investigation's tactics and progress by the H-P security officials who ran the probe, as well as by some of the private investigators H-P hired to assist the computer company.

In an email dated Aug. 6, 2005, H-P's manager of global investigations, Tony Gentilucci, requests Ms. Dunn's input on an attached three-page memo titled "Investigative Plan of Action and Questions Requiring Input." That memo was addressed to Ms. Baskins, Jim Fairbaugh, who was H-P's director of global security, and Ronald DeLia, who was one of H-P's outside investigators.

In the memo, Mr. Gentilucci updated Ms. Dunn and the others on several facets of the probe, including "intelligence gathering" on "interested parties" through "internal and external sources."

The memo doesn't mention what those intelligence sources were, nor does it specify if they included people's personal phone records. H-P has admitted obtaining personal phone records of more than a dozen people, including some of its own board members, journalists and employees, through "pretexting," the practice of acquiring records through false pretenses. The breaches of privacy are being investigated by California and federal officials as possible crimes. People close to the investigation said the phone records of former Chief Executive Officer Carly Fiorina were pretexted, which was reported yesterday in the San Jose Mercury News and the San Francisco Chronicle.

Ms. Dunn, through a spokesman, declined to comment. An H-P spokesman declined to comment. Mr. Gentilucci, Ms. Baskins and Mr. Fairbaugh didn't return calls requesting comment. Mr. DeLia couldn't be reached for comment.

Mr. Gentilucci's memo described an intensive investigation in 2005, code-named Project KONA, in which H-P's security officials cultivated confidential "informants" to develop leads on which directors may have met with which journalists. In one part of the document labeled "Next Steps," Mr. Gentilucci said he intended to "follow up" with H-P's vice president of media relations, Robert Sherbin, about a number of potential leads that Mr. Sherbin had provided him.

In one of those tips, the memo stated, Mr. Sherbin said someone had informed him that H-P director George Keyworth had been observed meeting with a Wall Street Journal reporter in a San Francisco hotel about one year earlier. Mr. Gentilucci told Ms. Dunn in the in the memo that he intended to ask Mr. Sherbin to identify this tipster, and Mr. Gentilucci asked Ms. Dunn whether H-P had held a board meeting in a San Francisco hotel in that time period. Mr. Sherbin said his obligation is to respond to company requests, and leaks had been a problem for H-P. He said he passed on information to investigators about potential sources of the leaks.

In another section of the 2005 memo labeled "Update," Mr. Gentilucci wrote that a "tentative management briefing" on the investigation was scheduled for Aug. 31. It is unclear if this meeting took place. If it did, it raises the question of who else in H-P's management, including CEO Mark Hurd, knew about the extent of the leak probe in summer 2005. H-P has said Mr. Hurd was given a summary of the leak investigation's results in March of this year, but didn't focus on the evidence for those conclusions.

It is unclear how Ms. Dunn and Ms. Baskins responded to the Gentilucci email. But in another email, Ms. Dunn acknowledges Mr. Gentilucci's email and promises to respond.

By January 2006, H-P was on to a new leak investigation Ms. Dunn launched and which emails refer to as KONA II. H-P emails indicate that lawyers and others inside H-P knew the company was on shaky legal ground in going after personal phone records, yet pursued them anyway. On Jan. 28, 2006, Kevin Hunsaker, a senior ethics attorney in H-P's legal department, asked a colleague if it was legal to acquire people's personal text messages, presumably from their cellphone records.

The Hunsaker email was an apparent follow-up to an earlier question posed to Fred Adler, a former computer-crimes cop who works at H-P's security unit. Mr. Hunsaker, complaining that one of the targets of the leak probe -- then-H-P director Thomas Perkins -- rarely used his cellphone "and does just about everything via text message," asked Mr. Adler if H-P could "lawfully get text-message content, or is it the same as the cellphone records?"

Mr. Adler's response, 13 minutes later: "Even if we could legally obtain the records, which we can't unless we either pay the bill or get consent, I would highly suspect text-messaging records are not kept due to volume and expense. The only other means is through real-time interception, an avenue not open to us." The H-P spokesman said Mr. Hunsaker and Mr. Adler wouldn't comment.

People familiar with H-P's probe say the company did acquire personal cellphone records of several people through pretexting. It is unclear if H-P also attempted to acquire text messages.

Another email by Mr. Hunsaker, dated April 28, 2006, shows how Ms. Baskins tried to be extra certain that H-P's probe was legal, before action was taken against Mr. Keyworth, who was accused of leaking information to the press. In a one-page email written to Messrs. Gentilucci and DeLia, Mr. Hunsaker said he was writing at Ms. Baskins's request to confirm the details of how the investigation team obtained people's personal phone records. He said Ms. Baskins wanted to "confirm the legality" of the operation, before providing the information to Larry Sonsini, H-P's outside lawyer, and to H-P director Robert Ryan, who were planning to interview Mr. Keyworth.

Mr. Hunsaker's email described how personal phone records had been gathered through outside parties, noting that he was the only H-P employee who saw the fully compiled records. His email said H-P provided the names and phone numbers of the people it was targeting to Mr. DeLia, and he passed on the information to a "third party" and "they make the pretext calls." He said his own legal research, as well as that of an outside attorney, confirmed that pretexting was legal.

His email appears to be the first H-P document to emerge that uses the word pretexting. People close to Ms. Dunn and Mr. Hurd have said those executives heard the term for the first time only after the leak probe blew up this summer.

Separately, the House Energy and Commerce Committee asked Mr. Gentilucci and Joe Depante, owner of Action Research Group of Melbourne, Fla., another firm involved in the H-P probe, to testify at a Sept. 28 hearing on the scandal. Mr. Sonsini, who has retained Washington attorney Michael Madigan to represent him in the House investigation, informed the committee yesterday that he would testify. Ms. Dunn and Ms. Baskins have agreed to testify, and Mr. DeLia has told the committee that, were he to appear, he would invoke his constitutional right against self-incrimination.

Extensive Spying Found At HP (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima And Yuki Noguchi

The Washington Post, September 20, 2006

The Hewlett-Packard Co. spying effort that has sparked criminal investigations was wide-ranging and included physical surveillance, photographs and spyware sent via e-mail, and it also targeted wives and other relatives of HP board members and reporters, according to a consultant's report prepared for the company.

The Feb. 10 report, obtained by The Washington Post, summarized in eight pages how investigators, to identify an internal leak of confidential HP information, surreptitiously followed HP board member George A. Keyworth II while he was giving a lecture at the University of Colorado. They watched his home in Piedmont, Calif. They used photographs of a reporter to see if the reporter met with him. And they tried to recover a laptop computer stolen from him in Italy so they could analyze its contents.

The report, prepared by a consulting firm in Needham, Mass., hired to investigate leaks to the media, was sent to four HP executives, including HP's ethics director. That suggests that senior HP employees were aware of the spying tactics used as early as February. The report was sent to Kevin Hunsaker, senior counsel and HP ethics director; Frederick P. Adler, an HP information security employee; Vince Nye, a senior investigator; and Anthony Gentilucci, an HP global investigations manager in Boston.

The report, prepared by Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc., detailed extensive efforts it supervised to obtain calling records for home, office and cellphones and fax lines of various HP board members and reporters covering the company.

The report described how investigators sent an e-mail to a reporter for the online technology publication Cnet.com that contained spyware software in an attached file. If opened, the attachment was designed to install itself on her computer and track every keystroke.

The extent to which the Silicon Valley computer company would go to identify the person who spoke anonymously to a reporter about confidential company operations has scandalized corporate America, launched federal and state investigations, and outraged members of Congress, who have called a Sept. 28 hearing on the matter.

Larry Neal, a spokesman for the House Energy and Commerce investigative subcommittee, said yesterday that outgoing HP chairman Patricia C. Dunn, general counsel Ann Baskins and outside counsel Larry Sonsini are expected to testify. Ronald R. DeLia, owner of Security Outsourcing Solutions and the author of the confidential HP report, is also expected to appear but may choose to invoke his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination, said Neal, the deputy staff director for the full committee.

Two others asked to appear before the committee -- Gentilucci, the Boston HP global investigator, and Joseph DePante, owner of a private investigative firm in Florida, have not responded to the committee's request, Neal said.

The House committee has also requested that HP turn over documents related to the investigation and has received "several thousand pages" so far, Neal said.

Another document reviewed by The Post revealed that HP's ethics chief in January was plotting ways to obtain information on board members and was being warned off those tactics by a colleague. On Jan. 28, Hunsaker asked Adler whether there was any way to "lawfully get text message content." Hunsaker wrote about HP board member Thomas Perkins, "Apparently, Perkins almost never uses uses his cell phone, and instead does just about everything via text message."

In an e-mail reply, Adler told Hunsaker "[e]ven if we could legally obtain the records, which we can't unless we either pay the bill or get consent, I would highly suspect text messaging records are not kept due to volume and expense. The only other means is through real time interception, an avenue not open to us."

HP has conducted two internal leak investigations in the past two years, the first dubbed "Kona 1" and running from March 2005 through the summer of 2005. The second, "Kona 2," ran from January to May 2006, according to sources familiar with the investigation.

Kona 2 was prompted by a story by Cnet reporter Dawn Kawamoto about the firm's long-term strategy, and from the February consultant's report, it is clear that HP focused fairly early -- by mid-February -- on board members Keyworth and Perkins. Keyworth has since admitted to leaking information and resigned from the board.

According to DeLia's report, investigators obtained subscriber information on at least 240 of more than 300 phone numbers sought, and was in the process of analyzing them, including the records of phone calls from Keyworth's New Mexico house, to and from his fax and cellphone, as well as his new wife's home and cellphones. Similarly, the firm obtained records of Perkins's home phone calls from Jan. 4 to Jan. 26, including 12 U.S. calls, three to Britain and two other international calls.

According to the report, board members, reporters and their spouses, particularly at Cnet, were subject to broad background checks, including details of where they worked, attended school and lived. Investigators hired through DeLia's firm obtained call information on Kawamoto's home phone, cellphone and a cellphone believed to belong to Kawamoto's husband's. They conducted "[e]xtensive Media and Internet Content Research" on Cnet reporter Tom Krazit and his wife.

The call information was obtained by a technique sometimes called "pretexting," or impersonating someone else to obtain their phone records, HP said in a Securities and Exchange Commission filing.

The investigators also began an e-mail exchange with Kawamoto "under the pretext of . . . . develop[ing] a dialogue with the reporter." Then, he noted, on Feb. 9, an e-mail was sent to Kawamoto with an attached file with "tracking capability," or software that logs keystrokes in real time.

Investigators experienced in corporate work said the technique, called "keylogging," was out of bounds in this case. "I've been doing this a long time and I've never heard or seen of investigators doing those nefarious types of tactics," said Robert Seiden, president of Fortress Global Investigations Corp. in New York. "To get access to a reporter's computer raises a whole slew of privacy and legal issues."

Kawamoto did not reply to phone messages and a Cnet spokeswoman declined to comment. Krazit also declined to comment.

HP's Dunn To Testify On Capitol Hill (FT)

By Kevin Allison And Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, September 20, 2006

Hewlett-Packard's chairman and general counsel have agreed to testify on Capitol Hill about their roles in a boardroom spying scandal that has sparked a crisis at the top of the world's second-biggest computer group.

Patricia Dunn, chairman, and Ann Baskins, general counsel, will appear before the House Committee on Energy and Commerce on September 28 and are expected to testify, according to a committee spokesperson. Larry Sonsini, a veteran Silicon Valley lawyer and HP's outside counsel, has also agreed to testify.

Lawmakers on the committee are expected to vote on Wednesday on a measure that would give committee chairman Joe Barton and John Dingell, the highest ranking Democrat on the committee, the power to fast-track subpoenas for information from HP.

A committee aide said the vote would give congressional investigators greater flexibility in eliciting information from the company if HP moved to hold back documents or if executives changed their minds about testifying over the weekend. Without the measure, Mr Barton and Mr Dingell would have to hold a vote of the whole committee before issuing a subpoena. So far, the company and executives have voluntarily submitted information, including thousands of pages of documents.

Ronald DeLia, a private investigator who has been tied to the case, is also expected to appear before the committee with Ms Dunn and Ms Baskins but "may" invoke his fifth amendment right and refuse to testify, a committee spokesperson said.

The committee widened its investigation into the scandal on Tuesday by calling on two more witnesses to testify: Anthony Gentilucci, HP's head of global security, and Joe Depante, who owns a private investigation firm that worked on the internal HP investigation.

HP admitted earlier this month that investigators hired by its board had posed as board members, journalists and employees in order to get hold of personal telephone records that could point to the source of a boardroom leak.

News that HP's investigators used false pretences to obtain the records, a practice known as "pretexting," has sparked criminal investigations by the California attorney general and the FBI in addition to US lawmakers.

The controversy last week claimed the job of Ms Dunn, who announced she would step down as HP chairman in January in an effort to defuse the crisis. Mark Hurd, chief executive, will assume the role of chairman, while Ms Dunn will remain as a director.

HP admitted at the weekend that its spies had inappropriately obtained telephone records of Michael Moeller, a press spokesman, in addition to those of board members and journalists.

Dunn, HP Counsels To Testify Before House Panel (SFC)

San Francisco Chronicle, September 20, 2006

Hearing may make it clear what they knew in advance

(09-19) 18:02 PDT -- Hewlett Packard Co. Chairwoman Patricia Dunn has agreed to answer questions from a congressional panel investigating the company's controversial probe of internal leaks to the media, the Palo Alto giant said Tuesday.

Also planning to testify Sept. 28 before the House Energy and Commerce Committee will be HP's in-house counsel Ann Baskins and outside counsel Larry Sonsini, chairman of Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, a prominent Silicon Valley law firm.

Their decision suggests that, while the HP probe turned into an embarrassing scandal, Dunn, Baskins and Sonsini are confident they did not do anything wrong and have nothing to hide from lawmakers who are expected to ask them tough questions, analysts say.

But the hearings in Washington, D.C., will likely shed more light on HP's use of false identities and other questionable tactics to obtain personal information on directors, employees and journalists.

The three could have refused the invitation, although legal experts say that could have prompted the panel to issue subpoenas in order to compel them to testify.

"Larry intends to testify and looks forward to the opportunity," a spokeswoman for Sonsini said.

An HP spokesman declined to elaborate on the reason for Dunn and Baskins' decision to go to Washington.

"I think it is prudent and it probably suggests that they feel confident that they had no direct knowledge of anything illegal that may or may not have taken place," said Stephen Diamond, a law professor at Santa Clara University. "That suggests they are pretty confident in being able to explain what happened."

Robert Weisberg, a law professor at Stanford University, agreed, but he also speculated that their decision to testify came after negotiations with the committee on the areas the panel will cover.

"Possibility No. 2 is there have been private discussions and there is an agreement that there might a limitation on the scope of the questioning so that the potential danger can be avoided, and these individuals will not have to publicly take the fifth," he said.

An HP spokesman declined to comment on whether there is such an agreement.

Weisberg portrayed Dunn, Baskins and Sonsini as "sophisticated and well-counseled people who are going to be very wary of being in a situation where they can say anything that might come back to bite them."

The panel had also invited Ronald DeLia, managing director of Security Outsourcing Solutions, the Massachusetts private investigation firm that reportedly took part in the HP investigation.

On Tuesday, the committee said it has also sent invitations to Anthony Gentilucci, HP's global security manager; and Joe Depante, a private investigator and owner of Action Research Group in Florida.

Action Research Group has been identified as one of the outside agencies HP hired to conduct its internal probe.

The spying scandal began in early 2005, when then-CEO Carly Fiorina and other directors began looking into leaks of board deliberations to journalists.

After Fiorina was fired, her successor as chairwoman, Dunn, pursued the investigation, which eventually pointed to Director George Keyworth, who eventually resigned in protest of the probe.

Dunn has said she was not aware that potentially illegal methods were used in the investigation. HP has admitted using pretexting, as the practice is called, in obtaining information on directors, employees and journalists.

She has agreed to step down as chairwoman in January and will be replaced by CEO Mark Hurd, who will serve in a dual role.

HP faces other inquiries, including probes by the Justice Department, the Securities and Exchange Commission and California Attorney General Bill Lockyer.

HP Execs To Testify Before House Panel (AP)

By Marcy Gordon, AP Business Writer

AP, September 20, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- As new revelations about Hewlett-Packard Co.'s director spying scandal cascade, Chairwoman Patricia Dunn and the company's general counsel have agreed to testify next week before a House panel investigating the affair.

With federal and California prosecutors conducting criminal investigations of HP's use of deceptive tactics to find a boardroom leaker, some experts say the executives' testimony to Congress could be fraught with legal peril.

On the other hand, the risks of invoking their Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination - as a parade of corporate executives have done on Capitol Hill in recent years - could be even greater, according to others.

Dunn, who authorized the leak investigation and has agreed to cede the chairmanship to the company's chief executive in January, and General Counsel Ann Baskins will testify at the hearing next Thursday by the House Energy and Commerce Committee, according to HP spokesman Ryan Donovan and committee spokesman Terry Lane.

In addition, Hewlett-Packard's outside lawyer, Larry Sonsini, who had defended the pretexting tactics as "not generally unlawful," has agreed to testify at next week's hearing, panel spokesman Lane said Tuesday. Ronald DeLia, the private investigator who runs Security Outsourcing Solutions, a firm hired by HP, is expected to appear but may invoke his Fifth Amendment right and refuse to answer questions, Lane said.

In appearing before the panel, the two executives of Silicon Valley's largest and oldest technology company will be stepping into the highly charged and well-choreographed theater that is a congressional hearing. Enduring hours of questioning, business executives often sit at witness tables as they are vilified by lawmakers before television cameras.

Many such hearings, quickly convened amid unfolding scandals, "are about scoring political points, about making news," said Michael N. Levy, a former federal prosecutor who is a defense attorney at McKee Nelson in Washington.

They afford lawmakers an occasion to take strong stands on issues that resonate with the public, Levy noted. In this case, the issue is privacy. The Hewlett-Packard affair concerns the use by the company's investigators of a practice known as "pretexting" to obtain the private phone records of several directors and at least 12 other people, including journalists. To execute the ruse, the investigators impersonated the targeted individuals, using parts of their Social Security numbers to dupe telephone companies into turning over their calling records.

"It's certainly very dicey" for Dunn and Baskins to answer lawmakers' questions amid ongoing criminal investigations, said Michael Himmel, also an ex-Justice Department prosecutor now in private practice, at Lowenstein Sandler in New York.

In his extensive work defending officers and directors of public companies, Himmel says, he has never counseled them to testify at congressional hearings.

"You're talking high-stakes poker because the downside is losing one's liberty," he said.

For Levy, the question to weigh in deciding whether an executive should testify is balancing the risks of the "unknown" - what could surface in the authorities' investigations - against the risks of taking the Fifth Amendment.

In Dunn's case, he said, the spectacle of the company's chairwoman pleading the constitutional privilege before Congress could pose substantial risks. "It may have a major impact on the share price" and could make it difficult for her to remain in the position now, he said.

Jill Fisch, a professor of securities law at Fordham University who was a trial attorney in the Justice Department, cited "the bad PR signal that it would send for them to take the Fifth."

"It really could send a bad message to all of the people who deal with Hewlett-Packard," she said. At the same time, it is possible that Dunn and Baskins "don't believe they have criminal exposure," Fisch said.

The Palo Alto, Calif.-based company already has apologized for the intrusion into private phone records, although Dunn has insisted she had no idea that investigators were going to such extremes. The investigation relied on at least two outside firms, Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc. of Needham, Mass., and Action Research Group of Melbourne, Fla.

On Monday, the company delivered to the committee documents it had requested.

The Energy and Commerce panel's oversight subcommittee said Tuesday that it also had sent invitations to testify at the hearing to Anthony Gentilucci, HP's global security manager, and Joe Depante, owner of Action Research.

Hewlett-Packard's Dunn, Baskins To Testify In Probe (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Christopher Stern And Connie Guglielmo

Bloomberg, September 20, 2006

Sept. 19 (Bloomberg) -- Hewlett-Packard Co. Chairwoman Patricia Dunn and General Counsel Ann Baskins agreed to testify before a U.S. House panel about how the company obtained phone records of board members, according to a committee aide.

Outside investigator Ronald DeLia, who was also asked to appear, told the House committee he is likely to cite his Fifth Amendment right not to incriminate himself during the Sept. 28 hearing, said the aide, who asked not to be identified.

The Energy and Commerce Committee made a second round of requests today for testimony at a hearing on Hewlett-Packard's probe. The company's global security manager, Anthony Gentilucci, and private investigator Joe Depante, owner of Action Research Group in Melbourne, Florida, were asked to testify, the panel said in a statement. Hewlett-Packard's outside lawyer, Larry Sonsini, was also called.

The committee asked for information about Hewlett-Packard's probe on Sept. 11, after the Palo Alto, California-based company acknowledged investigators used fake identities to collect the private phone records of two employees, some directors and nine journalists to uncover the source of news leaks. The House is investigating the practice, called ``pretexting."

``If somebody is leaking information, I think there are legal ways to find that out and stop it," Committee Chairman Joe Barton, a Texas Republican, said in an interview with CNBC today. ``In this case, I think that this particular company or at least the people they hired went way beyond that."

`Pretty Murky'

Barton said in the interview Dunn will probably want to tell her side of the story at the hearing, which is called ``Hewlett-Packard's Pretexting Scandal." He said he expects Dunn to make a case as to why she used outside investigators to probe the leaks.

Current law is ``pretty murky" about whether pretexting is illegal or not, said Barton. California Attorney General Bill Lockyer, the U.S. Justice Department and Federal Bureau of Investigation are also reviewing Hewlett-Packard's tactics to determine if a crime was committed.

``I think that what they did, if it's not illegal, it should be illegal," Barton said. ``Everyone in this country is entitled to their privacy."

Separately today, Hewlett-Packard said a public relations worker was one of the employees investigated and cleared in its investigation. Suspicions about Brigida Bergkamp, who works on Hewlett-Packard's in-house public relations, were ``baseless," and she received personal apologies from Dunn and Chief Executive Officer Mark Hurd, spokesman Ryan Donovan said.

Michael Moeller, who also works in public relations at the world's second-largest maker of personal computers, received apologies from Dunn and Hurd as well after his phone records were obtained.

Shares of Hewlett-Packard, which ranks behind PC market leader Dell Inc., fell 15 cents to $36.25 at 2:19 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. They had gained 27 percent this year before today.

Congress Wants Researcher's Take (FLTODAY)

By Scott Blake, And Donna Balancia

Florida Today, September 20, 2006

Local man linked to HP scandal

A congressional subcommittee has asked a local private investigator to testify as part of the panel's probe of the corporate-spying scandal at computer giant Hewlett-Packard Co.

The House of Representatives' Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigation sent a letter to Joseph DePante, owner of Brevard County-based Action Research Group, asking him to testify and answer questions on the "Hewlett-Packard Pretexting Scandal" during a Sept. 28 hearing in Washington. The subcommittee described pretexting as "the use of lies and deception to gain access to information that is not publicly available and without the victim's consent."

Terry Lane, a spokesman for the House Committee on Energy and Commerce, which oversees the subcommittee probing the case, did not specify what DePante's connection was to the Hewlett-Packard case, but said investigators want to know what DePante might know.

"Our investigators have been looking into this for a few days, and to send him a letter, it's an indication that he has some knowledge of what Hewlett-Packard did," Lane said. "We went through the effort to send him a letter, so, obviously, we feel he has information that will be helpful to the investigation."

Lane said the letter sent to

DePante "is not a subpoena. It's an option to appear. You can decline or you can appear."

U.S. Rep. Ed Whitfield, the subcommittee's chairman, wrote a letter to DePante dated Sept. 18, asking DePante to appear before the subcommittee.

"Given the circumstances surrounding this particular case of pretexting involving the highest levels of corporate governance within Hewlett-Packard Company . . . I ask that you carefully consider this hearing an opportunity to be fully open and transparent with the testimony that you provide," Whitfield wrote.

Lane said the subcommittee expects DePante to respond to its request to testify by 5 p.m. today, but had not heard from DePante as of late Tuesday afternoon.

Lane said it is possible that DePante could be subpoenaed if he does not testify voluntarily.

DePante did not return telephone calls Tuesday from FLORIDA TODAY seeking comment.

Federal and California authorities are probing a secret investigation of news leaks at Hewlett-Packard -- one of the world's largest makers of computers and printers in California's Silicon Valley.

The case allegedly involves surveillance of board members and journalists, and possibly illegal techniques in gathering their private telephone records.

Action Research Group's Web site describes DePante, 59, as a licensed investigator and "skip tracer" -- typically someone who finds people who neglect their debts or obligations. It also describes him as "knowledgeable in all areas of investigations."

The Web site lists Matthew DePante as the company's manager, and describes him as being "knowledgeable in all areas of telephone research, as well as general skip-tracing investigation techniques."

The Web site lists Action Research Group's address as 2263 W. New Haven Ave., West Melbourne, which is a postal-services company where the DePante's firm maintains a mailbox.

Action Research Group also has another local address -- 1704 Airport Blvd., Melbourne.

The company has estimated annual sales of $160,000 and five employees, according to a Dun & Bradstreet business information report.

A woman answering the telephone Tuesday at Action Research Group would not say where the company is located.

A man answering another phone number for DePante would not identify himself.

When asked about the Hewlett-Packard case, he said, "I don't know anything about that."

Then, he hung up.

Also being asked to testify before the congressional subcommittee are Hewlett-Packard Chairwoman Patricia Dunn; Anthony Gentilucci, global security manager for Hewlett-Packard; Ann Baskins, the company's general counsel; Larry Sonsini, outside lawyer for Hewlett Packard; and Ronald DeLia, managing director of Security Outsourcing Solutions, a Needham, Mass.-based company.

The case also is being investigated by the U.S. Department of Justice and California Attorney General Bill Lockyer's office.

Luke Macauley, a spokesman for the Justice Department, said the department's Northern California district office is investigating the case, but he declined to comment on the investigation.

Tom Dresslar, a spokesman for Lockyer, said his office is looking into whether "people at Hewlett-Packard and its contractors violated California law in the use of pretexting."

"There is no (state) law that specifically makes it illegal, but we believe there are laws that apply," Dresslar said. "There are laws against unauthorized access to computerized data, using false pretenses to gain unauthorized access to utility records."

"Pretexting and those activities operating outside the limits of what's reasonable and acceptable behavior are against the law," said Bill Blevins, operations manager for Medical Data Systems Inc. of Melbourne, a company that recovers debt from patients who owe medical bills.

"Pretexting is using trickery to obtain information that you would not be able to garner otherwise. It's out-and-out lying," he said.

Omaha-Area Man Investigated In H.P. Phone Ruse (NYT)

By Matt Richtel

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

Investigators are exploring the role of a man in the Omaha area who may have obtained private phone records in the Hewlett-Packard spying case, according to people briefed on the company's review of the operation.

The man, Brian Wagoner, has spent several years working for Action Research Group, a Florida detective agency that is among the investigative firms linked to the Hewlett-Packard operation, according to a relative of Mr. Wagoner's.

California and federal prosecutors are exploring whether laws were broken by investigators hired by Hewlett-Packard in an effort to identify company directors who had leaked information to journalists.

Hewlett-Packard's efforts entailed the use of pretexting — a technique whereby an investigator masquerades as someone else to obtain that person's calling records from the phone company.

The identification of Mr. Wagoner as a possible participant provides a potentially critical link in a chain that has stretched from Hewlett-Packard's sprawling Silicon Valley headquarters to detective agencies in Boston and Florida hired to ferret out the leaker.

Prosecutors hope that people who may have been hired directly or indirectly by Hewlett-Packard can shed light not just on the scope of the investigation but also on whether people within the company — even as high as its board room — knew that illicit activities were taking place.

Mr. Wagoner could not be immediately located on Tuesday for comment.

His name surfaced in connection to Action Research in April this year when Congressional investigators studying pretexting interviewed James Rapp, a Denver man convicted in 2000 of illegally obtaining phone records. Rob Douglas, an information security expert who was a consultant in the Congressional investigation, said Mr. Rapp had disclosed that he himself had worked for years with Action Research Group, the Florida detective agency.

Mr. Rapp told investigators that after his own conviction, which led to the shutdown of his business, some of his employees went to work for Action. Among them was Mr. Wagoner, whom Mr. Rapp identified as his nephew during the interview with Congressional investigators, Mr. Douglas said.

Prosecutors have focused on the Omaha region in part because of a computer trail left by one of the pretexters in the Hewlett-Packard case. That trail indicated the use of a computer connection with an Internet address in the Omaha area. Mr. Rapp said in an interview on Tuesday that Brian Wagoner resided in or around Omaha and had worked for Action Research. "I know for a fact there's been correspondence between he and Action for many, many years," Mr. Rapp said.

Mr. Rapp said that Action had employees and contractors scattered around the country. Its "people could be in Omaha, Colorado, or some in Montana or other places," Mr. Rapp said. The employees' great ability, he said, was being able to extract phone and otherwise confidential personal records from companies.

Mr. Rapp said he had no knowledge of whether Mr. Wagoner had any involvement in the Hewlett-Packard case. He described Mr. Wagoner as his cousin, though Mr. Douglas said he believed that Mr. Wagoner is Mr. Rapp's nephew.

"He's a great guy," Mr. Rapp said of Mr. Wagoner.

But Mr. Douglas said it was unlikely that Mr. Wagoner, if he was involved, would be able to provide prosecutors much information as to the role of anyone at Hewlett-Packard.

"I'll bet he didn't know who he was doing it for or why," Mr. Douglas said, of Mr. Wagoner. Action Research or whoever hired him "wouldn't entrust him with that information."

Already, there has been considerable fallout from Hewlett-Packard's internal investigation, which took place in 2005 and earlier this year. Patricia C. Dunn, the company's chairwoman, said last week that she would resign her post, effective in January, but remain on the board. George A. Keyworth II, a director identified by Hewlett-Packard as the source of leaks to journalists, refused initial requests to resign, but did so last week.

In June, another director, Thomas J. Perkins, resigned in anger over the internal investigation.

As for Mr. Rapp, he said he had been in the business of finding records for nearly 20 years, stretching back to 1980. He said that starting in the 1990's, he began doing a great deal of work for Action Research, which in turn had gotten requests from private detectives and law firms across the country seeking phone records and other personal data.

Mr. Rapp said he got around 100 requests a week from Action and its operator, Joseph DePante. He said Mr. DePante would pay $10 to $25 for a records search, a figure Mr. Rapp described as low by industry standards but attributable to Mr. DePante's effective negotiating skills.

After Mr. Rapp was convicted, he said, he tried to sell his business to Mr. DePante. But Mr. Rapp said his plea bargain precluded him from profiting from the business, including from selling it.

Reached by telephone on Tuesday, Mr. DePante said he had been advised by his lawyer not to talk to the media. He said recent press accounts had included many falsehoods.

Mr. DePante is among those who is being called to testify next week before a House subcommittee looking into the use of pretexting in the Hewlett-Packard affair. The committee is currently studying about 5,000 pages of documents delivered by the company.

Attorneys In HP Scandal Lawyer Up (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, September 20, 2006

The combined weight of investigations by state prosecutors, federal regulators and the Department of Justice has forced lawyers in Hewlett-Packard's boardroom mess to get their own attorneys.

Ann Baskins, the HP general counsel, has hired Berkeley, Calif., white-collar specialist Cristina Arguedas. Kevin Hunsaker, the HP senior counsel and ethics director -- who the New York Times has reported was in charge of the boardroom leak investigation -- has hired San Diego solo Michael Pancer, who also specializes in white-collar criminal cases.

In addition to the in-house lawyers, the Wall Street Journal's online edition reported Tuesday that top Silicon Valley lawyer Larry Sonsini, who advises HP's board, has hired Michael Madigan, a Washington, D.C.-based partner at Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, to represent him in connection with an upcoming congressional subcommittee hearing on the matter.

Arguedas, a partner at Arguedas, Cassman & Headley, has represented a string of clients caught up in high-profile investigations -- most recently Nancy Heinen, the former general counsel of Apple Computer, a company now under scrutiny for its stock options practices.

Arguedas said Baskins hired her in response to the many investigations -- not because she's done anything wrong.

"Anyone who's in a tempestuous situation is smart to hire a lawyer to go through it with them," Arguedas said.

Baskins' name has been in the middle of the HP board donnybrook, which has several government agencies trying to figure out whether the company illegally spied on its board members and journalists to ferret out press leaks.

"I'm not aware of her doing anything wrong at all," Arguedas said. "She is a person of great integrity, and she is general counsel of one of the top U.S. companies. This is a woman at the top of her profession."

Pancer said the same about his client. "Mr. Hunsaker has done absolutely nothing wrong," Pancer said.

Arguedas added that Baskins intends to testify later this month before a congressional subcommittee investigating the issue.

So does Sonsini. "Larry intends to testify at the upcoming hearings and appreciates the opportunity," Courtney Dorman, a spokeswoman for Sonsini's firm, Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, wrote in a Tuesday e-mail. "We are working with Akin Gump under the leadership of former Congressman Bill Paxon to help us understand the congressional process."

News stories over the last few weeks have painted an unclear portrait of the roles lawyers played in HP's probe of its own board members.

Problems at the company initially came to light when HP board member Thomas Perkins, who resigned in protest of the company's leak investigation methods, became outraged that the company did not initially disclose to the Securities and Exchange Commission the reasons for his departure.

In an e-mail exchange with Perkins earlier this year, Sonsini said "I was not involved in the design or conduct of the investigation," and that it was run by the HP legal department. Sonsini has continued to advise the board since the company's probe was disclosed.

But over the last week, the Times reported that HP Chairwoman Patricia Dunn turned the investigation over to Baskins in its early stages, and that Hunsaker was in charge of supervising it. And the Journal reported Tuesday that investigators used legally suspect means to access Sonsini's phone records, in addition to those of board members, HP employees and journalists.

News reports have also pointed to a Boston investigative firm as the one responsible for hiring people to "pretext" -- or lie --- in calls to phone company officials to gain access to the phone records of board members. The Times reported Monday that Boston investigative firm Security Outsourcing Solutions provided HP with an opinion from a Boston lawyer that the pretexting was legal.

The legality of such tactics is up for consideration by the San Francisco U.S. Attorney's Office and the California attorney general. They're both investigating the issue, and Attorney General Bill Lockyer has said he has enough evidence to indict people inside and outside HP.

John Hemann, a partner at Morgan, Lewis & Bockius representing HP, couldn't be reached by press time. But Arguedas and Pancer both said their clients should have nothing to worry about.

"I'm looking forward to all the facts being put out in the open," said Pancer, who last year gained headlines representing San Diego City Councilman Ralph Inzunza, who was convicted in a corruption case involving strip-club regulations. Pancer has also gained renown as a poker champion, competing in the World Series of Poker.

Pancer also said that HP isn't the only victim of leaks. Over the last week, he said, information making its way into newspapers has portrayed his client unfairly.

"There has been selective leaking of information, much of it false, which has created a false impression. And we hope to correct that," he said.

Susan Beck, a senior writer at The American Lawyer, contributed to this story.

Outsourcing Ethics (NYT)

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

The battle at Hewlett-Packard, where an effort to unmask the source of leaks to the news media led to a sleazy investigation of the company's own board of directors involving their private records, offers up two useful lessons.

It should remind those of us watching from the sidelines just how porous our privacy is in an era of databases and hackers and sophisticated snoops, and how much we need greater legal safeguards and protections to keep pace with the technological advances. Institutions should take a very different lesson away: That their reputations are only as good as the people they hire.

The intrigue surrounding Hewlett-Packard, the computer and printer maker, sounds like the stuff of a John Grisham novel — complete with reports of physical surveillance, computer hacking and illegally obtained phone records, aimed at the company's own directors and employees, as well as journalists covering the company. Two board members have resigned, and Patricia Dunn will step aside as chairwoman in January as the reverberations continue. Meanwhile, California's attorney general, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and the Securities and Exchange Commission have all opened investigations of their own.

The company's legal problems appear to hinge chiefly on the investigative technique known as pretexting, which essentially boils down to impersonating someone to obtain their private records. But Ms. Dunn and her associates also seem to have the perfect excuse: It was not Hewlett-Packard employees, but private detectives down a chain of subcontractors, who did the actual dirty work and used what Ms. Dunn, in a statement, called "certain inappropriate techniques."

While that may insulate the company from legal liability — and that is far from clear at this point — it effectively lowers the standards of a company like Hewlett-Packard to the level of whichever private eyes end up getting paid to dig for dirt, letting them take the institution's reputation for a joyride.

Ours is an era short on common sense and long on contortions to either fit the letter of the law or to reach the dodgy state of plausible deniability. While Hewlett-Packard has a right to crack down on boardroom leaks, it has a responsibility to do so legally. As head of the board, it was Ms. Dunn's responsibility to ensure that the company's standards were met in any investigation, no matter who was tasked with the job. We hope that Hewlett-Packard's mistakes provide an instructive example to the ethically impaired.

A 'Nonprosecution Agreement' By Any Other Name... (LAW)

By Sue Reisinger, Corporate Counsel

Corporate Counsel, September 20, 2006

As if the nuances of corporate governance aren't tough enough to fathom, now the government is playing word games. On Aug. 28, Prudential Financial, Inc., signed what it thought was a nonprosecution agreement with Michael Sullivan, the U.S. Attorney in Boston. But once the deal was done, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty called a press conference in Washington, D.C., to trumpet the "deferred prosecution agreement."

McNulty's comment has led some corporate advocates to question the government's credibility. The question of what to call the Prudential pact isn't just a matter of semantics -- a deferred prosecution deal carries more of a stigma than a nonprosecution agreement.

Everyone involved in the Prudential case at least agrees that the settlement ends the government's three-year criminal probe of one of the company's subsidiaries. Boston-based Prudential Equity Group admitted that some of its brokers illegally timed mutual fund trades to benefit big hedge fund clients. But there's a split on whether to call the deal a deferred or a nonprosecution agreement.

In an NPA, no charge is filed in court, but the government can still file and prosecute a charge later if the company violates the terms of the deal. In a DPA, the government files the criminal charge in court but doesn't prosecute the claim. If the company abides by the terms of the DPA, the government dismisses the charge when the agreement expires. If not, the government can prosecute the already-filed charge.

Lawrence Finder, a former U.S. Attorney in Houston who has studied DPAs and NPAs over the past 15 years, explains that with a deferred prosecution agreement, "The anvil hangs a little closer to the head."

A spokesman for the Justice Department in Washington stands by McNulty's characterization of the Prudential deal as a DPA. "This is a deferred prosecution agreement [because] it provides for the filing of charges in the event of a breach," the spokesman says. Prudential spokesman Bob DeFillippo disagrees, saying, "I don't know why people call it what they call it, but it is a nonprosecution agreement."

DeFillippo was in error on at least one point, though. He thought that the document is officially titled an NPA. It isn't. In fact -- unlike the vast majority of the 45 pretrial agreements on record since 1992 -- the signed document is simply entitled "Agreement," and uses that word throughout its text. The U.S. Attorney asked for the word change, and Prudential's lawyers agreed. Now the U.S. Attorney's Office in Boston refuses to discuss the name game, but says that the document should simply be called "the agreement."

Finder, now a partner at Haynes and Boone, says that the Prudential deal is technically a nonprosecution agreement because no charges were filed against the company. (Sullivan's office confirms the lack of charges.) But Finder also notes that the Prudential pact has several features of a deferred prosecution agreement: It carries harsher penalties ($600 million in fines), runs for a longer term (five years) and imposes tougher requirements (the company's GC will have to implement several sweeping compliance measures).

According to Finder, the Prudential deal has morphed the two types of agreements into one. "This is a nonprosecution agreement in name only," he concludes. "It's the functional equivalent of a deferred prosecution agreement."

The government's wordplay ticks off Susan Hackett, senior vice president and general counsel of the Association of Corporate Counsel. "It's amazing to me that [the government] would actually request a change in the title of this agreement to something very unspecific and then claim that the document was something very specific," Hackett says.

But to Hackett, the issue goes deeper than just semantics. It's about credibility. "These guys are building quite a reputation for unfair dealing -- first Stolt-Nielsen and now this," Hackett says. (The Justice Department indicted Stolt-Nielsen S.A. in September even though the shipping giant had previously signed an NPA with the government.) After what's happened to both Prudential and Stolt-Nielsen, Hackett asks, "Who in their right mind wouldn't think twice about trusting a prosecutor's word?"

Monster, Broadcom Are Hit By Fallout In Options Scandal (WSJ)

By Charles Forelle And James Bandler

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

Monster Worldwide Inc. suspended its general counsel and Broadcom Corp.'s finance chief retired ahead of schedule, as the fallout from the options-manipulation scandal continued to spread.

Both Monster and Broadcom have disclosed problems with their stock-options accounting. Earlier this month, Broadcom, a chip maker based in Irvine, Calif., doubled its estimate of the hit to its books, suggesting it will make a restatement to increase its past expenses by more than $1.5 billion. That would be the largest restatement so far in the present crop of options cases.

Monster, for its part, has said it may restate a number of years' financial results. Yesterday, the New York company, which is the parent of job-search site Monster.com, said such a restatement was "very likely."

In a short statement, Monster said longtime general counsel Myron Olesnyckyj was suspended "effective immediately," though it didn't say precisely why. Broadcom said William J. Ruehle, who had served as chief financial officer since 1997, "decided to accelerate his retirement as a result of" its internal options review. Spokesman at both companies declined to elaborate; Mr. Olesnyckyj declined to comment, and Mr. Ruehle couldn't be reached.

At many companies, general counsels are responsible for supervising aspects of the options-granting process, while finance chiefs typically supervise how grants are accounted for.

Federal prosecutors have charged the former general counsel and the former finance chief of New York's Comverse Technology Inc., with fraud in a criminal case over the backdating of options grants. At other companies caught up in the scandal, at least two top lawyers and two chief financial officers also have lost their jobs.

More than 100 companies, Monster and Broadcom among them, are facing probes from federal investigators; the focus is whether grants were backdated to increase their value to recipients. Options give their recipients the right to purchase shares at a fixed exercise price, usually the market price on the date of the grant, and backdating often involves pretending that a grant was made earlier than it really was, when prices were lower.

Some of Monster's past grants to top executives bear highly suspicious dates. Between 1997 and 2001, for instance, Monster made seven grants to James J. Treacy, who eventually became the company's No. 2 executive. Four of the grants carried dates corresponding to the stock's lowest closing price of a quarter or year.

A Wall Street Journal analysis, published in June, estimated the likelihood that Mr. Treacy's grant pattern was because of random selection of dates was about one in nine million. That raises the suspicion that grants were backdated or otherwise manipulated to carry the favorable dates. Mr. Treacy has said he wasn't involved in the granting process, which he said was controlled by the company's compensation committee and its chief executive, Andrew McKelvey.

In June, Mr. McKelvey, who was Monster's founder and who never received options, said at the time he knew of no "backdating or improprieties." He said his practice was to draw up a list of recipients and send it to the compensation committee for approval. After that, "I don't know what the mechanics were," he said in June.

Monster subsequently announced that it had begun a review of its grants, and the company has said that the grants at issue stretch from 1996 to 2002. Mr. Olesnyckyj was among the other executives who received at least some favorably dated options.

In July, Broadcom had said its options problems stemmed largely from a grant dated in May 2000 that had gone to many employees. Earlier this month, it said it found more trouble, with grants between 1998 and 2003. Mr. Ruehle was among executives receiving grants carrying the date of the lowest closing price of the month in November 1998 and August 2002.

Broadcom Finance Chief Ruehle Quits Amid Option Probe (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Peter J. Brennan

Bloomberg, September 20, 2006

Sept. 19 (Bloomberg) -- Broadcom Corp., which is restating results to reflect $1.5 billion in costs related to options irregularities, said Chief Financial Officer William J. Ruehle quit, effective immediately.

The semiconductor maker named Controller Bruce E. Kiddoo acting finance chief. Ruehle, 64, decided to accelerate his retirement because of the options review, Irvine, California- based Broadcom said today in a statement.

The departure follows Broadcom's announcement on Sept. 8 that costs related to the irregularities doubled, the most for any company in the widening scandal over stock options. At least 130 companies are conducting internal reviews of their stock- option grants or face federal investigations into whether they manipulated grant dates to enrich executives.

``It's probably the board saying somebody's got to take the blame for this," said Cody Acree, a Dallas-based analyst for Stifel Nicolaus & Co. who rates the shares ``hold" and doesn't own them.

Shares of Broadcom rose 13 cents to $28.36 in extended trading after the announcement. They fell 46 cents to $28.23 at 4 p.m. New York time in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading and have fallen 10 percent this year.

A board committee is still reviewing the options and hasn't reached any conclusions, Broadcom said. The company, whose chips are used in a variety of consumer electronics products including networking equipment and wireless headsets, first said it would restate results on July 14, estimating option-related costs of $750 million at the time.

Personal Decision

Ruehle chose to resign, spokesman Bill Blanning said.

``This is Bill's decision," Blanning said in an e-mailed statement. ``He took the initiative. He believes this decision is in the best interest of Broadcom and its shareholders."

Stock options let recipients buy shares at a future date, usually at the price on the day they were granted. They are given to managers as an incentive. The U.S. Justice Department and Securities and Exchange Commission are investigating Broadcom and others to determine if they manipulated the dates of option grants to make them more lucrative.

Kiddoo, 45, has been with Broadcom since 1999 and has served in a variety of financial roles. In 2002, Kiddoo led the company's compliance with the Sarbanes-Oxley Act. He will be interim finance chief while the company seeks a successor.

`Serious Contender'

Chief Executive Officer Scott McGregor called Kiddoo a ``serious contender" for Ruehle's job.

Ruehle joined Broadcom in 1997, before the company's initial public offering, when it had sales of $37 million and about 200 employees. Last year, the company had $2.67 billion in sales and employs almost 5,000. Broadcom has made more than 30 acquisitions.

Broadcom was a high-flying stock early this decade, reaching $183.17 in August 2000, before the tech bubble burst.

In 2001 the company was forced to change how it accounted for warrants issued in connection with its many acquisitions. Lawsuits charged the company inflated its revenue. Broadcom settled shareholder suits last year for $150 million.

Broadcom's CFO Departs Amid Inquiry (LAT)

By James S. Granelli And Dawn C. Chmielewski, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2006

The chief financial officer at Broadcom Corp. on Tuesday became the latest corporate casualty in the federal government's ongoing scrutiny of how stock options were granted at dozens of tech companies during the dot-com boom.

William J. Ruehle, hired in 1997 to take the chip maker public, "accelerated his retirement" in the wake of an internal investigation that has found unreported option-related expenses totaling $1.5 billion.

Those noncash expenses are the largest so far among any of the more than 100 companies under scrutiny by the Securities and Exchange Commission and cover options awarded to employees from 1998 to 2003.

Irvine-based Broadcom said the decision to leave was made by Ruehle, 64, but analysts saw the early departure as a defensive measure designed to give the company a clean slate when it announces final results of its internal review.

As companies complete their reviews, they want to say that no current executives or directors were involved in questionable transactions, said Michael D. Cohen, research director at Pacific American Securities in San Diego. "Part of the reason for the damage control is not only to give shareholders confidence but also to deflect further scrutiny from regulators."

Tech companies are under scrutiny for manipulating the timing of option awards to maximize the potential upside. For instance, companies could grant options on days when the stock is depressed by bad news. In some cases, companies engaged in so-called backdating, or changing the date of an option grant retroactively to match dips in the share price.

In many cases, experts believe, nothing illegal was done, but the Justice Department is examining more than 45 companies. Two former executives of Brocade Communications Systems Inc. in San Jose have been charged with securities fraud.

Broadcom has said that directors and co-founders Henry T. Nicholas III and Henry Samueli received none of the stock options at issue. About 95% of the options were given to employees below the executive level.

Ruehle also received options, along with other top executives, but the company declined to say how many he was awarded.

Ruehle sold 45,000 shares in 1999 during a run-up in the company's stock, grossing as much as $7.3 million. The stock's price hit an all-time high of $182.41, on a split-adjusted basis, the following year. Last year, Ruehle received $405,000 in salary and bonus and $3.8 million from the sale of stock, according to an SEC document. As of February, he held 2.5 million Class A and Class B shares and options for 67,500 shares valued at $483,150.

Shares of Broadcom fell 46 cents Tuesday to $28.23. Ruehle's departure was announced after the markets closed.

Controller Bruce E. Kiddoo will serve as acting chief financial officer while Broadcom searches for Ruehle's successor.

Samueli, the company's chairman, said Ruehle was the "first choice" to help the company go public and praised the Harvard MBA as a "true leader."

One company executive, who did not want to be identified, said Ruehle had a reputation of being "strong and ethical."

Industry analyst Rob Enderle of Enderle Group in San Jose railed against the upheaval that the backdating scandal is causing. Rules in place before 2003, he said, were not always clear. At most companies, he said, "folks just misinterpreted the rules."

SEC Accountant Issues Guidelines On Stock Options (WSJ)

By David Reilly

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission's chief accountant issued guidance on how companies should account for employee stock options in light of regulators' probes into "backdating" of this type of compensation.

But chief accountant Conrad Hewitt made clear that in considering problems related to options accounting the commission would distinguish between honest mistakes, such as paperwork errors, and those that showed a company was trying to game accounting rules. Mr. Hewitt's tone echoed previous comments made by SEC Chairman Christopher Cox that indicated the commission would look closely at a company's intent when investigating possible backdating practices.

Stock options give employees the right to purchase stock at a preset price, known as the strike or exercise price, at a future date. Under accounting rules in place until the start of this year, companies didn't have to recognize any expense related to options grants if the exercise price was equal to the company's share price on the date the options were granted.

However, many companies retroactively picked a grant date to correspond with a low-point for their stock, in effect setting a lower bar for executives.

Under accounting rules in place at the time, such grants could have required companies to book an expense because the exercise price picked wasn't actually the same as the company's share price on the real grant date. Starting this year, companies have had to take an expense for all options grants.

Mr. Hewitt's letter laid out examples where questions have arisen over whether a company should have taken an expense for options under the old accounting rules. In cases where companies picked an exercise price over a 30-day period, for example, they generally should have recorded an expense for the options, the letter said. However, so-called springloading of options, where companies grant options ahead of good news, doesn't result in an accounting issue, the letter said.

The SEC guidance to companies follows an alert to auditors on backdating issues in July from the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board. More than 100 companies are under investigation in relation to backdating, according to recent congressional testimony from Mr. Cox. The agency has brought civil charges against executives from two companies in tandem with criminal charges by prosecutors.

Mr. Hewitt stressed that the guidance related only to accounting issues, not legal matters arising from backdating issues.

Christopher Cox, chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, on Tuesday issued a robust defence of the Sarbanes-Oxley legislation saying it was “important to keep in mind” that many of its elements had been adopted by other regulators overseas.

“I would like to highlight a little noticed fact: While competitors in other countries are using Sarbanes-Oxley as a reason for foreign companies to list in their jurisdictions, many of those same countries are adopting provisions of the act as part of their own regulatory regime.”

His comments came at a hearing where US lawmakers will grill the heads of the two regulatory agencies responsible for overseeing implementation of the controversial Sarbanes-Oxley auditing and compliance law.

Sarbanes Oxley has stirred controversy in the US, with many in the business and financial community blaming its more onerous compliance requirements for forcing foreign company listings to go abroad to London and Hong Kong. Some politicians have warned that Sox is threatening the competitiveness of US capital markets.

DOJ_NMG_0066125

Mr Cox said, "As we consider the effect of Sarbanes-Oxley on US competitiveness, it is important to keep in mind how broadly many of its tenets have been taken up over seas."

As examples he cited the establishment of independent auditor watchdogs like Public Company Accounting Oversight Board [PCAOB], which oversees US auditors. He also pointed out the fact that the European Union had recently adopted a directive requiring all EU member states to create an auditor oversight body.

The House of Representatives Financial Services Committee held its sixth hearing into "Sox" since the law was passed in 2002 on Tuesday.

It came as concern over US regulatory "creep" – including Sox - have been stoked by US inspections of the UK offices of Ernst & Young.

Securities and Exchange Commission chairman Christopher Cox testified on the implementation of Sox, in particular on recent proposed changes to Section 404 made by his agency that are aimed at easing the burden of compliance for smaller companies.

Section 404 requires company CEOs to have a company's internal controls checked by auditors and has been criticized as expensive and onerous by many small- and medium-sized business.

Also testifying was Mark Olson, chairman of the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, created in 2002 to oversee auditors.

The PCAOB has raised eyebrows in the UK by dispatching inspectors to the London offices of Ernst & Young. The inspections stem from a contentious requirement of the Sarbanes-Oxley act and a new example of its "extra-territorial" reach beyond the US.

Last week the UK government moved to address such concerns by proposing legislation that would give the Financial Services Authority power to veto any rulings made by UK exchanges under future US ownership that could emerge as a by-product of US congressional legislation.

Sox came under attack again on Tuesday from a US business lobby group.

Mallory Factor, chairman of the Free Enterprise Fund, a Washington-based non-profit organisation, said: "Sarbanes-Oxley has become a classic example of overreaction - a massive expansion of regulatory power in response to a series of extraordinary events. And yet after all the costs and burdens are added up, America's businesses are no better governed, are less transparently operated, and their shareholders are poorer."

The SEC and the PCAOB have been working together to make compliance with Section 404 more cost efficient for smaller public companies. The PCAOB is also working to revise Auditing Standard 2, which governs the audit of internal controls.

The SEC last month proposed allowing foreign and US companies a year's "transition" before having to comply with Section 404 once they have gone public.

For newly public companies, the SEC has also proposed that they not be required to provide a management report on internal controls or an outside auditor's report on such controls in the first annual report that it files with the SEC.

The SEC's aim is to offer a "phased-in" approach to Section 404 compliance for companies with a market capitalisation of under $75m. A public comment period on the issues closed on Monday.

In its comments, Ernst & Young broadly supported the approach. But it warned that there might be "some complications or unintended consequences".

"For example, a phased implementation approach might confuse some investors as to the level of assurance they are receiving on the effectiveness of internal control over financial reporting in the year where only management's assessment of internal control is required," the company said.

Last week John White, the SEC's director of the division of corporation finance, urged companies to involve their outside auditors in the first year of compliance, even though they were not obliged to do so.

Critics of Sox and the changes proposed by the SEC have also expressed frustration at the complexity of the law and such changes.

Mr White appeared to acknowledge the problem, saying: "Although I wouldn't want to be the historian charged with maintaining the archives of all these [SEC press] releases and extensions over the past three years, we can pick up from that record that the Commission has remained very attentive throughout Section 404's implementation to the challenges that internal reporting has posed.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Gonzales: ISPs Must Keep Records On Users (CNET)

By Declan McCullagh And Anne Broache, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, September 20, 2006

Attorney general, other witnesses ask Congress to force Internet service providers to follow customers' activities.

WASHINGTON--Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Tuesday stepped up his efforts to lobby for federal laws requiring Internet providers to keep track of what their customers do online.

DOJ_NMG_0066126

Gonzales asked senators to adopt "data retention" legislation that would likely force Internet providers to keep customer logs for at least a year or two. Those logs, often routinely discarded after a few months, are intended to be used by police investigating crimes.

"This is a national problem that requires federal legislation," Gonzales said during a Senate Banking Committee hearing. "We need to figure out a way to have ISPs retain data for a sufficient period of time that would allow us to go back and retrieve it."

As the November election approaches, politicians have been devoting an unprecedented amount of attention to the topic of children, pornography and the Internet: At least three committees are holding hearings on the subject this week alone.

One committee even enlisted an outside-the-Beltway celebrity, basketball icon Shaquille O'Neal. Shaq appeared on videotape before the Senate Commerce Committee, and said: "I've seen images that make me very sad, I've seen images that make me very mad...Yeah, I'm mad, very mad, senator." (O'Neal is a spokesman for the Safe Surfin' Foundation, a federally funded nonprofit group.)

It's unclear what the prospects are for mandatory data retention in Congress this year, or whether politicians will delay action until 2007. One senior House Republican drafted a bill (click for PDF) but then backed away from it, and a Democratic proposal (click for PDF) has not been voted on.

But with the Bush administration firmly behind the concept, and with state and local law enforcement lending a hand in the lobbying efforts and saying such mandates would help protect children, industry groups and privacy advocates may be hard-pressed to head off new regulations. During Tuesday morning's appearance, for instance, Gonzales favorably cited a June letter (click for PDF) endorsing mandatory data retention that was signed by 49 attorneys general. The letter said: "It is clear that something must be done to ensure that ISPs retain data for a reasonable period of time."

Myriad suggestions

Sen. John McCain, who presided over the afternoon hearing, scolded Internet companies who "were invited to participate and chose not to." He said he would talk to Sen. Ted Stevens, chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee, about scheduling an additional hearing during which the companies would be grilled.

Montana Sen. Conrad Burns, a Republican, used the hearing to tout a proposal, now tacked onto a mammoth communications bill and awaiting a vote, that would require all sexually explicit Web content to be labeled as such and home pages of all sites to be free of such content.

That measure, he said, "will help children from unwittingly stumbling across these words and images online."

Ernie Allen, president of the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, echoed Gonzales' calls for ISPs to hang onto customer records. "Some companies have policies on retention, but they vary widely, are not implemented consistently, and frankly, most are too short to have meaningful prosecutorial value," he said.

Data retention legislation could follow one of two approaches, and it's not clear which is more likely.

One form could require Internet providers and perhaps social-networking sites and search engines to record for a year or two which IP address is used by which user. The other form would be far broader, requiring companies to record data such as the identities of e-mail correspondents, logs of who sent and received instant messages (but not the content of those communications), and the addresses of Web pages visited.

During a series of meetings that Justice Department officials have held with private companies--first reported by CNET News.com--officials have been ambiguous about how they want legislation worded, private-sector participants say. Companies involved have included AOL, Comcast, Google, Microsoft, Verizon Communications and trade associations.

Suggestions for congressional action at Tuesday afternoon's hearing didn't stop at data retention by private companies.

Sheriff Michael Brown, who heads an Internet Crimes Against Children task force in Bedford County, Va., called on Congress to ensure that any state, federal, local or educational institution that receives federal funding also conduct "appropriate transactional logging to allow the location of individuals that use that access in the exploitation of children." He said in his testimony (click for PDF) that the government could not, "in good conscience," make such demands of the private sector if it didn't also do the same.

That concept--restrictions slapped on using federal funds--echoes a 2000 federal law called the Children's Internet Protection Act. CIPA effectively forced schools and libraries to filter sexually explicit Web sites by tying that requirement to the receipt of federal funds, an approach the U.S. Supreme Court upheld as constitutional in 2003.

The concept of more federal laws was popular at Tuesday's pair of hearings. Sharon Cooper, an adjunct professor of pediatrics at the University of North Carolina, urged politicians to require that all public-school health classes, from elementary to high school, teach "child sexual abuse prevention strategies as well as online and communication technology safety strategies."

And Sen. Robert Bennett, a Utah Republican, suggested that the Justice Department create a successor to the widely criticized Meese Commission, a 1986 federal panel that claimed to document the harmful effects of pornography. "Isn't it time we revisited the creation of an attorney's general commission and update, if you will, the kind of things the Meese Commission prophesied would happen?" Bennett asked.

On Thursday, the U.S. House of Representatives will have its own hearing on the Internet and child pornography.

'Preservation' vs. 'retention'

DOJ_NMG_0066127

At the moment, Internet service providers typically discard any log file that's no longer required for business reasons such as network monitoring, fraud prevention, or billing disputes. Companies do, however, alter that general rule when contacted by police performing an investigation--a practice called data preservation.

A 1996 called the Electronic Communication Transactional Records Act regulates data preservation. It requires Internet providers to retain any "record" in their possession for 90 days "upon the request of a governmental entity."

Because Internet addresses remain a relatively scarce commodity, ISPs tend to allocate them to customers from a pool based on whether a computer is in use at the time.

An IP address is a unique 4-byte address used to communicate with a device on a computer network that relies on the Internet Protocol. An IP address associated with CNET.com, for instance, is 216.239.113.101. (Two standard techniques used are the Dynamic Host Configuration Protocol and Point-to-Point Protocol over Ethernet.)

In addition, Internet providers are required by another federal law to report child pornography sightings to the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, which is in turn charged with forwarding that report to the appropriate police agency.

When adopting its data retention rules, the European Parliament approved U.K.-backed requirements saying communications providers in its 25 member countries--several of which had enacted their own data retention laws already--must retain customer data for a minimum of six months and a maximum of two years.

The Europe-wide requirement applies to a wide variety of "traffic" and "location" data, including the identities of the customers' correspondents; the date, time and duration of phone calls, voice over Internet Protocol calls, or e-mail messages; and the location of the device used for the communications. But the "content" of the communications is not supposed to be retained. The rules are expected to take effect in 2008.

Gonzales Calls For Law To Require Internet Companies To Preserve Customer Data (AP)

By Hope Yen, The Associated Press

AP, September 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Tuesday that Congress should require Internet service providers to preserve customer records, asserting that prosecutors need them to fight child pornography.

Testifying to a Senate panel, Gonzales acknowledged the concerns of some company executives who say legislation might be overly intrusive and encroach on customers' privacy rights. But he said the growing threat of child pornography over the Internet was too great.

"This is a problem that requires federal legislation," Gonzales told the Senate Banking Committee. "We need information. Information helps us makes cases."

He called the government's lack of access to customer data the biggest obstacle to deterring child porn.

"We have to find a way for Internet service providers to retain information for a period of time so we can go back with a legal process to get them," he said.

Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller have met with several Internet service providers, including Time Warner Inc.'s AOL, Comcast Corp., Google Inc., Microsoft Corp. and Verizon Communications Inc.

The law enforcement officials have indicated to the companies they must retain customer records, possibly for two years. The companies have discussed strengthening their retention periods — which currently run the gamut from a few days to about a year — to help avoid legislation.

At Tuesday's hearing, Gonzales said he agreed with the sentiment of 49 state attorneys general who in a June letter to Congress expressed support for a federal law that would require longer retention of customer records.

"We respect civil liberties but we have to harmonize this so we can get more information," he said.

The subject has prompted some alarm among Internet service provider executives and civil liberties groups after the Justice Department took Google to court earlier this year to force it to turn over information on customer searches. Civil liberties groups also have sued Verizon and other telephone companies, alleging they are working with the government to provide information without search warrants on subscriber calling records.

Justice Department officials have said that any proposal would not call for the content of communications to be preserved and would keep the information in the companies' hands. The data could be obtained by the government through a subpoena or other lawful process.

Task Force Recommends Steps To Curb Identity Theft (USAT)

USA Today, September 20, 2006

The federal government should limit the use of Social Security numbers to guard against identity theft, a presidential commission said Tuesday. The Identity Theft Task Force, created in May, wants greater penalties against such thieves and creation of a “universal police report” to help police and victims track complaints. It also said Congress should amend criminal laws so victims could be compensated for time lost disputing fraudulent accounts with creditors or correcting credit reports.

DOJ_NMG_0066128

The nine-digit numbers are meant to be used for Social Security benefits and taxpayer identification purposes but are often required to verify credit information or make business transactions.

The initial recommendations come as the government has struggled with high-profile data breaches. At least 10 agencies in recent months have reported such incidents, which included the loss of a laptop and external drive containing information for 26.5 million veterans and active-duty troops. That equipment was later recovered.

Gonzales: Web-use dataneeded to fight child porn

Congress should require Internet service providers to preserve customer records, asserting that prosecutors need them to fight child pornography, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said. He and FBI Director Robert Mueller want providers to retain customer records for up to two years. The companies have discussed lengthening their retention periods, which now range from a few days to about a year, to avoid legislation.

Gonzales testified to a Senate panel that law enforcement's needs trump concerns that legislation might be overly intrusive and encroach on customers' privacy rights. The lack of access to customer data is the biggest obstacle to deterring child porn, he said.

"This is a problem that requires federal legislation," Gonzales told the Senate Banking Committee. "We need information. Information helps us make cases. … We respect civil liberties, but we have to harmonize this so we can get more information."

Bush plans meeting with Afghan, Pakistani leaders

Faced with the worst violence in Afghanistan since U.S.-led forces toppled the Taliban in 2001, President Bush plans to host a White House meeting with Afghan President Hamid Karzai and Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf. "The meeting will provide the three leaders an opportunity to discuss further cooperation," White House spokesman Tony Snow said.

The joint meeting Sept. 27 will follow separate visits the president has planned with Musharraf on Friday and with Karzai next Tuesday.

Karzai has accused Pakistan of allowing Taliban and al-Qaeda insurgents to launch attacks into Afghanistan from bases in Pakistan. Pakistan insists that it is doing all it can to root out militants.

One issue that remains unsettled is the effects of a peace deal reached Sept. 5 between Musharraf's government and militants in North Waziristan, a tribal region bordering Afghanistan. Musharraf says the deal bans terrorist camps and foreign fighters in the area, which is ruled by warlords. Karzai says Afghanistan is waiting to see whether cross-border raids stop.

Credit Cards Key To Fighting Online Child Porn (ABC)

By Jason Ryan

ABC News, September 20, 2006

Sept. 19, 2006 — If you cut the money flow, can you end online child porn and its ability to evade criminal prosecution?

That is exactly what the Senate is considering this week.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Ernie Allen, the head of the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children (NCMEC), said today that they hoped to eliminate child pornography from commercial Web sites entirely by 2008.

Their plan: Close down the financial networks that peddle images showing children and even infants being sexually abused.

Appearing before the Senate Banking Committee, Gonzales said, "These are shocking images that cry out for the strongest law enforcement response possible. … This is an important fight for the future of our country."

Since the late 1990s, the scourge of child pornography has spread internationally as pedophiles have found individuals with the same thinking around the world in just a few keystrokes on the Internet.

Online child porn is now a billion-dollar-a-year underground industry, and one of the fastest-growing businesses on the Internet.

"While the Internet is undoubtedly one of the greatest inventions of our generations, it has also greatly facilitated the exploitation of children," Gonzales said.

Describing the scope of child pornography, Gonzales cited a recent study by the University of New Hampshire and the NCMEC.

The study found that a third of kids ages 10 to 17 who used the Internet were exposed to unwanted sexual material. Gonzales said much of this material was "extremely graphic."

The nation's chief law enforcement office detailed for senators the disturbing nature of the material that Justice Department investigators had come across in cases they had brought for prosecution.

"I have seen a young toddler tied up with towels, desperately crying in pain, while she is brutally raped and sodomized by an adult man," he said.

Gonzales said some pedophiles were now engaged in competitions to create the most disturbing images and movies, and share them with other pedophiles.

The NCMEC has found in recent years that the victims are becoming younger.

According to NCMEC data, images recovered from pedophiles show that of the images they had, 19 percent of the offenders had images of children younger than 3 years old, 39 percent had images of children under 6 years old, and 83 percent had images of children younger than 12 years old.

Task Force Tackles ID Theft (AP)

By Hope Yen, The Associated Press

AP, September 20, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — Federal agencies should restrict their use of Social Security numbers to guard against identity theft, a presidential commission said Tuesday.

The Identity Theft Task Force, which was created in May, also urges greater penalties against identity thieves and creation of a "universal police report" to help police and victims track complaints.

"When we look at the problem of identity theft, we are reminded that the same technological advances that have improved our lives have also given new and broad opportunities to criminals," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said at a briefing announcing the proposals.

The recommendations, Gonzales said, are a first step to creating practical solutions.

Under the plan, the task force urges the government to review the uses of Social Security numbers as employee identification and determine ways in which it can conceal or eliminate their use in agency systems and paper and electronic forms.

It calls on Congress to amend criminal laws so that identity-theft victims can recover for their hours lost disputing fraudulent accounts with creditors or correcting credit reports.

The initial recommendations come as the government has struggled with high-profile data breaches. At least 10 agencies in recent months have reported incidents, which included the loss of a laptop and external drive containing information for 26.5 million veterans and active-duty troops. That equipment was later recovered.

ID Theft Task Force Makes Small Step In The Right Direction (INFOWEEK)

By Thomas Claburn, InformationWeek

InformationWeek, September 20, 2006

ID theft victims should be allowed to sue defendants -- one of seven recommendations issued by the federal Identity Theft Task Force.

Victims of identity theft should be allowed to seek restitution from defendants for time spent undoing damage from the offense, according to interim recommendations issued Tuesday by a federal task force on ID theft.

"As with any crime, victims of identity theft suffer feelings of violation and stress, but in these cases, victims have the added burden of cleaning up the mess that the identity thieves leave behind," said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales in a statement. "The President created the Identity Theft Task Force to oversee the implementation of real and practical solutions at the federal level to defeat this ongoing intrusion into the lives of law-abiding Americans. Today's recommendations move that process forward."

The Task Force issued seven recommendations These include 1) directing the Office of Management and Budget to issue guidance to federal agencies on how to handle data breaches; 2) strengthening data security in the government; 3) accelerating and broadening the review of where social security numbers are used by agencies; 4) establishing a new "routine use" by which agencies would be allowed to share information otherwise restricted by the Privacy Act to facilitate responding to a data breach; 5) holding workshops for academics and businesses to develop better methods to authenticate identities; 6) amending criminal statutes to allow identity theft victims to seek restitution from defendants for time spent undoing damage from the offense; and 7) developing a universal police report to make it easier to report identity theft and enter it into existing systems.

The Task Force was established by order of the President on May 10, 2006 to curb identity theft and now includes 17 federal agencies and departments. Among them, the FBI, the U.S. Secret Service, the U.S. Postal Inspection Service, and the Social Security Administration Office of the Inspector General investigate identity theft.

Not surprisingly, those agencies have been busy. In 2005, the Justice Department charged 226 defendants with aggravated identity theft. In the first half of 2006, the Justice Department charged 432 defendants with the same crime. The FBI says it has 1,587 cases related to identity theft underway, having opened 662 cases in 2005 and 272 in 2006 to date. Postal inspectors opened 1,530 identity theft-related cases and made 2,277 arrests in 2005, and opened 1,012 identity theft-related cases and made 1,294 arrests in the first half of 2006. The SSA OIG Office of Investigations said that it opened 1,566 cases involving the misuse of social security numbers in 2005, and 812 such cases in the first half of 2006.

In recent years, the incidence of identity theft has been on the decline, though the resulting financial loss has risen. A Javelin Strategy and Research report released in January found that the number of US adult victims of identity fraud decreased from 10.1 million in 2003 to 9.3 million in 2005, and projects a further decline to 8.9 million in 2006. At the same time, the total one year fraud amount rose from $53.2 billion in 2003 to $54.4 billion in 2005. The Javelin report projects a fraud loss from identity theft of $56.6 billion in 2006.

The situation is one of fewer victims being taken for greater amounts of money. However, most identity theft victims (68%) incur no costs, according to the Javelin report. The average cost incurred by victims is projected to decline to $422 in 2006.

Among the cases where the source of the data breach is known, 63% of identity theft incidents involved information under the victim's control, according to the report, a statistic arguing for consumer education and greater paranoia. These incidents can be divided into four major categories: 30% involved lost or stolen items, such as wallets or credit cards; 15% involved trusted associates; 9% involved stolen mail or garbage; and 9% involved home computer compromises.

Businesses were the source of information breaches in 30% of cases. Of these, data breaches accounted for 6% of the overall total, fraudulent transaction processing accounted for 7%, and employee wrongdoing accounted for 15%.

Jay Foley, executive director of the non-profit Identity Theft Resource Center, says the government is moving in the right direction and deserves credit for trying, but takes issue with some of the recommendations and would like to see more done. For example, he's skeptical that the Task Force's recommendation to consider extending free credit monitoring to victims will do much good.

"At no time do I believe that free credit monitoring should be offered in a breach situation," Foley says. "It's nonsensical. It's an unnecessary cost and expense. Credit monitoring is up to 70% accurate. It's not effective enough to be viable."

Foley says he'd also like to see more attention paid to policies and procedures for information redaction, since information that shouldn't be published by government agencies continues to be posted online and elsewhere.

As to whether identity theft is getting worse or better, Foley says it's not increasing so much as shifting from credit card fraud to check and debit card fraud. "The credit card companies invested in good analytic software to stop this," he explains. "The banking industry doesn't have the ability to put that software into place."

Evan Hendricks, editor and publisher of Privacy Times, a subscription newsletter that has been going since 1981, likewise sees merit in the recommendations. "You want to welcome positive steps even if they're baby steps," he says.

Hendricks believes more resources need to be allocated to state and local agencies to support identity theft investigation specialists. He would also like to see more resources for postal inspectors, whom he credits with catching more identity thieves than anyone else.

Hendricks hopes the recommendations will encourage businesses will evaluate their data handling practices too. "The old legacy practices of the financial services industry really facilitate id theft, such as the focus on social security numbers," he says.

Absent from the recommendations is any specific consideration of the role the Internet plays in identity theft. Social security numbers, for example, can easily be found using any of the major search engines. But the Task Force was charged with developing a government response to identity theft rather than solving the problem entirely. A comprehensive solution will require action on the part of the government, businesses, and individuals. And that may take a while.

"It's hard to imagine it getting much better," says Hendricks. "There are a lot of incentives to turn to ID theft because it's a low-risk, high-payoff crime."

ID Theft Task Force Recommends National Police Report (INFOWRLD)

By Grant Gross, IDG News Service

InfoWorld, September 20, 2006

Reports would be online, and those convicted of ID theft crimes would pay victims for the time used to clear up problems

An identity theft task force created by U.S. President George Bush has recommended nationally accepted police reports that victims could fill out online, and a change in U.S. law that would require those convicted of such crimes to pay victims for the time used to clear up identity problems.

The President's Identity Theft Task Force, which met Tuesday, also recommended that U.S. agencies examine whether their use of Social Security numbers is necessary and called on an interagency working group on ID theft to develop best practices for data security in government.

The U.S. government needs to lead by example in protecting consumers from ID theft, Deborah Platt Majoras, chairwoman of the U.S. Federal Trade Commission (FTC), said.

"Identity theft truly is a direct assault on our citizens and attacks the very foundation of the information economy," Majoras said in a joint press conference with U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

The task force's recommendations are an interim list, with a full plan of how to attack ID theft to be released in November. But the recommendations released Tuesday are steps U.S. agencies and other groups can take immediately, Gonzales said.

About 4 percent of U.S. residents are ID theft victims every year, Gonzales said. Bush established the task force because of "the prevalence of this crime, combined with the lingering burdens and effects on victims," Gonzales said.

"When we look at the problem of identity theft, we are reminded that the same technological advances that have improved our lives have also given new and broad opportunities to criminals, including identity thieves," he added. "As with any crime, victims suffer feelings of violation and stress, but in these cases, victims have the added burden of essentially cleaning up the mess that the identity thieves leave behind."

Among the task force's recommendations:

-- The U.S. Congress should change laws to require that defendants convicted of ID theft pay victims for the time they spent clearing up the mess.

-- The U.S. should adopt a universal police report that ID theft victims can fill out online, print out and take to their local police station.

-- The U.S. Office of Personnel Management should speed up its review of the use of Social Security numbers by federal agencies.

-- U.S. agencies should work with experts to find other ways of authenticating people's identities, such as biometrics.

-- U.S. agencies should develop better plans to disclose data breaches to potential victims. In May, the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) had a laptop and hard drive stolen from an analyst's home, and the agency took about two weeks to report the theft to the public. Majoras and Gonzales didn't talk about the VA case, but members of Congress have called for the VA to do a better job of notifying potential victims.

FBI: New York Had Lowest Crime Rate Among Big Cities In 2005 (SLOT)

San Luis Obispo Tribune, September 20, 2006

NEW YORK - New York was the safest of the nation's 10 largest cities in 2005, with about one crime reported for every 37 residents, according to an Associated Press analysis of FBI statistics.

The annual report "shows that our innovative efforts to reduce crime and increase New Yorkers' quality of life are working," Mayor Michael Bloomberg said in a statement Monday after the agency released the figures.

The large city with the highest crime rate was Dallas, with about one crime reported for every 12 people. Los Angeles, the nation's second largest city, ranked third safest, with about one crime for every 26 people.

San Jose took the No. 2 spot, while San Diego ranked fourth. Chicago, Philadelphia, Houston, San Antonio and then Phoenix followed.

The AP's calculation ranked cities by the total number of crimes reported per resident and did not distinguish between violent crimes and property crimes.

The FBI said in its report that it makes a point not to rank cities, saying "they provide no insight into the many variables that mold the crime in a particular town, city, county, state, or region."

The number of reported crimes in New York fell 4.3 percent last year, while the number nationwide dropped 1.2 percent. Police statistics show crime in the city has continued to fall this year, down 5.04 percent by Sept. 10 compared with the same period in 2005.

The national figures showed that violent crime rose 2.3 percent last year, the first increase since 2001. But in New York City, violent crimes - which include rape, murder, robbery and aggravated assault - fell 1.9 percent.

San Jose officials argue theirs is the safest large city in the nation. They use an analysis that takes into account the severity of the reported crimes.

SAN JOSE CONTESTS NYC'S CLAIM TO 'SAFEST BIG CITY' MONIKER (BCN)

Bay City News Wires, September 20, 2006

SAN JOSE (BCN) -- New York City is proclaiming itself the "Safest Big City in America" based on new FBI statistics released this week but a spokesman for San Jose Mayor Ron Gonzales today disputed the Big Apple's claim.

Gonzales has laid claim to San Jose being the "Safest Big City in America" throughout his mayoralty, repeating the phrase so often at public appearances that it has become his unofficial mantra. His spokesman David Vossbrink said San Jose's claim might still be accurate.

"We've always based our claim on (an independent) analysis of the FBI stats that comes out each year around Thanksgiving," Vossbrink said.

New York City's analysis of the FBI's 2005 Crime in the United States annual report does not take into account how some crimes, especially violent crimes, may have more impact on a community's feeling of safety than other crimes.

New York City's analysis found that the city had the lowest total number of crimes per 100,000 people at 2,675.5. San Jose was second lowest with 2,901.8, according to a statement issued by New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg.

"What New York has done ... doesn't have any reflection on the severity of the crimes committed," Vossbrink said.

As examples, Vossbrink cited his calculations that San Jose's murder rate per 1,000 residents was 0.0285, whereas New York City's was 0.0664, and that San Jose's violent crimes rate per 1,000 residents was 3.8351, whereas New York City's was 6.7305.

Los Angeles had the third lowest rate among the top ten big cities in the U.S. followed in order by San Diego, Philadelphia, Las Vegas, Houston, San Antonio, Phoenix and Dallas, according to New York City's analysis.

The FBI does not rank cities by crime rate in its annual report.

Whether San Jose is first or second really does not matter, according to Vossbrink. The argument over which city is the safest in America is as futile as the annual argument over whether Harvard, Princeton, Stanford or Yale is the top university in the nation, he said.

"They're all great schools," Vossbrink said.

"San Jose remains, by anyone's calculation, a tremendously safe city," Vossbrink said.

Violent Crime Up In The City (PHI)

By Barbara Boyer And Peter Mucha

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0066132

When it comes to violent crime among America's largest cities, Philadelphia is the worst, the FBI reported this week.

However, when overall crime, which includes nonviolent offenses such as burglary and theft, is considered, the city drops to No. 5, while Dallas tops the list.

On Monday, the FBI released 2005 crime statistics showing that from 2004 to 2005, the violent-crime rate in the United States increased 1.3 percent, while property-crime rates decreased 2.4 percent.

In Philadelphia, last year violent crime was up 3.4 percent, including a 15 percent increase in homicides. Other violent crimes include forcible rapes, robberies and aggravated assaults.

This year, homicides are up slightly. The number of shooting victims is up about 13 percent, while overall violent crime is up about 4 percent. Overall crime, which includes property offenses, is up 2 percent, according to statistics recently released by the Police Department.

At least one local crime expert and several law enforcement officials - reviewing national numbers yesterday - said violence in Philadelphia is not as bad as it appears based on the FBI numbers, which they say can be deceiving.

Lawrence W. Sherman, a criminologist at the University of Pennsylvania's Jerry Lee Center, said that rankings among the city's 10 largest cities make Philadelphia look bad, but that there are far more dangerous cities.

"They're sticking out like a sore thumb because some of the larger cities have become some of the safer cities," Sherman said.

If Philadelphia, with a population of 1.47 million, is compared with cities closer to 100,000 in population, not just those with about one million or more, the city is nearer to the middle of the list in violent crime, Sherman said.

Detroit, for example, has a population of 900,000 and doesn't make the list of the top 10 largest cities, but would replace Philadelphia as the worst of the worst if the list were expanded to the 12 largest cities.

Detroit has 2,358 violent crimes per 100,000 residents, compared with Philadelphia's 1,467 per 100,000 residents.

New York, which has a population of 8.1 million, and which has seen a slight increase in homicides this year, had 673 violent crimes per 100,000 residents in 2005.

Camden, with a population of 80,125, has 1,680 violent crimes per 1,000 residents, making it among the most dangerous cities in the country.

Among the larger cities, Sherman said, Philadelphia has a high crime rate for various reasons. "We have the poorest population," he said.

In addition, he said, the commissioner in Philadelphia does not have the same freedom to deploy police and make top appointments as do law enforcement officials in other cities, such as New York and Los Angeles.

Influence by the mayor and City Council and restrictions in labor contracts limit Philadelphia's commissioner, he said.

In the list of safest cities for overall crime among the 10 largest in the nation, New York was at the top - the safest. For most violent crime, it is No. 6 on the list of the safest, while San Jose, Calif., is No. 1.

Philadelphia Deputy Commissioner Richard Ross said it was important to look closely at overall crime and not just violent crime. Philadelphia, he said, aggressively classifies crimes that other cities may not classify as violent.

"Overall, crime is down over the past five years," Ross said, adding that Philadelphia had been hit hard in recent years by the number of guns on the street, which are responsible for 85 percent of the city's homicides.

"You can't ignore the proliferation of handguns in this city and the proliferation in comparison to some of the other cities that are larger than Philadelphia," Ross said.

In 2004, Philadelphia had nearly the same number of confiscations of illegal firearms as New York did, even though New York has a population more than five times the size of Philadelphia's.

Burns Not Target, Staffer Tells Public (BILLGAZ)

By JENNIFER McKEE, Gazette State Bureau

Billings (MT) Gazette, September 20, 2006

HELENA - Erik Iverson, manager for Republican Sen. Conrad Burns' tough re-election campaign, said late Tuesday the senator is not the target of a federal corruption investigation centered on disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Iverson said Burns' personal criminal defense attorney, Ralph Caccia, spoke with Justice Department employees Tuesday afternoon. The employees said Burns is not the target of the investigation.

Iverson was responding to statements made by Montana Democratic Party Executive Director Jim Farrell to television reporters regarding Burns' involvement in the scandal. "The comments made yesterday by Jim Farrell are patently false and without merit," Iverson said.

Iverson said Caccia himself would not speak to reporters. He also said he didn't know if any former Burns staff members may be part of the investigation.

Farrell said the campaign should make Caccia available for questions. He also released a long list of news articles that have reported that Burns is part of the investigation.

"We need to hear directly from Senator Burns' criminal defense attorney himself, who must positively confirm to the media and to the people of Montana that he spoke with representatives of the U.S. Depart-ment Justice on this matter," Farrell said.

The Justice Department has steadfastly refused to comment on the ongoing investigation.

Several national publications, most recently Time magazine last week, have reported that Burns is among of handful of lawmakers under scrutiny for their dealings with Abramoff.

Burns received $150,000 from Abramoff, his clients and associates - more than any other lawmaker. Burns returned the money after the scandal broke.

Two Burns staffers attended the 2001 Super Bowl at Abramoff's invitation and expense. One of those, former chief of staff Will Brooke, later quit to take a job with Abramoff's firm.

Burns also pushed for some Abramoff priorities, including money for a school for the Saginaw Chippewa tribe of Michigan. Federal officials said the tribe was not eligible for federal money for the school.

Former Mayor, Raceway Park Manager Indicted (SSR)

By Bill Morlin, Staff writer

Spokane Spokesman-Review, September 20, 2006

The former mayor of Airway Heights and the former operator of Spokane Raceway Park both are named in a federal grand jury indictment accusing them of multiple counts of public corruption.

The charges against Dale R. Perry stem from his financial involvement with Orville Moe, the embattled former operator of Spokane Raceway Park, a 600-acre drag-racing and oval track complex in Airway Heights, west of Spokane.

An FBI investigation was opened in January 2005 after The Spokesman-Review obtained public documents in late 2004 showing Moe was the source of a $109,000 loan to the Airway Heights mayor.

The investigation by agents of the FBI and the Washington State Gambling Commission culminated with the four-count indictment returned Tuesday by a federal grand jury in Spokane.

The indictment alleges Moe loaned the mayor money with the expectation that Perry would cast favorable votes when matters involving Spokane Raceway Park came before the Airway Heights City Council.

ADVERTISEMENT

For example, the council enacted an entertainment and admissions tax on Nov. 23, 2003, but repealed it on March 4, 2004. The tax applied to tickets sold to all events at Spokane Raceway Park, which is inside the city limits of Airway Heights.

“Public corruption destroys our collective confidence in those officials whom we entrust to govern our affairs and erodes the very fabric of our democracy,’’ U.S. Attorney James A. McDevitt said shortly after the indictment was returned Tuesday afternoon.

Public corruption, the U.S. attorney said, “cannot and will not be tolerated at any level of government. It is for that reason that public corruption has been and will continue to be a primary focus of this office.”

Such public corruption cases in the Northwest are rare.

“It’s fair to say we see very little of this, and we bring very few cases under this statute,’’ McDevitt said.

The indictments allege Perry “corruptly solicited” money from Moe after earlier similar unsuccessful attempts to secretly get money from Paul Sandifur, the president of Metropolitan Mortgage and Summit Properties, and Northern Quest Casino officials Tom Lien and Marianne Guenther.

That alleged conduct is the basis for the solicitation of a bribe charges against Perry.

The indictment alleges that in September 2002, Perry “corruptly solicited” a $15,000 loan from Sandifur whose company owned undeveloped land in Airway Heights that was being considered for the development of an Airway Heights municipal building by the Airway Heights City Council.

In that same month in 2002, the indictment alleges Perry “knowingly and corruptly solicited” a loan from the Northern Quest casino officials in exchange for the mayor’s support of the establishment of the Indian casino on former Spokane Raceway Park land in Airway Heights.

Neither Sandifur nor the Northern Quest officials loaned Perry money, and they aren’t named as defendants in the criminal indictment, said Senior Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas O. Rice.

Perry, who stepped down as Airway Heights mayor last Dec. 31, is charged with two counts of soliciting a bribe and two additional counts of bribery.

Moe is charged with two counts of bribery under federal anti-public corruption statutes.

If convicted, each count carries a maximum of 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Both men are expected to surrender and not be immediately arrested by FBI agents.

Moe reacted with surprise when told Tuesday afternoon that he’d been indicted.

“I have?’’ he said, when reached at his modest home in North Spokane.

“I’m not guilty, just like the other stuff I’m accused of,” the crusty 69-year-old businessman told The Spokesman-Review. “It’s some more lies and stories, but we’ll get it all sorted out.”

Perry, who is employed by the state of Washington, had no comment but is known to have previously admitted his involvement in the public corruption bribery case.

"Right now, on the advice of my attorney, I can make no comment," Perry said when reached at his home whose mortgage is held by Moe.

Dates for their separate arraignments are expected to be set Wednesday by U.S. Magistrate Judge Cynthia Imbrogno.

After failing to get money from Sandifur and the Northern Quest officials, Perry approached Moe, the indictment alleges. It says Moe "corruptly loaned" Perry $18,000 in October 2002 and again loaned him $109,000 in October 2004.

The loan was secured with the deed of trust to the Perrys' home at 762 S. King Street in Airway Heights.

FBI agents searched the home on April 27, 2005, seizing computers and business records.

The federal criminal charges against Moe come during a lull in a lengthy civil battle in state court, brought by 500 limited partners who allege he cheated them out of $2 million in stock they bought in the early 1970s.

In the latest development in that case, Moe filed a bankruptcy petition for Spokane Raceway Park on Aug. 17, temporarily freezing the action in Superior Court.

As part of their suit, a court-appointed receiver, Spokane attorney Barry Davidson, was named on July 1, 2005, by Superior Court Judge Robert Austin to take over all financial and day-to-day operations at Spokane Raceway Park, which remained open this season.

But Moe has refused to cooperate with Davidson and, public records allege, continues to defy orders from Superior Court Judge Robert Austin.

On June 1, Austin fired Moe as general manager of the racing complex and ordered him banned from the facility.

This summer, Moe fired his original attorney, Carl Oreskovich, and lists his $140,000 bill among the top 10 creditors on the Spokane Raceway Park bankruptcy petition.

Former Airway Heights Mayor, Car Track Operator Indicted (AP)

AP, September 20, 2006

SPOKANE, Wash. -- Former Airway Heights Mayor Dale Perry was indicted Tuesday, accused of soliciting and accepting bribes.

First Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom Rice said Perry, a former Airway Heights councilman and mayor, was named in indictments issued by a U.S. District Court grand jury.

Former Spokane Raceway Park General Manager Orville Moe was indicted on two counts of bribery of a public official.

Perry's term of office expired in 2005.

Perry, 53, declined to comment and referred a reporter to lawyer Amy Rubin of the federal defender's office in Spokane. She was not in her office late Tuesday.

The indictment alleges Moe, 69, of Spokane, loaned Perry $18,000 in October 2002 and another $109,000 in October 2004.

The government alleges the loans were actually bribes in return for Perry's refraining from voting on an admissions tax on Spokane Raceway Park, an auto racing complex, and his later vote to repeal the tax enacted in November 2003, Rice said.

The drag strip and oval racetrack complex is within the city limits of Airway Heights.

Two counts of the indictment allege that Perry "corruptly" solicited loans from former Metropolitan Mortgage executive Paul Sandifur and the Northern Quest Casino in September 2002. However, neither Sandifur nor the casino, operated by the Kalispel Tribe of Indians, loaned Perry money, Rice said.

Two other counts charge Perry with accepting bribes from Moe.

A message left at Moe's Spokane home was not immediately returned Tuesday.

Agents with the FBI and the state Gambling Commission raided Perry's home and office in April 2005.

Conviction on each of the bribery charges carries a maximum penalty of 10 years imprisonment and a $250,000 fine.

Neither man has been arrested. Rice said each would receive a summons for arraignment in federal court.

Psychologist Says Rodriguez Was Frightened About Leaving Prison (AP)

By Dave Kolpack, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 20, 2006

FARGO, N.D. (AP) - A Minnesota prison psychologist says Alfonso Rodriguez Jr. asked to see her in January 2003, while he was serving time for assaults on women, and told her he was frightened about being released.

Rita St. George, a psychologist at the medium security prison in Moose Lake, Minn., also testified Monday that she was worried Rodriguez might commit more crimes after his release. A follow-up interview with him in February eased some of those fears, she said, but she wished she had raised more questions with her superiors about Rodriguez's release.

In January 2003, she said, Rodriguez told her he was "very frightened." A month later, she said, he was doing better and "he had no thoughts of hurting himself or others."

St. George was among the last witnesses to be called by attorneys for Rodriguez, 53, of Crookston, Minn., as his trial enters its final stage. Jurors may begin deliberating later this week over whether he should be sentenced to death or life in prison for the killing of University of North Dakota student Dru Sjodin.

The verdict by the federal court jury of seven women and five men must be unanimous for Rodriguez to be sentenced to death. He was convicted late last month of kidnapping resulting in Sjodin's death.

On the witness stand, St. George argued with Rodriguez's attorney, Richard Ney, over the wording of her statements in an earlier deposition, and at one point told Ney he had been confrontational and degrading.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Norm Anderson asked St. George whether, in her follow-up interview with Rodriguez on Feb. 12, 2003, Rodriguez had said he wanted to remain in prison. She said he did not, that he was worried instead about where he would live, and that he seemed logical and coherent.

Rodriguez's 12-year-old niece and 13-year-old nephew testified Monday that they liked spending time with their uncle after he was released from prison in May 2003, and had visited him in jail. Three people who work at the Cass County Jail described Rodriguez as a model prisoner who had no disciplinary problems. Rodriguez has been held at the jail for the last two years.

Sister Yvonne Nelson of Fargo said she has visited Rodriguez about 100 times in the Cass County Jail. She said he was "reticent" in discussing spiritual issues when she first met him, but he "seemed more comfortable as time went on."

After the defense witnesses are finished, prosecutors will be allowed to offer rebuttal testimony before jurors begin deliberating.

"I think this part is much harder to predict than when he was found guilty," said Joseph Daly, a Hamline University law professor who has participated in death penalty cases and has been following the Rodriguez case. "In North Dakota, jurors are not used to dealing with death penalty cases."

North Dakota does not have the death penalty but it is allowed in federal cases. During a trip to Fargo last year, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the government is justified in seeking capital punishment in some cases in states that have outlawed the penalty.

"I believe the fact the state doesn't have the death penalty doesn't mean that the people of the state would not impose the ultimate sanction when the right circumstances dictate that that happen," Gonzales said.

Prosecutors point to the fact that jurors, in deciding earlier that Rodriguez was eligible for the death penalty, found that Sjodin, 22, of Pequot Lakes, Minn., was killed in an "especially heinous, cruel and depraved manner."

Sjodin disappeared from a Grand Forks mall parking lot in November 2003. Her body was found in a ravine near Crookston the following April. Authorities said she had been beaten, raped and stabbed.

Defense attorneys say several factors favor a sentence of life in prison for Rodriguez. They say he was sexually abused as a child and may have suffered brain damage from farm chemicals, leading to psychological and behavioral problems.

Rodriguez's mother and two of his sisters testified last week about their struggles as a poor migrant farm family, living in a house with no electricity or running water. They said children teased Rodriguez about his race and physical appearance.

"It's not so easy to put aside that kind of heartfelt feeling of a mother and his background," Daly said Sunday. "I think it will have some effect on the jurors ... and you only need to affect one juror."

Prosecutors say another factor favoring the death penalty is that jurors found Rodriguez caused serious injury in three earlier assaults on women.

The government also believes that testimony by friends and family of Sjodin in the last phase of the trial points to a death sentence.

Daly said he expects the case to be appealed, whether Rodriguez receives the death penalty or life in prison. Death penalty appeals would be more prolonged, Daly said.

"It's possible her parents will never see him executed," he said.

Mob Figure Is Investigated In Plot To Kill Judge In Case (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

Vincent Basciano, a fastidious and mercurial mob figure who could face the death penalty at his federal trial on charges that include conspiring to kill a prosecutor, is now under investigation for plotting to kill the judge who is to preside over his case, according to court papers made public yesterday.

The investigation, by the F.B.I. and federal prosecutors in Brooklyn and Manhattan, centers on a list that Mr. Basciano wrote in jail that names the judge, Nicholas G. Garaufis, of United States District Court in Brooklyn and four other people who prosecutors say he sought to have killed, the court papers and several people with knowledge of the inquiry said.

Besides Judge Garaufis, the people named on the list include three Mafia turncoats who testified against Mr. Basciano at another trial this year and the prosecutor he is accused of plotting to kill, according to an Aug. 28 letter that prosecutors wrote to defense lawyers. The letter was initially sealed, but was publicly filed yesterday after a reporter made inquiries about the case.

While an F.B.I. handwriting analysis concluded that Mr. Basciano wrote the list, and he has acknowledged doing so, he denies that he was plotting to kill anyone on the list, according to those with knowledge of the inquiry.

Instead, he maintains that he compiled the names as part of a plan to use Santeria, a religion in the Caribbean region, to lift the evil spells that he contends were placed on him by the judge, the turncoats and the prosecutor — far from a conventional tactic by traditional Mafia standards, the people said. They all spoke on the condition of anonymity because the investigation is continuing.

Mr. Basciano, 46, a dapper man who is sometimes called Vinny Gorgeous and served briefly as the acting boss of the Bonanno organized-crime family, was convicted of racketeering conspiracy at the trial that ended in May, but the jury deadlocked on murder charges. In July, while at the Metropolitan Correctional Center in Manhattan, he gave the list to an inmate, several of the people said.

At the time, the inmate — unbeknownst to Mr. Basciano — was working out a deal with prosecutors, the people said. He gave the list to prosecutors, according to the letter, leading to the investigation.

Mr. Basciano "indicated to the inmate, in sum and substance," that he was seeking to murder the people on the list, read the letter, written by John Buretta, Winston Y. Chan and Thomas J. Seigel, assistant United States attorneys in Brooklyn. The inmate was not named in the letter.

Mr. Basciano was quickly moved into solitary confinement. For that reason, federal authorities did not believe that the judge or the others were in grave danger, several of the people said. But they said they were treating the matter seriously nonetheless. It is unclear whether additional security precautions have been taken.

The mother of the inmate to whom Mr. Basciano gave the list has some involvement with Santeria, several of the people said, but the details are unclear.

Mr. Basciano's lead lawyer, James Kousouros, would not comment on the investigation, noting that at a hearing on the matter on Aug. 28, a portion of which was closed to the public at Mr. Kousouros's request, Judge Garaufis ordered both sides not to discuss it. Mr. Kousouros also complained that the letter was made public without notice to the defense.

"The defense intends to prove that there was absolutely no nefarious motive behind anything the government has published," he said, referring to the list.

Another of Mr. Basciano's lawyers, Ephraim Savitt, said it was irresponsible for the government to make the letter public before the investigation had been completed and they could determine whether the accusations were true.

The accusation that Mr. Basciano was conspiring to kill a federal judge was stunning not only because of its nature — and his explanation for the list — but also because killing judges has long been taboo among Mafia members in the United States.

If the allegations are true, Mr. Basciano's apparent bad luck in giving the list to a man who was already cooperating with the authorities would not be unprecedented. It was his own family's boss, Joseph Massino, who the authorities have said told them about what they say was Mr. Basciano's plot to kill the lead prosecutor, Greg Andres, in his first case.

And if Mr. Basciano indeed went outside the mob to find a killer, it would be an acknowledgment of the calamitous impact that a series of prosecutions led by Mr. Andres has had on the Bonanno family in recent years. The cases have led to convictions against about 75 mobsters and mob associates, including Mr. Massino. Judge Garaufis also presided over Mr. Basciano's earlier trial and is to oversee his upcoming trial on a murder and racketeering indictment that includes charges of plotting to kill Mr. Andres. Mr. Basciano is awaiting sentencing in that case and could face up to 20 years in prison. He could face the death penalty at his next trial if the United States attorney general, Alberto Gonzales, authorizes prosecutors to seek it.

The three witnesses on the list are Dominick Cicale, a former Bonanno capo who was very close to Mr. Basciano; Louis Tartaglione, a former capo; and Tommy Lee, a lawyer who was accused of carrying messages for Bonanno figures.

Busy Hit List For Mobster (NYDN)

By John Marzulli, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, September 20, 2006

A Bonanno crime family allegedly plotted from jail to whack a federal judge, a prosecutor and three mob rats, authorities revealed yesterday.

Vincent (Vinny Gorgeous) Basciano, 46, drafted a hit list with the names of the five alleged targets and passed it to another inmate at the Metropolitan Correctional Center in lower Manhattan, according to a letter unsealed by prosecutors yesterday.

Heading the hit parade was Assistant U.S. Attorney Greg Andres, whom Basciano is already charged with plotting to kill. But new to the list were Brooklyn Federal Judge Nicholas Garaufis and mob turncoats Dominick Cicale, Thomas Lee and James (Big Louie) Tartaglione.

The unidentified inmate turned the list over to the government in August, which responded by throwing Basciano into solitary confinement with no visitors.

"Forensic analysis by the FBI laboratory has confirmed that the handwriting on the note is a positive match to Basciano," prosecutor Winston Chan said.

Basciano, who once owned a beauty salon in the Bronx called Hello Gorgeous, was convicted of racketeering last May. The Brooklyn Federal Court jury could not reach a verdict on a murder count against him, and a retrial on the charge is scheduled for early next year.

DOJ_NMG_0066137

Adding to Basciano's woes, the feds made public a letter the married gangster wrote to a girlfriend from jail, which was used to confirm his handwriting.

In the letter, he professes his love for the Rockland County woman, and expresses his feelings about the mob life. ("All the things I held sacred ... have been a fraud.") He writes that Cicale's betrayal "broke my heart."

"When are you going to send me a picture of you? You could send me a picture of ya in a G-string you know!" Basciano wrote.

A source familiar with the probe said Basciano is denying that he intended to hurt the people on the list. But prosecutors view the threat seriously.

Defense lawyer Ephraim Savitt declined to comment on the allegations.

FIVE ON MAFIA BIG'S 'HIT LIST' (NYPOST)

By Zach Haberman

The New York Post, September 20, 2006

Things could get real ugly for Vinny Gorgeous.

The Brooklyn U.S. Attorney's Office yesterday released a list of five people it claims acting Bonanno boss Vincent "Vinny Gorgeous" Basciano wanted to have whacked while he was in jail awaiting a racketeering trial last March.

They include the federal judge who presided over the trial, the lead prosecutor and three mob turncoats. At the trial, Basciano was found guilty of trying to kill a man running a rival gambling operation.

Atop the list was Assistant U.S. Attorney Greg Andres. It's the second time Basciano has conspired to kill him, the feds said. The mobster goes on trial next month in the first plot and could face death if convicted.

The mob big hates Andres, who has decimated the crime family through numerous convictions, the feds said.

Basciano routinely shot him death stares during his March trial.

Also on the list was Brooklyn federal Judge Nicholas Garaufis, who glared at Basciano during a hearing last month after he was privately informed of the new plot by the prosecutor.

Basciano, a former Bronx hair-salon owner, was put in solitary while the feds investigated.

Two of three rats Basciano put on his hit list testified at the trial: one-time protégé Dominick Cicale and lawyer Thomas Lee, who was busted passing jailhouse notes between Basciano and Bonanno ex-godfather Joe Massino.

Map-stealing Collector Begs For Leniency (AP)

AP, September 20, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. – A renowned dealer who admitted stealing nearly 100 rare antique maps asked for leniency yesterday, saying his extensive cooperation with authorities led to the recovery of most of the maps.

E. Forbes Smiley III, a 50-year-old resident of Martha's Vineyard, faces restitution and up to six years in prison under federal guidelines when he is sentenced Sept. 27. He asked for a sentence of up to three years.

Smiley admitted in June that over eight years he stole 97 maps from the New York and Boston public libraries, the Newberry Library in Chicago, the Harvard University library and the British Library in London. The oldest maps dated back to the 1500s and some are the first records of settlements, territories and discoveries in America, experts say.

"It is our view that he has cooperated honestly, openly and thoroughly," Smiley's attorney, Richard Reeve, wrote. "He made a decision almost immediately to assist in the investigation and attempted throughout to aid the government in whatever way possible and to help retrieve as many of the maps as possible. To reach that goal, he had to admit to conduct that would have never been uncovered."

Smiley, who grew up in Bedford, N.H., and attended the Derryfield School in Manchester, N.H., admitted to taking two more maps only a few weeks ago, Reeve said. The court papers do not provide any details about those maps.

The British Library last week urged the court to impose a stiff sentence, saying Smiley systematically looted treasures that told the story of the new world and had survived catastrophic events over the centuries. Some of the maps have not been recovered, while others were damaged, the library noted.

New Haven: Leniency Sought In Theft Of Maps (NYT)

By Alison Leigh Cowan Compiled By John Sullivan

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

Edward Forbes Smiley III, an antiquities dealer who admitted having stolen nearly 100 rare maps from leading libraries and institutions, asked a federal judge yesterday to consider a sentence of 30 to 36 months in prison. Last week, the British Library, one of the victimized institutions, recommended 78 to 97 months, but said that even 10 years, the maximum possible, “could not be deemed to be too severe.” Mr. Smiley’s lawyer, Richard A. Reeve, asked the judge to give his client credit for having cooperated with the authorities once he was arrested. Mr. Reeve argued that the “consequences of the case could be highly beneficial” to the institutions if “the hard lessons” it taught led them to enhance security and update their inventories.

Trial Opens For SBC Employee Tied To Pellicano Investigation (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2006

A federal prosecutor charged Tuesday that a former SBC employee repeatedly lied to a grand jury about her conversations with a co-worker indicted in the racketeering and wiretapping probe of onetime private eye Anthony Pellicano.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Kevin Lally told a Los Angeles federal jury that Joann Wiggan "brazenly committed perjury by telling lie after lie" about her contact with Ray Turner, another onetime SBC employee accused of aiding Pellicano's alleged criminal enterprise.

Wiggan, 52, who worked for SBC for more than 30 years, is charged with lying to a federal grand jury last October and again in January when she testified that she had had no telephone contact with Turner in years. To the contrary, authorities alleged, phone records showed more than 100 calls from Turner to Wiggan's office voice mail from 1999 through 2002, and other records also reflected calls between their home phones and cellphones.

The alleged contact between Wiggan and Turner is considered significant to authorities because two other former SBC employees have admitted that they improperly provided confidential information about SBC customers to Turner.

Wiggan's trial is expected to last a week and is the first resulting from the investigation of Pellicano and others by the FBI and U.S. attorney's office.

To date, 14 people have been charged in the case, and half of them have pleaded guilty to charges ranging from lying to authorities to acknowledging that they hired Pellicano to wiretap others. Pellicano, Turner and the remaining defendants have pleaded not guilty in a case that is scheduled for trial next April.

Polling Company Employee Pleads Guilty To Fraud (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, September 20, 2006

NEW HAVEN, (AP) _ An employee of a company that conducted campaign polls for President Bush, Sen. Joe Lieberman and other political candidates pleaded guilty Tuesday to making up poll results, according to the U.S. Attorney's office.

Darryl Hylton, 42, of Hamden pleaded guilty before U.S. District Judge Janet C. Hall in Bridgeport to one count of conspiracy to commit wire fraud. The Guilford-based company, DataUSA, is now known as Viewpoint USA.

Hylton admitted that he conspired to falsify survey and polling results to meet deadlines or other requirements that DataUSA otherwise could not meet. He also admitted that he directed other DataUSA employees to falsify results in a variety of ways, including changing demographic information, such as gender, to satisfy client requirements.

Hylton faces up to five years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000 when he is sentenced on Dec. 11.

His plea comes two weeks after Tracy Costin, the company's owner, pleaded guilty to the same charge. As part of her plea agreement, Costin agreed to repay $82,732 to unidentified clients for 11 jobs between June 2002 and May 2004.

According to a federal indictment, Costin told employees to alter poll data, and managers at the company told employees to "talk to cats and dogs" when instructing them to fabricate the surveys.

Prosecutors say in some instances all survey answers were fabricated or surveys were completed after the respondent being interviewed had hung up the phone.

An FBI affidavit from 2004 in support of a search warrant quotes a supervisor of the company estimating that 50 percent of the data sent to Bush's campaign was falsified. FBI Special Agent Jeff Rovelli, who wrote the affidavit, said in an interview with The Associated Press earlier this month that investigators were not able to verify the claim related to Bush because that data was not located and analyzed.

The company primarily did internal polls for candidates rather than the type widely quoted in the news media, authorities said.

BetOnSports Tries To Settle Civil And Criminal Charges (BVND)

The Belleville News Democrat, September 20, 2006

ST. LOUIS - Online gambling firm BetOnSports has asked to negotiate a settlement of civil and criminal charges for racketeering and fraud against the company, lawyers on both sides said in court Tuesday.

"What we are interested in doing is resolving this matter," BetOnSports PLC lawyer Jeffrey Demerath told U.S. District Judge Carol Jackson Tuesday. Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Fagan said he thought the case could be resolved, according to STLtoday.com, the Web site for the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Federal prosecutors in St. Louis unveiled a 22-count indictment against BetOnSports in June for allegedly breaking the law by allowing U.S. customers to gamble and place bets over the phone and online.

Former Chief Executive David Carruthers, 48, remains under house arrest in a St. Louis suburban hotel awaiting trial on charges of mail fraud, wire fraud and racketeering. He and several other BetOnSports employees and associates were named in a federal indictment and have all pleaded not guilty.

DOJ_NMG_0066139

The company closed its U.S. operations Aug. 10. Its Web site promises to "repay balances due to U.S. customers." Most of the 9.9 million bets placed in 2005 came from U.S. bettors, STLtoday.com reported.

Also on Tuesday, prosecutors won a temporary restraining order that barred the company from accepting bets from U.S. customers. The order also seeks to force the company to give up $4.5 billion and other property and hand over business records, the Post-Dispatch reported.

The online gambling industry has kept a close eye on the case and the Sept. 6 arrest of Peter Dicks, chairman of another British-based online gambling operation, Sportingbet.

Super Micro Pleads Guilty In Iran Export Case (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

Super Micro Computer Inc. pleaded guilty to a felony charge of exporting computer components to Iran in 2001 and 2002 in violation of a national security ban, the U.S. Attorney for the Northern District of California said.

Super Micro, a San Jose, Calif., producer of servers, motherboards, and power supplies, agreed to pay a $150,000 fine. It couldn't be reached to comment.

Super Micro pleaded guilty to selling 300 motherboards to a company in Dubai knowing the items were to be shipped to Iran, the Justice Department said. At the time, it was illegal to export the motherboards to Iran without a license, prosecutors said. The products are no longer subject to such restrictions, the Justice Department said.

In a plea agreement, the government noted Super Micro became aware of the investigation in February 2004 and took remedial action that involved setting up an export-control program that year.

Because of the program, prosecutors agreed it wasn't necessary to put Super Micro on probation as part of the settlement. The government said it has been monitoring the company's exports and hasn't found any further violations.

Doubts Raised On Hinckley Parents (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 20, 2006

Reports from St. Elizabeths Hospital are raising questions about whether the parents of would-be presidential assassin John W. Hinckley Jr. can continue to supervise him on overnight trips, according to the Justice Department.

"It is now clear that the physical condition of Mr. Hinckley's parents has deteriorated considerably," prosecutors wrote in a memo filed Monday in federal court in the District.

Hinckley, 51, who shot President Reagan in 1981 and was found not guilty by reason of insanity in 1982, last year won the right to leave St. Elizabeths Hospital in Southeast for seven overnight visits with his parents in Williamsburg. A judge extended the order last month pending a hearing in November.

Hinckley's attorneys last week sought to postpone the Nov. 6 hearing. They said officials need more time to gather information.

The Justice Department on Monday objected to a delay.

In the memo, Assistant U.S. Attorneys Thomas Zeno and Sarah Chasson said Hinckley's trips were conditioned on supervision by his parents. However, the parents' "physical ability to supervise Mr. Hinckley is questionable," the memo states.

"The reports also reveal persistent tension within the Hinckley family stemming from this deterioration," the memo states.

Hinckley attorney Barry Levine did not return a phone call seeking comment yesterday.

In a filing last week, Mr. Levine noted that officials at St. Elizabeths are preparing a proposal for a "significant expansion" of Hinckley's conditions of release.

The Justice Department objected to Hinckley's request to postpone the upcoming hearing, citing recent reports from St. Elizabeths and concerns about the ability of Mr. Hinckley's parents to supervise him.

The reports are not public record.

The dispute is the latest disagreement between the Justice Department and Hinckley's attorneys over increasing freedoms that Hinckley has won in recent years.

Last month, U.S. District Judge Paul L. Friedman wrote that Hinckley "does not present a danger to himself or others if permitted to make visits to his parents' home."

He allowed Hinckley visits as many as four nights at a time pending the scheduled hearing.

Man Sentenced To More Than 31 Years (WP)

By Jerry Markon, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 20, 2006

The wife of James Feltis, the first Pentagon police officer killed in the line of duty in the agency's 62-year history, lashed out in court yesterday at the man who ran her husband over with a car that he said he stole because he "just needed a car."

DOJ_NMG_0066140

"How infuriating to hear such statements, to willfully take James's life," Mary E. Feltis told the judge. "To injure him because James was in his way, because he needed a car, to injure or kill another person for reasons so unthinkable."

U.S. District Court Judge Leonie M. Brinkema sentenced Ossie K. LaRode, 23, who is homeless, to 31 years and 10 months in prison. In January 2005, LaRode, who was leading Alexandria police on a six-mile-long chase in a stolen Cadillac, hit Feltis, 41, outside a Pentagon traffic booth.

Brinkema rejected the defense's efforts to send LaRode, who pleaded guilty in July, to a prison hospital after two experts testified that he is mentally ill. Brinkema said that "there is no question that mental illness played a role in what happened" and LaRode can be treated in prison and ask to be transferred to a hospital if his mental state deteriorates.

"This case is, in one word, a tragedy, a tragedy for everybody," Brinkema said before sentencing LaRode. "Justice and retribution are appropriate at certain times, and that certainly is appropriate here. It was just by luck that there were not more serious injuries or deaths."

Mary Feltis told the court how her husband lingered in the hospital for five weeks, through countless surgeries and the amputation of his left leg. "He fought very hard [and] tried to stay with us," she said, sobbing and visibly shaking at times. "James suffered those five weeks."

The couple's 8-year-old daughter, who recently began playing soccer, drew a picture that was submitted to Brinkema in which the girl's father floated above her, as an angel with wings. It was inscribed "coach Papa."

Pentagon Police Chief Richard S. Keevill put his arm around Mary Feltis after she spoke, as more than 20 uniformed Pentagon police sat grim-faced, some blinking back tears. Pentagon police have said Feltis's death was hard on the agency, which managed to escape the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks without any fatalities, even as a hijacked jet plowed into the Pentagon.

The fatal sequence of events began, according to court documents, when LaRode carjacked a 2003 Cadillac Seville outside of an Alexandria restaurant Jan. 11, 2005. After the victim reported the carjacking, police pursued LaRode, and he led them to Interstate 395 near the Pentagon. LaRode turned the wrong way onto an exit ramp and sped toward the Pentagon's south parking lot. He continued to drive the wrong way along South Rotary Road and approached Feltis's security kiosk.

Feltis stepped into the Cadillac's path and signaled for LaRode to stop. Instead, LaRode plowed the car into Feltis, who died Feb. 14, 2005, at Inova Fairfax Hospital. He had never regained consciousness.

"He did not stop, he did not look back, he never braked, he never swerved," Assistant U.S. Attorney Erik R. Barnett told Brinkema, adding that LaRode grabbed a police officer's gun after his car was stopped and fired it three times, accidentally striking himself in the leg and groin.

LaRode pleaded guilty to second-degree murder and use of a firearm in the commission of a violent crime.

Former Lawyer Sent To Federal Pen For Embezzling $1.2 Million From Clients (LAW)

By Lisa Siegel, The Connecticut Law Tribune

Connecticut Law Tribune, September 20, 2006

Former Greenwich, Conn., attorney Roland R. Hicks was sentenced last week to 37 months in prison for embezzling over $1.2 million from clients and defrauding investors in a dot.com business called "LawWeb."

The sentence imposed by U.S. District Court Judge Ellen Bree Burns on a single count of mail fraud was the top of the range of imprisonment stipulated by the parties when Hicks pled guilty on June 21.

Hicks, 49, was a practicing attorney in Greenwich in 2000 when he incorporated LawWeb Inc., a startup Internet business that was to offer online private placement variable life insurance, according to documents filed in the case. Hicks convinced "seemingly sophisticated" people to invest in his company, and misrepresented the business' assets in purported balance sheets he sent to the investors, Assistant U.S. Attorney Paul A. Murphy wrote in court papers. Eventually, Hicks sent investors a shareholder buyout agreement that included checks with the amount of their investment plus a premium. Those "buyout" checks were worthless, and Hicks admitted in his plea bargain that he used the investors' money for his own personal use.

Holding himself out as an attorney with expertise in trust and estate law, Hicks took over $2.2 million from one client who instructed Hicks to fund an annuity for his wife as part of a property settlement in a pending divorce, court papers revealed. Hicks admitted that he converted at least $1 million of the client's money for his own personal use. Some of the money he used as a down payment on a house, according to Murphy.

"It is our hope that this prosecution will serve as a deterrent to any professional or other individual who solicits investment capital and abuses his or her position of authority and defrauds innocent clients and investors," U.S. Attorney Kevin J. O'Connor stated. "We will prosecute these crimes vigorously and seek restitution for victims."

In addition to the three-year prison term, Burns imposed three years of supervised release and ordered restitution of $1.5 million. Hicks was represented in district court by federal public defender Paul F. Thomas.

Thomas argued for a 30-month sentence, describing Hicks's thefts as "good intentions gone terribly awry. ... [C]lients and investors were betrayed by a cascade of bad judgment, self-interest, and ultimately, fraudulent misrepresentations. Regardless of what he had hoped to accomplish, the result was disastrous," Thomas wrote.

Thomas described Hicks as "a talented man" who threw away a lifetime of hard-earned accomplishments. Hicks suffered from an emotionally abusive father and from severe facial disfigurement as a child, Thomas wrote. At age four, a benign tumor began to grow on Hicks's nose, provoking severe taunting from peers and social ostracism. By the age of 14, Hicks had undergone nine operations during summer school vacations and had been hospitalized for one to three weeks on each occasion, Thomas said. By the age of 28, Hicks had 17 surgeries.

Despite such daunting adversity, Hicks graduated from New York University Law School while married and starting a family. He began a career in insurance, working first for Liberty Mutual Insurance Co. and then for Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Co. as an independent contractor until 2002. He opened his law practice in 1999; by 2000, he developed the concept for the LawWeb business, Thomas wrote.

Hicks pled guilty in Stamford Superior Court in June to two counts of larceny in the first degree and one count of larceny in the third degree. An eight-year sentence concurrent to his federal sentence is anticipated, according to a statement released Monday by O'Connor.

Hicks' law license was suspended for 15 years in July 2005 by Hartford Superior Court Judge Vanessa Bryant for mishandling clients' funds.

Judge Orders Gunman To Be Held And To Undergo Drug Treatment (WP)

By Eric M. Weiss And Mary Beth Sheridan

The Washington Post, September 20, 2006

The armed man who burst into the U.S. Capitol on Monday morning was ordered held in jail for the next 10 days and to undergo medical or psychiatric treatment after testing positive for drug use.

Carlos Greene, 20, said little during his initial appearance before U.S. Magistrate Judge John M. Facciola yesterday. Wearing a white jail jumpsuit, he appeared to breathe heavily at times and close his eyes. He thanked the judge on his way out of the courtroom.

Greene is accused of barreling a sport-utility vehicle through a construction entrance at the Capitol about 7:45 a.m. Monday, smashing into a concrete barrier and sprinting into the building. Police chased him to the basement and arrested him after a struggle. Authorities then discovered that Greene had a loaded gun in his waistband. No one was hurt during the incident.

Prosecutors offered no motive in court. But they revealed new details, saying that Greene nearly struck a pedestrian on First Street NE, near the Capitol, and then backed up and nearly hit the pedestrian again. Greene then failed to heed a Capitol Police officer's yells to stop as he drove near the building's east side, prosecutors said.

When he was cornered in the basement, Greene reached for a shotgun used by one of the Capitol police officers trying to subdue him, prosecutors said. Authorities said that they found crack cocaine when they searched Greene and that he was on drugs.

Greene, of Silver Spring, was charged with unlawful possession of a firearm by a convicted felon. He has a record of convictions for disorderly conduct in Montgomery County and fleeing a law enforcement officer in the District. He has failed to report to probation authorities since July, records show.

In June, he was charged in the District with carrying an unlicensed pistol and driving while intoxicated, records show. In April, he was arrested in Rockville and charged with attempting to elude police, reckless driving and disobeying a law enforcement officer. He is awaiting trial in both cases.

His government-appointed attorney, Carlos Varegas, declined to comment yesterday. Greene is due back in court Friday for a hearing to determine whether he will remain jailed pending trial.

Capitol Police yesterday continued an internal investigation into what happened, scrutinizing videotape from security cameras, listening to recorded radio transmissions and interviewing witnesses, said William H. Pickle, the Senate sergeant-at-arms, who sits on the board overseeing the agency.

Pickle said the officers had determined that "there were two specific areas where the police could have done a much better job." In both cases, human error was involved, Pickle said, declining to provide details so as not to reveal security vulnerabilities. "Corrective action will be taken," he said, and added that police will carry out further training and exercises.

Hundreds of millions of dollars have been spent to upgrade security at the Capitol in recent years.

"There's nothing wrong with the system," Pickle said. "But there was absolutely something wrong with the exercise" of procedures.

Calls to the Acting Capitol Police Chief Christopher M. McGaffin, were not returned yesterday.

The reaction from Congress to the breach of security was one of calm concern yesterday, as legislators waited to learn what the police internal investigation would reveal.

Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.) said the incident showed "a hole in our security that they [Capitol Police] had not sufficiently contemplated." Greene reached the grounds through an entrance for construction workers building a visitor center, striking a Capitol Police vehicle that was guarding the gate.

Norton said that although police have to improve planning, they don't need wholesale changes. "I hope this doesn't result in locking us down any more because we're plenty safe with the other security" measures in place, she said.

Salley Collins, a spokeswoman for the Committee on House Administration, which oversees the department, said, "We intend to work with the Capitol Police to ensure something like this will not happen again."

Security Lapse (WP)

The Washington Post, September 20, 2006

ONE WOULD HAVE thought that with so many barricades installed, streets closed off and officers hired, police would be able to prevent a man with a loaded gun from getting inside the U.S. Capitol and rushing past the offices of top congressional leaders. The breach of Capitol security Monday by a man apparently high on drugs, who drove past security and onto the Capitol grounds, may well have been a fluke, but it demands a rigorous review by police and congressional authorities.

Thankfully no one was injured in the early-morning incident, in contrast to the tragedy that occurred in 1998 when two Capitol Police officers were fatally shot. Accordingly, Capitol Police showed a commendable amount of restraint in peacefully apprehending the suspect, who apparently got into the building via an unprotected construction entrance. Clearly embarrassed, Acting Capitol Police Chief Christopher M. McGaffin was right to call the security breach "unacceptable" and to promise an investigation.

Among the questions that need to be answered is why the public wasn't told about the breach in a timely fashion. It took some nine hours before any information was released; that lapse, like gun-toting inside government offices, doesn't make anyone feel safer.

Police Get Grant For Technology Upgrades (TALLDH)

By Chris Norwood, Home staff writer

Talladega (AL) Daily Home, September 20, 2006

TALLADEGA — U.S. Sen. Richard Shelby (R-Ala.), chairman of the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on Commerce, Justice and Science, issued a press release Tuesday announcing the Department of Justice will release $247,000 to the Police Department for technology upgrades.

Shelby was instrumental in securing this funding during the fiscal year 2006 appropriations process, according to the release.

“Local law enforcement officers work on the front lines every day to ensure the safety of our communities and our citizens,” Shelby said. “It is crucial that they have the most up-to-date equipment available. With these technology upgrades, the Talladega Police Department will be able to better maintain public safety in Talladega.”

The release goes on to say: “The funding provided will be used for the purchase of in-car camera systems, mobile data terminals, vehicles and other equipment upgrades. In addition, a storage server will be purchased to allow the department to keep data in chronological order for playback during court, complaints and investigations.”

According to Police Chief Alan Watson, one of the major purchases will be 11 or 12 laptop computers, which will be mounted in patrol cars. The mounting will automatically charge the laptop’s battery, which will allow the officer to take it out of the car and use it to take statements from crime victims and record other information.

The computers will also be equipped with touch screens, which will allow witnesses and victims to sign their statements on the computer.

Once the officer drives back to the station at City Hall, the newly recorded data will automatically be taken from the laptop and put on a central server.

“This will just about eliminate any handwritten documents,” Watson said. “All of our arrest and accident reports are already done on a computer, and now incident and offense reports done in the field will be as well.”

The goal is to have a laptop in every patrol car while it is on duty, he said. The computers will be moved to other units when the shift changes.

At some point, the National Criminal Information Center information and Comet Tracker programs officers currently carry on Blackberry handheld computers will also be transferred to the laptops.

This will be an advantage because the laptops have larger screens with better resolution, so pulling up a suspect’s driver’s license photo, for instance, will be of more use to officers in the field.

“We’re really excited about this,” Watson said. “We’re ready to go.”

The computers, in-car cameras, software and licensing will all have to be bid out. If the check arrives from Washington by the end of the month, as expected, Watson said the systems could be up and running before the end of the year.

City manager Thomas Christie credits the council’s decision to hire a federal lobbyist at a cost of $60,000 per year last year for bringing the additional funding home. Another earmark, for a similar amount, creating a city Drug Task Force, is also in the works but has not been approved.

The appropriation is a Congressional earmark, which differs from a grant in that the city does not have to provide any matching funds.

Woman Pleads Guilty To Fraud (BRADV)

Baton Rouge Advocate, September 20, 2006

One Louisiana resident pleaded guilty and three others were sentenced in federal court Friday on fraud charges related to hurricane disaster relief programs.

DOJ_NMG_0066143

According to the U.S. Attorney's Office, Kim Cummings, 38, of Baton Rouge pleaded guilty to one count of making a false and fraudulent claim for Hurricane Katrina relief.

Whitney R. Paul, 19, of Donaldsonville and Vinita S. Lane, 28, and Jenny L. Lowery, 22, both of Baton Rouge, were sentenced.

After Hurricane Katrina, the Federal Emergency Management Agency made available $2,000 in expedited disaster assistance for food, shelter and clothing to people affected by the hurricane.

Cummings was indicted on two counts of making a false and fraudulent claim for assistance. She could be sentenced to a maximum of five years in prison, a $250,000 fine or both.

As part of her plea agreement, the U.S. Attorney's Office will dismiss the second count when she is sentenced.

Lane pleaded guilty in June to making a false and fraudulent claim. She was sentenced to three years probation and $2,000 restitution.

Lowery pleaded guilty in May to making a false and fraudulent claim. She was sentenced to three years probation and $1,916.38 in restitution.

Paul pleaded guilty in May to making a false and fraudulent claim. She was sentenced to five years probation and $2,000 restitution.

According to the U.S. Attorney's Office, 74 people have been charged in the Middle District of Louisiana with violations related to hurricane disaster relief funds.

In September 2005, U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales created the Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force to deter, investigate and prosecute such disaster-related crimes as charity fraud, identity theft, procurement fraud and insurance fraud.

The Task Force includes the FBI, the U.S. Inspectors General community, the U.S. Secret Service, the U.S. Postal Inspection Service, the Executive Office for United States Attorneys and others.

Mezzatesta Indicted (AP)

AP, September 20, 2006

Former delegate, ex-superintendent face federal charges

Former House Education Chairman Jerry Mezzatesta and former Hampshire County schools Superintendent David Friend were indicted Tuesday on federal charges of defrauding the school board and misappropriating public funds.

A federal grand jury in Martinsburg charged the ailing Mezzatesta, 59, of Romney, and Friend, 59, of Morgantown, with conspiring to misapply public funds between January 2004 and June 2005, Acting U.S. Attorney Rita Valdrini said.

"I truly feel really bad that he's been indicted over this," said Mezzatesta's attorney, Deirdre Purdy. "He's lost his place in the Legislature, and with the cancer, he has suffered enough. I don't know why they keep hounding him."

Friend's attorney, Wes Metheney of Morgantown, defended his client from what he called "a Mezzatesta witch hunt" and called the indictments "a shame."

The charges center on a $75,000 grant that Mezzatesta, a nine-term lawmaker, sought in March 2003 for the Special Services Workshop in Romney. Mezzatesta had agreed not to use his legislative office to seek money for the Hampshire County school system where he was employed as an administrator.

In 2004, Friend asked state officials for permission to spend the money instead on Red Cross and emergency services training facilities in Romney and Springfield.

State officials who approved the change said the list included equipment, infrastructure for the Future Farmers of America at the Hampshire County fairgrounds and supported employment opportunities for the Special Services Workshop.

The list did not include $5,000 distributed by the county to the Capon Bridge Library and $5,000 each to six volunteer fire departments in Augusta, Capon Bridge, Capon Springs, Levels, North River and Slanesville.

In April 2005, the state Board of Education ordered the county board to return $35,000 of the grant money. That same month, the Hampshire County board fired Mezzatesta from his $60,000 administrative job.

"Unless they know something I've not learned in a year and half or so, all the money went for appropriate purposes and was not improperly used," Metheney said. "The grant was properly given to agencies for first responder services."

Metheney said state officials he spoke to suggested that if supplementary paperwork had been filed, the additional diversion of funds would have been approved.

"No one has shown me anything that shows money was being spent for anything other than to help the children of Hampshire County," he said.

The indictment, however, alleges Mezzatesta diverted the money "with an intent to derive an advantage ... in his effort to be re-elected" in 2004, Valdrini said.

The effort failed; Mezzatesta, a Democrat, lost his race.

He'd been removed as House Education chairman, a post he'd held since 1997, in August 2004. That demotion came amid an investigation to determine if he had fabricated and backdated a letter to fend off ethics allegations.

Mezzatesta was later convicted of a misdemeanor state charge of destroying legislative computer records as part of the alleged cover-up.

If convicted on both counts of the federal indictment, Mezzatesta and Friend could each be sentenced to up to 15 years in prison and ordered to pay as much as $500,000 in fines.

Last fall, Hampshire County Board of Education members rejected a $275,000 buyout for Friend, whose contract was to run through 2008. Though he filed a civil lawsuit that is set to be tried next month, Friend resigned in January after 15 months on medical leave.

That same month, citing the financial irregularities, the state seized partial control of the Hampshire County system.

Superintendent Cynthia P. Kolsun, installed by the state but later hired by the board for a three-year term, said the county has been working hard to fix its problems. When it feels ready, the county can petition the state to end the intervention.

"We're not there yet, but we do recognize best practices and that's what we're putting into place now," she said.

Kolsun said the entire community has been hurt by the ethics scandal.

"The whole community has been involved, and the people in this community are so supportive of the school system," she said. "They want what's best for their kids, and I commend them for that."

In July, Mezzatesta paid a $2,000 fine to the West Virginia Ethics Commission.

That was 16 months after the commission reprimanded and fined him for improperly using his legislative position to solicit state grants, and for giving the commission a fabricated letter to fend off allegations of misconduct.

His wife, Mary Lou, has admitted she dictated the phony letter.

Press Aide Pleads No Contest In Sex Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Phil Davis, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 20, 2006

(AP) - BARTOW, Fla.-A former Department of Homeland Security press aide pleaded no contest Tuesday to charges that he had sexually explicit online conversations with someone he thought was a 14-year-old girl.

Brian J. Doyle, 55, could face up to five years in prison under the plea agreement accepted Tuesday. He also faces up to 10 years' probation at sentencing scheduled for Nov. 17, and must register as a sex offender. He resigned from the department shortly after his April 4 arrest.

"I just want to say one thing. I am very, very sorry. Very sorry," Doyle told reporters outside the Polk County courthouse.

Doyle, of Silver Spring, Md., could have been sentenced to life in prison for 23 felony charges, including 16 counts of sending pornographic movie clips to a minor.

Prosecutors said Doyle wrote "very graphic" descriptions of sexual acts in online chats with a 14-year-old named "Ashlynne," who was actually an undercover Polk County sheriff's detective. Doyle was arrested after detectives said he tried to set up a meeting in Florida with the girl on a date when she wouldn't be menstruating.

According to court records, Doyle bragged about his government connections, provided his government-issued phone numbers, showed off his department ID and may have used his official computer in the communications with the detective posing as the girl.

Doyle told detectives he wasn't attracted to children, but had explicit conversations as a "kind of a power trip," court documents show.

Doyle's attorney, Barry Helfand, said his client suffers from depression and would detail the reasons for his online relationship at the sentencing hearing.

CIVIL LAW:

Federal Judge Allows Ex-Vandal's Lawsuit To Proceed (AP)

By Rebecca Boone, Associated Press

AP, September 20, 2006

BOISE (AP) — A federal judge has said a lawsuit brought by a former University of Idaho football player against U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, the Department of Homeland Security and others can move forward.

U.S. District Judge Edward Lodge made the ruling in a written order Monday.

Abdullah al-Kidd, who played for the Vandals under the name Lavoni Kidd, contends that in 2003 the government wrongfully arrested him as a material witness in its unsuccessful computer terrorism case against a fellow student, Sami Omar Al-Hussayen.

A jury acquitted Al-Hussayen of using his computer skills to foster terrorism and of three immigration violations in an eight-week federal trial. It deadlocked on eight other immigration charges, and Al-Hussayen — who was only months from finishing his doctorate study at the University of Idaho — was eventually deported to Saudi Arabia.

Al-Kidd was never actually called to testify in the case. But three weeks after Al-Hussayen was arrested, al-Kidd was arrested at Dulles International Airport in Washington, D.C. as a material witness in the Al-Hussayen case. Al-Kidd had planned to board a flight to Saudi Arabia to begin studying Islam on a four-year scholarship. But federal prosecutors maintained that al-Kidd had testimony that was crucial to their case against Al-Hussayen, and said they feared if al-Kidd was allowed to leave the country he would not return for the trial.

Al-Kidd spent two weeks in jail before he was granted a detention hearing in Idaho, at which the judge agreed to release him into the custody of his wife. But al-Kidd was prohibited from traveling anywhere but Idaho, Washington, Nevada and California, and his public defenders said the restrictions and the detention not only cost al-Kidd his scholarship in Saudi Arabia but employment opportunities as well.

Al-Kidd sued, alleging that he was falsely imprisoned, and that the government was guilty of abuse of process. He contended that the arrest warrant was invalid because in order to get the arrest warrant, the FBI gave wrong information about al-Kidd to a U.S. magistrate.

Specifically, the FBI allegedly told the judge that al-Kidd had only a one-way ticket to Saudi Arabia, when he had purchased a round-trip ticket. The FBI also allegedly failed to tell the judge that al-Kidd had a wife and children in the United States, that he was a U.S. citizen, that he had talked with the FBI several times before his arrest and that the FBI had never told al-Kidd that he should not travel abroad.

Attorneys for the federal government asked the U.S. District Court to dismiss the lawsuit, claiming that the arrest warrant and subsequent jailing had been proper under the law.

But Lodge disagreed, saying that al-Kidd's claims are sufficient to move the lawsuit forward.

Neither the attorneys representing the federal government nor the attorneys representing al-Kidd could be immediately reached by The Associated Press.

Judge Dismisses Medicaid Law Challenge (AP-Y)

By Kevin Freking

AP, September 20, 2006

A federal judge has dismissed a challenge to a law that requires millions of Medicaid beneficiaries to prove their citizenship before obtaining health benefits.

Congress passed legislation earlier this year designed to ensure that only citizens or qualified legal immigrants gain access to Medicaid, which is the state-federal health insurance program for the poor. More than 50 million people get health care through the program.

Several beneficiaries contended in a lawsuit that the new documentation requirements would endanger their health care benefits. However, that contention was nothing more than conjecture, said U.S. District Judge Ronald A. Guzman of the Northern District of Illinois.

Guzman's 21-page ruling was made public Tuesday. He did not rule on the validity of the law. Instead, he said that the plaintiffs made clear in their complaint that they were challenging the regulations that the Department of Health and Human Services issued concerning implementation of the law.

But the contested regulations do not create the documentation requirements. They simply flesh them out, the judge noted.

"Absent a showing that their injuries can be traced to the regulations, which they have not made, plaintiffs do not have standing to pursue these claims," Guzman wrote.

Lawyers who are pursuing the case on behalf of Medicaid beneficiaries said they did get a partial victory in the case when the judge said he was likely to issue an injunction that would prevent 500,000 foster children from being subject to the documentation regulations.

"He said there is a strong likelihood of success on the merits for the foster children," said John Mark Bouman, a lawyer at the Sargent Shriver National Center on Poverty Law in Chicago. "If he had also found they were about to be injured tomorrow, he would have entered an injunction. He just wasn't convinced of that part yet."

Bouman also said that one way or another the plaintiffs will pursue the case and ask the judge to rule on the validity of the statute. He described it as an interim ruling saying that children on foster care are likely to win, but with everyone else, there are procedural hurdles to overcome.

In all, 15 people were listed as plaintiffs. Families USA, an advocacy group in Washington, helped organize the lawsuit. Ron Pollack, the organization's executive director, said the documentation requirements are most harmful to victims of natural disasters, the homeless and people with mental and physical disabilities who will have trouble accessing documents such as a passport or birth certificate.

"For many people, this documentation requirement is going to prove to be extraordinaily onerous and many people will be unable to fulfill this requirement," Pollack said.

However, about 8 million Medicaid beneficiaries are also exempted from the documentation requirements, namely elderly and disabled people so poor they qualify for both Medicare and Medicaid, as well as those aged and disabled people who get cash to meet basic needs through Supplemental Security Income.

Congress said that, beginning July 1, documents will be needed to prove identity and citizenship.

Regulations issued by the Department of Health and Human Services say a passport would meet both criteria. A birth certificate would serve as evidence of citizenship, but a second document would be needed to prove identity. In rare cases, sworn affidavits from two citizens can be accepted, but at least one of the two cannot be related to the applicant.

Judge Applies New Bankruptcy Law As Written To Possible Detriment Of Creditors (LAW)

DOJ_NMG_0066146

By John Caher, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, September 20, 2006

A Northern District of New York bankruptcy judge has refused to bail out Congress for an apparent drafting glitch in the new bankruptcy law that frequently results in creditors getting less under the "reform" measure than they got under the old version -- even though the clear intent of lawmakers and the president was to aid creditors.

Chief Bankruptcy Judge Stephen D. Gerling in In re Rotunda, 06-60054, broke with the majority of his colleagues who have considered the same issue and said that if Congress is determined to replace judicial discretion with formulaic mandates, it can deal with the seemingly absurd results.

"To allow a debtor with income above the state median to provide for zero payments to unsecured creditors in a chapter 13 plan ... when ... there remains sufficient funds to pay even a minimal dividend to them is contrary to the approach taken by this Court for over 20 years in considering chapter 13 plans," wrote Gerling of Utica. "Yet ... it is not for the Court to second guess Congress despite the fact that the statute, as written, may result in a confirmed plan that is contrary to the view expressed by President Bush."

Gerling's decision is rooted in the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005.

The bill, which took effect last October, was drafted largely by credit industry lobbyists and was designed to prevent debtors from taking what the creditors viewed as unfair advantage of the bankruptcy law.

Many of its provisions were directed at people with income, and premised on the contention that debtors with the means to do so should repay their financial obligations to the extent possible. In signing the measure, President Bush said that under it, "Americans who have the ability to pay will be required to pay back at least a portion of their debts."

Now, however, instead of using actual expenses and income to determine how much a Chapter 13 debtor can afford to pay back, the law requires an examination based on the standards the Internal Revenue Service uses to decide how much delinquent taxpayers can commit to a repayment plan. Those standards permit allowances for food, housing, rent and other necessities, based on median values.

While the standards are unrealistically low in some areas -- meaning that it really costs consumers more for basic living expenses than the law recognizes -- they are unrealistically high in other regions, such as economically hard-pressed upstate New York, where living costs are less than the median, observers say.

In those areas, since the allowance is based not on actual expenses but medians, a strict application of the law enables debtors to deduct more than their actual living expenses. So, money that in the past would have gone toward repaying debts is in some cases now beyond the reach of creditors. No longer does all of the debtor's disposable income necessarily go to the repayment plan.

The question Gerling addressed in Rotunda, and several other judges have addressed in other cases, is how to go about determining the debtor's disposable income.

Court records show that Elizabeth and Lawrence D. Rotunda had an annual income of about $68,000, well above the median income for a two-person family in New York. Consequently, their capacity to repay was governed by a rigid "means test."

Before the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act, the calculus of how much a Chapter 13 debtor had to pay was measured by his or her "projected disposable income." Under the old law this was simply the income the debtor listed on the bankruptcy petition minus the expenses. Whatever was left over went toward debt repayment.

The new law does not define "projected disposable income," but it does redefine "disposable income" as current monthly income less certain expense allowances. And under the new definition, Social Security income, like that received by the Rotundas, is excluded from the definition of current monthly income.

Here, the debtors argued that only their "disposable income" -- which excludes their Social Security -- should be included in their repayment plan. The Chapter 13 trustee objected to the plan that would allow the Rotundas to initially pay $800 a month rather than about $2,000 per month, arguing that it fails to make all of their "projected disposable income" available to unsecured creditors.

CONGRESSIONAL INTENT

In his brief, Chapter 13 Trustee Mark W. Swimelar of Syracuse acknowledged that "many parts of [the new bankruptcy law] are confusing and will spawn a tremendous amount of litigation," adding that the issue before Gerling represents "one of those situations where the statute is not totally clear." Still, he argued that a contextual reading of the entire statute leaves "no doubt that Congress intended to retain the projected disposable income test for confirmation of Chapter 13 plans."

The debtors' attorney, Peter A. Orville of Binghamton, N.Y., said the court should rely on what Congress said and did not say, rather than what it may have meant or hoped to achieve.

Gerling's court is one of several across the nation where attorneys have been debating whether the term "projected disposable income" under 11 U.S.C. §1325(b)(1)(B) has meaning distinct from the term "disposable income" as defined in 11 U.S.C. §1325(b)(2). Their decisions are split, with the bulk of them distinguishing between "projected disposable" and "disposable" to the benefit of creditors.

But in at least one of those cases cited by Orville and Gerling (see In re Barr, 341 B.R. 181 [Bankr. M.D.N.C. 2006]), a Chapter 13 plan was confirmed where the debtor proposed paying nothing at all to her unsecured creditors.

"The idea that a debtor may successfully confirm a chapter 13 plan without having to make any payments to unsecured creditors, despite having what appears to be surplus income ... understandably does not set well with the chapter 13 trustees and the courts," Gerling observed.

Yet, he said that with the new bankruptcy law "the court's discretion to review the totality of the circumstances and determine the reasonableness of a debtor's expenses in calculating disposable income has been curtailed, in some instances, by the new provisions that allow, whether or not intentionally, a debtor to propose a plan which provides zero payments to unsecured creditors despite having the financial wherewithal to make some payments to them."

He continued, "If this was not Congress' intent, then it is up to Congress to rectify the situation."

Orville said that a number of peculiar provisions and apparent contradictions in the new law often work to the detriment of creditors, even though lawmakers and the president were clearly attempting to help creditors with the new law.

"Actually, the unsecured creditors got the shaft," Orville said. "They are getting significantly less than they would have before. The legislation was written by bank lobbyists who wanted to make it harder to file bankruptcy. They certainly made it more expensive and more of a hassle, but the key is bankruptcy is alive and well and many people do better under the new law, and creditors do worse. The law doesn't necessarily do what the proponents said it would do."

Appearing on behalf of the trustee was staff attorney Lynn Harper Wilson. She was not immediately available for comment.

RULING ON TITHES

Coincidentally, on Friday three prominent U.S. senators who had strongly backed bankruptcy reform issued a letter criticizing a recent decision of the other Northern District bankruptcy judge, Robert E. Littlefield Jr. of Albany, N.Y. Like Gerling, Littlefield stuck with what Congress wrote in the statute even though those words may have produced an unintended result.

In In re Diagostino, 06-10384, Littlefield found that the new rules do not permit debtors to include religious tithes as a necessary expense, a major departure from prior practice. Consequently, the court found, money that previously would have been safeguarded for churches and other charities is now fair game for credit card companies. That ruling did not please religious conservatives who had spearheaded bankruptcy reform.

On Friday, Sens. Orrin G. Hatch, R-Utah, Charles E. Grassley, R-Iowa, and Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., wrote to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, complaining that Diagostino "was wrongly decided and runs counter to Congressional intent." They urged Gonzales to direct Chapter 13 trustees that they are not to go after legitimate tithes.

Legal Battle With Ex-Aviano Base Employee Continues (S&S)

By Sandra Jontz, Stars and Stripes

Stars & Stripes, September 20, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department filed a legal brief with an Italian judge seeking immunity from having to pay a former Aviano Air Base employee, continuing the legal saga that put seized Army and Air Force Exchange Service merchandise in an auction limbo.

A hearing is scheduled for Nov. 8 in the Civil Court of Pordenone. It was scheduled after the U.S. Justice Department filed a brief maintaining the U.S. government already fulfilled its financial and contractual obligations to Mauro Martin when it paid off his bank debt after Martin was laid off 15 years ago, according to the brief.

Martin, an Italian, worked at Aviano as a bus driver and motor pool dispatcher from 1975 to 1991. According to his lawyer, Roberto Russi, the U.S. government violated Italian law regarding money it owed Martin when he was laid off in 1991.

In suits filed against the U.S. government, Martin alleged the U.S. illegally paid off his debts to a creditor, Banca Carimonte, instead of giving him the money. Three Italian court decisions — including the Supreme Court of Cassation in Rome — supported Martin's position. Italian courts sanctioned an auction of merchandise seized from AAFES in order to settle Martin's 22,000-euro claim.

"Such a situation has created notable problems for the American administration, which must repay Martin an amount that, in fact, has already been paid," reads a portion of the 23-page brief, filed in mid-August.

In its brief, the U.S. government argues that the military — and by extension the AAFES goods — are immune from such an action because the products "are in fulfillment of a public function," the brief states.

"We will argue that barbecues, women's bras, perfumes, and makeup, how do those serve a function of the state," Rossi said in a phone interview Tuesday.

Civil Rights:

Police Officer In NC Charged With Civil Rights Violation (CO)

The Charlotte Observer, September 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, N.C. - An officer in the Washington Police Department has been charged with violating the civil rights of Hispanics by taking money from them during traffic stops.

DOJ_NMG_0066148

Officer Steven Ray Hilsinger, 32, was charged in federal court on a criminal complaint that says there's "probable cause to believe that he targeted Hispanics for the purpose of robbing them of money," the Beaufort County Sheriff's Office said.

Hilsinger was arrested Monday night by the Beaufort County Sheriff's Office drug enforcement unit and the Federal Bureau of Investigation. He was charged with a misdemeanor count of depriving a person of constitutional rights on the basis of color, race or national origin.

He appeared before a federal magistrate in Raleigh on Tuesday and was released pending court action

"He would obtain custody of the wallet during the stop ... grab bills and then conceal them," said Capt. Tim McLawhorn with the narcotics unit.

His arrest is part of an eight-month investigation, Sheriff Alan Jordan said.

After receiving complaints, the sheriff's office and the FBI conducted sting operations in which an undercover agent posing as a Hispanic person drove a car through the city of Washington.

Investigators said Hilsinger stopped the undercover agent more than once, removing money from the agent's wallet, searching the car and then issuing either a warning ticket or a citation. He was arrested while on duty following a traffic stop of the undercover agent.

Lt. William Chrismon with the Washington Police Department said the department was unaware of the investigation of Hilsinger until he was arrested. A decision has not been made as to whether Hilsinger, who had been with the department for a year, would be fired.

In 2004, three Mount Olive police officers were charged with common law robbery in 2004 after taking money from Hispanic drivers in circumstances similar to those alleged in Washington. Two received suspended prison terms, and one was sentenced to 75 days.

Officer Cited In Stops Of Hispanics (RN&O)

Sting leads to officer's arrest

WASHINGTON, N.C. - Another Eastern North Carolina police officer has been charged with stealing money from Hispanic drivers during traffic stops.

Steven Ray Hilsinger, 32, a patrol officer in the town of Washington for a year, was arrested Monday and charged with a federal civil rights violation after a Hispanic investigator working undercover was stopped and had money taken from his wallet. Hilsinger appeared before a federal magistrate in Raleigh on Tuesday and was released pending court action.

Hilsinger was charged with a misdemeanor count of depriving a person of constitutional rights on the basis of color, race or national origin. If convicted, he faces a maximum of one year in prison and up to $100,000 in fines.

Hilsinger is the fourth Eastern North Carolina police officer accused of stealing from Hispanic drivers in recent years. Three Mount Olive police officers were charged with common law robbery in 2004 after taking money from Hispanic drivers in similar circumstances. Those officers, who were also arrested after an undercover operation, were accused of taking amounts ranging from $100 to $600. Two received suspended prison terms, and one was sentenced to 75 days.

Capt. Tim McLawhorn of the Beaufort County Sheriff's Office said an investigation began eight months ago after the department received complaints about Hispanics being targeted unfairly. He said some victims waited months to report the incidents.

In an affidavit, FBI Agent Donald Cowart described the complaints and the undercover investigation that led to Hilsinger's arrest.

Two businessmen reported in December 2005 that a Washington police officer was robbing their employees. In addition, the affidavit said, an investigator interviewed a Hispanic man who said he was stopped for a traffic violation by an officer who asked for identification and took his wallet. When the wallet was returned, the affidavit said, $60 was missing. The victim later identified Hilsinger in photos.

In another incident, a Hispanic man said he was stopped and told he had failed to dim his headlights. The affidavit said that the man provided a Mexican identification card and that the officer took his wallet to look for more identification. Two $20 bills were missing when the wallet was returned, the affidavit said.

Cowart said that on Sept. 8, Hilsinger pulled over an undercover officer who drove over a yellow line. The undercover officer acted as though he did not speak English and provided a valid driver's license. Hilsinger required the driver to fill out a questionnaire, issued a written warning and returned his wallet. A $100 bill and six $20 bills were missing, the affidavit said.

On Monday, the undercover officer carried marked bills and a valid driver's license when he was pulled over by Hilsinger after crossing a yellow line. The affidavit said six $20 bills were taken from the wallet and later recovered when Hilsinger was stopped and arrested.

Washington officials declined to discuss Hilsinger's status with the department on grounds that it was a personnel issue. City Manager James Smith said in a statement that the accusations against Hilsinger, if true, "are an embarrassment to the community, the city and the Washington Police Department."

"Taking advantage of vulnerable community members undermines the trust of the citizenry in the most fundamental way," the statement said.

McLawhorn said that more charges might be filed after further investigation. He said that he hoped publicity would encourage victims who might be wary of government or law enforcement agencies to report incidents.

Suit Questions Voting Act's Use (WT)

By Brian Debose, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 20, 2006

A lawsuit filed by a Texas utility board seeking a "bailout" from the federal Voting Rights Act has raised questions about the fairness of the act in small jurisdictions, and a Supreme Court battle over its constitutionality may ensue.

The Northwest Austin Municipal Utility District No. 1 Board was formed to oversee construction and maintenance of water and sewer services, operate a local park and provide other services by establishing taxes. That made it a government entity in Texas and therefore subject to Section 5 pre-clearance statutes under the Voting Rights Act. Currently, any change to the district -- no matter how minor -- must first be cleared by the Justice Department through a process requiring a constitutional lawyer and costing thousands of dollars.

Board members were hoping that Congress would pass an amendment requiring the Justice Department to notify Section 5 jurisdictions eligible for a bailout provision and pre-approve such areas, but the amendment failed. The group said it had no choice but to seek a bailout via a lawsuit.

"These local issues ought to be decided at the local level," said Greg Coleman, attorney for the 20-year-old utility district who filed the brief. "No one is trying to undermine any issue of the Voting Rights Act."

The utility district has made two changes to its voting habits in the past four years, and both received pre-clearance, Mr. Coleman said. The most recent change was the relocation of its polling site from the personal garage of one of the board members to a local elementary school "across the street."

The Voting Rights Act has a bailout provision that grants any jurisdiction an avenue to free itself if it has obeyed all of the statutes and has not been sued or had a judgment for violations for 10 years.

Edward Blum, a voting rights scholar with the Project on Fair Representation, said these types of issues relating to small jurisdictions are commonplace and exactly the type of overbearing use of Section 5 that he opposes.

"Some legal experts would tell you that such jurisdictions like the Austin municipal [utility district] are eligible for a bailout, and others would say they are not," Mr. Blum said.

Mr. Blum, who testified before the House Judiciary subcommittee on the Constitution in a hearing last year, said politics, not the law, often rules in such cases, but particularly in this one because the jurisdiction was created more than 10 years after Texas qualified for pre-clearance.

"Most of the people involved were either not born, were children or not living in the state when this statute was passed," he said.

The Justice Department declined to comment on the case.

Rep. Robert C. Scott, Virginia Democrat and a member of the Constitution subcommittee said, "Southern jurisdictions like Texas came under pre-clearance the old fashioned way -- they earned it."

State Judge Voids Georgia Law Requiring A Photo ID Of Voters (NYT)

By Brenda Goodman

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

ATLANTA, Sept. 19 — A state judge ruled Tuesday that a Georgia law requiring voters to present government-issued photo identification violates the State Constitution and could not be enforced.

In issuing a permanent injunction against the latest version of the Voter ID Act, the judge, T. Jackson Bedford Jr. of Fulton County Superior Court, said legislators overstepped their authority when they imposed a condition on the right to vote by requiring a photo ID.

“Nowhere in the Constitution is the legislature authorized to deny a registered voter the right to vote on any other ground, including a possession of a photo ID,” he wrote.

Judge Bedford wrote he was particularly troubled by a provision in the law that allows a registered voter without an approved photo ID to cast a ballot on Election Day but says that vote would not be counted unless the voter returned with an ID within two days.

“The result of this provisional-ballot scheme,” he wrote, “is to disenfranchise an otherwise qualified voter who does not comply with the additional conditions imposed by the legislature.”

Judge Bedford’s ruling was a significant setback for the Republican-led effort to enforce a photo ID requirement at the polls in Georgia. A spokesman for Thurbert E. Baker, the state attorney general, said the state was already drafting an appeal and would file it to the Georgia Supreme Court as soon as possible.

In October, a federal judge blocked an earlier version of the law, which would have required registered voters who lacked an acceptable photo ID to pay to have one made.

Legislators quickly rewrote the measure to make the ID cards free. Supporters of the law say the cards are necessary to prevent voter fraud.

The Voter ID Act was signed by Gov. Sonny Perdue, a Republican, in January, but because of court challenges, it has only been enforced once, during a special election in Twiggs County on Sept. 12. A spokesman for Mr. Perdue said most Georgians believed that the law was a common-sense measure.

Some Republicans in the legislature spoke out against the ruling.

"Yet again, an activist judge is thwarting the will of a majority of Georgia citizens and their elected officials," Speaker Glenn Richardson said.

The suit challenging the ID requirement was filed in state court by former Gov. Roy E. Barnes, a Democrat, on behalf of a two registered voters who said they lacked the kind of photo ID's required by the law.

Opponents say the law is a partisan effort to disenfranchise the poor, the elderly and minorities, all of which have historically been more likely to vote Democratic.

"This is really a vote-suppression measure," said Daniel Tokaji, an assistant professor at Ohio State University and an expert on election law.

"There's very little evidence for the proposition that people are going to the polling place and pretending to be someone else." Mr. Tokaji said.

Kathy A. Rogers, director of elections in the Georgia secretary of state's office, said her office had never investigated any cases of a person trying to pose as someone else at the polls. Judge Bedford noted that he had heard from one witness who testified she had personal knowledge of only one case of voter fraud in her 26 years as an employee for the Fulton County Board of Elections.

Georgia Law Requiring Voters To Show Photo ID Is Thrown Out (WP)

By Darryl Fears And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, September 20, 2006

A state judge yesterday rejected a Georgia law requiring voters to show government-issued photo identification, writing in his decision, "This cannot be."

Fulton County Superior Court Judge T. Jackson Bedford Jr. said the law, pushed by Gov. Sonny Perdue (R) to fight voter fraud, violates the state constitution because it disenfranchises citizens who are otherwise qualified to vote.

State officials vowed to appeal Bedford's ruling to the Georgia Supreme Court before the Nov. 7 general election.

The timing of the judge's decision could have political ramifications in Washington. The House is set today to vote on legislation that would require voters in 2008 to present a valid photo identification that "could not have been obtained without proof of citizenship."

The bill is part of a package of measures designed to demonstrate a new get-tough attitude on illegal immigration and border security.

"There have been enough reports over the years of voter fraud that it is time to have a picture ID to ensure the integrity of our voting process," House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) said yesterday.

Like the Georgia law, the federal legislation would almost certainly be challenged in court. A coalition of interest and civil rights groups, including the NAACP, AARP, and the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund, denounced the bill yesterday, saying it would disenfranchise hundreds of thousands of minority and elderly voters.

Georgia's law was challenged by Rosalind Lake, an elderly black woman who was left partially blind after being nearly electrocuted in her home, is unable to drive and could not easily obtain a voter ID, her attorney said.

The lawyer, former governor Roy Barnes, argued that even though the state offered to deliver an ID to Lake's home, it could not do the same for everyone who is similarly challenged.

"We have a low voter participation," said Barnes, a Democrat. "We're going to make it more difficult?"

In previous elections, Georgians could present any one of 17 types of identification with their names and addresses, including a driver's license, utility bill, bank statement or paycheck.

Perdue and other proponents of the law said it is needed to curtail fraud. They cited an Atlanta Journal-Constitution article that said 5,000 dead people were listed as having voted in the eight elections preceding 2000.

But the fraud happened primarily in absentee balloting, Barnes said. Under the new law, absentee voters are not required to show identification.

"This is the most sinister scheme I've ever seen," Barnes said, "and it's going on nationwide."

Bedford's ruling was the latest in a string of court decisions against the Georgia law. Last year, U.S. District Judge Harold L. Murphy issued an injunction against the law, likening it to a segregation-era poll tax because the digital picture ID would cost voters $20.

After the Georgia General Assembly revised the law to issue the ID at no cost, Murphy refused to completely lift the injunction, saying the state did not have time to properly educate voters before July primaries.

In his ruling, Bedford said the law places too much of a burden on voters, regardless of certain state remedies. Voters could cast ballots without identification, but they would have to return to an elections office within two days to prove their identity or forfeit their vote.

"Any attempt by the legislature to require more than what is required by the express language of our Constitution cannot withstand judicial scrutiny," Bedford said.

Russ Willard, a spokesman for the state attorney general's office, said: "The state has already begun working on its appeal. We plan to file an appeal as soon as possible."

Judge Throws Out Ga. Photo-voter ID Law (AP-Y)

By Errin Haines

AP, September 19, 2006

A judge Tuesday struck down as unconstitutional the latest version of a new Georgia law requiring voters to show photo ID.

State Superior Court Judge T. Jackson Bedford Jr. ruled that the photo ID requirement deprives otherwise qualified voters of the right to cast a ballot and adds a new, unconstitutional condition to voting.

"Any attempt by the Legislature to require more than what is required by the express language of our Constitution cannot withstand judicial scrutiny," he wrote.

The judge took issue with the burden placed on voters to prove their identity using photo ID. Even if voters are allowed to cast ballots without the required identification, they must return within 48 hours with photo IDs or their vote is forfeited.

Bedford noted that a photo ID is not required to register to vote in Georgia.

The case is expected to go to the Georgia Supreme Court before the Nov. 7 general election.

Russ Willard, a spokesman for the state attorney general's office, said it would appeal "as quickly as possible."

Supporters of the photo ID law, including Republican Gov. Sonny Perdue, have said it is needed to protect against voter fraud. Opponents argue it disenfranchises poor, elderly and minority voters who are less likely to have a driver's license or other valid government-issued photo ID.

Former Democratic Gov. Roy Barnes challenged the law in the state case on a voter's behalf. Several civil rights groups filed a similar lawsuit in federal court.

"Judge Bedford obviously understood that at the end of the day, you don't play politics with the most fundamental right — the right to vote," said Jennifer Jordan, co-counsel with Barnes on the case. "The right to vote is actually the one thing that makes us all equal."

The new law took effect July 1, but its enforcement was blocked by state and federal judges during the state's July primaries and August runoffs.

Last October, federal Judge Harold Murphy struck down an earlier version of the law, saying it amounted to an unconstitutional poll tax.

The Georgia Legislature addressed his complaints in the latest version of the law, but when Murphy issued an injunction before the July primaries, he said the state had not taken enough time to educate voters.

Because the Department of Justice did not approve the photo ID requirement until late June, the state's election board had only three weeks to educate voters before the primaries — a window that was too short, Murphy said.

Nationwide, 24 states have legislation requiring voters to show some form of identification. Seven states, including Georgia, have passed legislation requiring voters to show a photo ID at the polls.

The issue heads to Congress on Wednesday, when the House takes up debate on legislation that would require all voters to show government-issued photo ID proving their citizenship.

Florida Redux? (RC)

Roll Call, September 20, 2006

Six years after the “hanging chad” presidential election debacle in Florida and four years after Congress passed legislation designed to prevent such disasters from happening again, alarms are once again being raised that these pivotal Congressional elections could be beset by chaos at the polls.

On Thursday, USA Today carried a front-page story headlined “Election glitches ‘could get ugly’” with the subhead “New voting equipment, lack of training feed fears.” And on Sunday, The Washington Post’s main headline declared “Major Problems At Polls Feared,” and the subhead read, “Some Officials Say Voting Law Changes And New Technology Will Cause Trouble.”

Let’s hope these warnings prove to be as overblown as the millennium Y2K panic, when it was feared that all the computers in the world would malfunction on Jan. 1, 2000, because of mis-set date codes. Industries spent billions in advance to adjust their computers and ward off the danger. Similarly, Congress has appropriated $3 billion to help states and localities buy electronic voting machines to avoid a repetition of Florida 2000, when voting snafus left the presidential election result in dispute.

Now, it’s control of Congress that hangs in the balance, and the worry is that despite (or worse, because of) provisions of the 2002 Help America Vote Act, Florida-style confusion may reign all over the country. As USA Today summarized, “problems range from delayed delivery of new equipment to an insufficient supply of trained technicians to fix anticipated problems.” It noted that glitches have occurred this year in primary elections in Arkansas, California, Florida, Illinois, Indiana, Maryland, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Texas and West Virginia.

HAVA mandated new voting technology, updated statewide voter registries, provisional ballots for those not on voter lists and identification requirements for certain new registrants. Most of its provisions take effect this year. Unfortunately, as a Congressional Research Service study reported, Congress authorized $600 million to help states meet its requirements, then failed to provide the funding in fiscal 2005 or 2006.

The CRS added that, according to the Election Assistance Commission, national elections require about 2 million poll workers nationwide. Most tend to be retirees — with an average age of 72 — and they often have to be on duty for 14 hours. They needed substantial training to be ready for the new equipment and rules mandated by HAVA. They didn't get it.

Ever since 2003, Rep. Rush Holt (D-N.J.) has offered legislation to require that electronic machines be equipped with a backup paper trail to make it possible to resolve disputes. His bill, now boasting 212 co-sponsors, will not receive its first hearing in the House Administration Committee until Sept. 28 — just days before Congress is ready to adjourn and 38 days before the elections. There's no way around it: If Nov. 7 is a mess, Congress will be to blame.

Missing: A Black Voice For Economic Equality (USAT)

By Juan Williams

USA Today, September 20, 2006

The most frequently asked question about black leadership in America today is: Where is the next Martin Luther King Jr.?

In one sense, the question is misguided. Increased integration has created options for black leaders that did not exist a generation ago. Think of Colin Powell and Condoleezza Rice as secretaries of State, Stan O'Neal as chief executive and president of Merrill Lynch, Richard Parsons as head of Time Warner and Ken Williams as general manager of the baseball champion Chicago White Sox.

The list goes on.

But the continuing focus on the next King is not really about a shortage of black people in leadership positions. It's about who is at the forefront of the ongoing fight for racial equality in the nation. Who is taking leadership on difficult questions, such as how to respond to the disproportionate poverty among black and Hispanic Americans? Who is pushing to get answers to the high rate of out-of-wedlock births among blacks, now at nearly 70%? And who is dealing with shocking dropout rates for young black and Hispanic high school students, now approximately 50%, as well as the awful achievement gap for students of color who do stay in high school?

At the start of the 21st century, helping poor people of color to get through the doors of opportunity is the best indicator of racial progress. The major civil rights groups — the NAACP and National Urban League — have good people offering a range of programs from job training to health screenings. But on the issue of black America remaining competitive in a global economy moving away from blue-collar jobs, there is a leadership void.

The good news is that previous generations of successful black leaders offered a template for this era. Black leaders of every political ideology forcefully delivered a message centered on self-help — of taking control of one's fate — as black people struggled against slavery and then legal segregation, as well as crippling stereotypes.

Frederick Douglass wrote an editorial, "Learn Trades or Starve," to spur former slaves to keep pace with the economic changes of the late 19th century. Douglass also persuaded black men to enlist with the Union to fight the Confederacy and then argued that blood shed by blacks in uniform had earned them the right to full participation in U.S. politics and economics.

But since the 1954 Brown v. Board of Education decision banning racial segregation and the civil rights victories of the '60s, the focus of activism has shifted to government action. The message of individual empowerment has been replaced by appeals to white guilt based on a culture of victimization.

In 2004, on the 50th anniversary of the Brown decision, entertainer Bill Cosby gave a speech in which he praised the civil rights pioneers who fought to remove racial barriers, but he said too many of those newly opened doors were not being used. He pointed to children born in poverty, sky-high rates of black people in jail and the acceptance of crime in the black community. He bluntly told the audience: "Ladies and gentlemen, the lower economic people are not holding up their end in this deal."

Cosby said many of the problems facing black America today have less to do with white racism than with internal failures, such as poor parenting. In return for speaking out, he was accused of blaming the victim, letting whites off the hook for "systemic racism" and airing black America's "dirty laundry."

Undeterred, Cosby responded a few weeks later. He said too many black leaders "want you to remain in a hole and they rejoice in your hopelessness because they have jobs mismanaging you."

Black American leadership has been so successful at overcoming cultural, political and racial opposition that it created the model for modern social movements, inspiring democratic activists in China's Tiananmen Square and the leaders of Poland's Solidarity party. The reason so many across racial and ideological lines ask about the next Dr. King is they want to know how to achieve a real revolution that will lift up the disproportionate share of minorities trapped at the bottom.

In the 21st century, black leaders must inspire people by urging them to get the highest level degree possible to keep pace in the rough-and-tumble global economy. Leaders must tell young people that even if they are in the worst school imaginable, they must not drop out; that they shouldn't have children unless they are married; that they should work to avoid drifting into crime and the living hell of the prison system. Leaders must encourage people to take any job to avoid falling out of the workforce.

More than 100 years after Booker T. Washington and W.E.B. DuBois agreed that self-help to educate children and economic power were necessary to bring blacks into the American mainstream, there is still a hunger to find the next leader to deliver that message.

Grassley Voices 'strong Reservations' Over Pork Merger (DMR)

Des Moines Register, September 20, 2006

Washington, D.C. – Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Ia., is asking the Justice Department to take a close look at the proposed merger of the nation's two largest hog producers, Smithfield Foods and Premium Standard Farms.

In a letter Tuesday to the department's antitrust division, Grassley said the merger would hurt independent farmers by severely reducing the number of places they can sell their hogs.

"I have strong reservations about this proposal and the continued trend in concentration in the pork industry and, as such, I urge the Department of Justice to carefully scrutinize this transaction," Grassley wrote.

Sen. Tom Harkin, D-Ia., also has called on the department to review the deal.

The department could seek to block the merger on antitrust grounds or require the companies to sell some of their operations.

But Dennis Treacy, Smithfield vice president of environmental, community and government affairs, has said the company is confident that the department will clear the merger.

Premium Standard has pork plants in Missouri, Texas and North Carolina with the annual capacity of slaughtering 4.6 million hogs.

Smithfield has no operations in Iowa, but it owns Farmland Foods and John Morrell, which have Iowa slaughtering plants.

Rivals Skirmish With Microsoft Over Vista Security (CNET)

By Joris Evers, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, September 20, 2006

Competitors say they should be able replace a Windows feature that tells people about the security status of their PC.

Microsoft and its security rivals are feuding over a key piece of Windows Vista real estate.

The fight is over the display of technology that helps Vista owners manage the security tools on their PC. Symantec, McAfee, Check Point Software Technologies and other companies want Microsoft to change Vista so their products can easily replace the operating system's built-in Windows Security Center on the desktop. But Microsoft is resisting the call.

"By imposing the Windows Security Center on all Windows users, Microsoft is defining a template through which everybody looks at security," Bruce McCorkendale, a chief engineer at Symantec, said in an interview. "How do we trust that Microsoft knows what all the important things about security are to warn users about?"

Windows Security Center, introduced with Windows XP Service Pack 2, pops up on desktops to alert PC owners if their firewall, virus protection and other security tools need attention. The version in the Vista update, set for broad release in January, will add new categories and management tools.

It is possible to run third-party security consoles in Vista, said Stephen Toulouse, a program manager in Microsoft's Security Technology Unit. However, people have to manually disable the Windows Security Center if they don't want to use it. And the software giant has no plans to give other companies the ability to turn off the Windows Security Center, Toulouse noted.

"Our main concern is to provide customers with a fall-back option if there is no other security center running," he said.

If the differences aren't worked out, it could spell annoyance for consumers, the rival security companies say. People who choose to use Microsoft's console alone will get a limited view of their Vista PC protection, they suggest. Those who buy competing software will have to run it alongside Microsoft's dashboard, which could report conflicting information. Rivals have charged that the Redmond, Wash.-based software giant is hurting consumers, raising the specter of more antitrust complaints for Microsoft.

"Microsoft's Windows Security Center demonstrates fairly limited sophistication, and having (it) control the console could take away the consumer's visibility into the threats he faces," said Siobhan MacDermott, a spokeswoman for McAfee. "Ultimately, it's something the consumer should decide, not Microsoft."

Jostling for position

Tensions are flying high in the security space after Microsoft, with its $34 billion war chest, entered the market. It launched Windows Live OneCare for consumers and is readying enterprise security products. With its huge presence on desktops, the software giant has a built-in advantage--one that is making other security companies nervous. European antitrust regulators are closely watching Microsoft.

Security companies have already fought several battles over Vista similar to the one about Windows Security Center. Some they won. Most recently, Microsoft added the ability for third-party products to turn off Windows Defender spyware protection in Vista, rather than requiring the PC user to do it. Earlier, it provided the same functionality for the Windows Firewall. In both cases, Microsoft has asked security companies to re-enable the Windows defenses if their products are removed from a PC.

A dispute still exists over "PatchGuard," a security feature that Microsoft says is designed to guard core parts of the 64-bit version of Vista, but which critics say locks out helpful software from security rivals.

And then there is Windows Security Center, which sits in the Windows Control Panel and pops up any time there is a security alert, such as when antivirus protection is disabled or the firewall is turned off. Microsoft is beefing up the console in the successor to XP, and refers to it as the "voice of security for Windows Vista."

In Vista, the security dashboard will add reports on spyware protection, Internet security settings, and Windows security technology called "User Account Control."

Another change in Vista is that Windows Security Center will be used to manage the security software, in addition to reporting on it. For example, a PC user could update antivirus definitions or disable a firewall directly from the Windows Security Center, according to a recently published Microsoft document on the feature.

This could give rivals the opportunity to change tack and focus on developing products that plug into Microsoft's security dashboard, rather than continuing to produce their own, Toulouse suggested. "They might not need to have their own security center anymore," he said. "It is our hope that they build products that connect into Windows Security Center."

Microsoft agreed that multiple security consoles on a single PC could confuse users, especially different information is displayed, but said that this is an argument in favor of funneling all security software management via the Windows Security Center.

"It is a fundamental lack of clarity for the user," Toulouse said. Microsoft's dashboard is "neutral" and "vendor agnostic," Toulouse added.

But Symantec and Check Point chuckle at the notion that Microsoft is neutral. For example, both companies doubt it is a coincidence that the company added an anti-spyware category to the Windows Security Center only after it introduced Windows Defender, an anti-spyware tool that will ship as part of Vista.

"Who is Microsoft to define the right way to think about security?" asked Laura Yecies, general manager of Check Point's ZoneAlarm division. "Microsoft does not have the track record or expertise in this space. They have not earned it."

Best view

McCorkendale said Symantec's own security center will give its customers the best view of the status of Symantec products, so people should have the option to use the Symantec dashboard instead of Microsoft's. "Customers should be allowed to choose their security product suites and therefore the security console to go with them," he said.

Symantec's console is called the "Norton Protection Center," and Check Point has a management console in ZoneAlarm Internet Security Suite. McAfee, one of the top players in the consumer security space, also has a security console. Trend Micro and CA declined to comment.

Michael Cherry, an analyst at Directions on Microsoft, also questioned the software maker's neutrality when it comes to Windows Security Center, wondering whether Microsoft's developers would respond quicker to a request from the OneCare team then to Symantec's Norton AntiVirus team.

"I am not comfortable yet that that information is being shared equally and that all partners are equal partners," Cherry said. "It is only neutral when they can prove that OneCare, or Windows Firewall, or Windows Defender does not get a more favorable review or a more favorable access to technology."

There is something to be said for a central point in Windows that has security information, Cherry added. But if a user picks a third-party security suite, that product should be able to turn off Windows Security Center, he said.

"If I choose to use a third party's tools, then I would want to use a security center from them. So I'd be much more comfortable if Microsoft's could be uninstalled in favor of the one I want to use," he said.

Restricted Vista?

Symantec, Check Point and McAfee also argued that Microsoft's Windows Security Center risks giving consumers a limited view of security.

"If we were to just cede the dashboard console view of security to Microsoft, we could only talk to users about firewalls, antivirus and anti-spyware," Symantec's McCorkendale said

Check Point's Yecies said that Microsoft's console looks at security with blinders that are surprisingly convenient to its own product lineup.

"The modules, as Microsoft has currently defined them, are incomplete in an environment of zero-day exploits," she said. "Setting up those terms really limits the view consumers have about what is possible and potentially what they need. It might lead a consumer to think that they are fully protected, when in fact they are far from it."

But Natalie Lambert, an analyst at Forrester Research, argued that Microsoft is helping PC users. "The Windows Security Center is helpful, it really does provide a quick view into security," she said. "Consumers need to have security handed to them on a silver platter."

Vista is the first major update to Windows since Microsoft shipped XP in 2001. Back then, Microsoft was not a player in the security arena, and things went much smoother, McCorkendale said

"It is really hard work and we have had to be very, very persistent and over a very long period of time, which is different from how we used to work with Microsoft before they got into the security space. They have really changed the rules of the game; we used to have a lot more pleasant dialogue," he said.

Ultimately, Symantec hopes all the differences can be resolved nicely, McCorkendale said.

"All our concerns are about consumer choice. Consumer should be allowed to choose their security solution and if they are not allowed to make that choice…you risk a monoculture in security, which reduces innovation and diversity."

ImClone Sets Strategy To Deal With Loss In Erbitux Patent Case (WSJ)

By Marilyn Chase

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

Caught off guard by a federal court's Monday-night decision in the Erbitux patent case, ImClone Systems Inc. said yesterday it has crafted a strategy to deal with a judge's award of the cancer treatment's ownership to Israeli scientists.

"We have three avenues of defense: an appeal, an action for declaratory judgment [invalidating the patent] and the option to seek a license" from Yeda Research & Development Co., the technology-transfer arm of Israel's Weizmann Institute of Science, an ImClone spokesman said, calling this a "fail-safe" strategy.

The market wasn't so sure. The New York biotechnology company's shares staggered and then recovered a bit to close down $1.36, or 4.5%, at $29.16 as of 4 p.m. in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading.

U.S. District Court Judge Naomi Reice Buchwald in New York ruled Monday that three Israeli scientists were the true inventors of a patent covering a use of the monoclonal antibody Erbitux when given in combination with chemotherapy. The drug is approved for advanced colorectal cancer as well as for tumors of the head and neck. ImClone had licensed exclusive rights to the patent from French drug maker Sanofi-Aventis SA, which said it had no comment on the ruling.

"It's a travesty of justice," said analyst Mike King of Rodman & Renshaw, which makes a market in ImClone stock. "It should give anyone working with academics pause. It means anyone who gets their hands on your molecule can make a claim. Maybe that's an oversimplification, but Yeda was a pair of hands. They were taking direction. They were doing the work, not doing something conceptually novel."

Yeda's counsel, Nicholas Groombridge, a partner in New York law firm Weil, Gotshal & Manges LLP, disagreed. "Those were the arguments ImClone made and the court rejected" after thorough analysis in its 140-page opinion, he said.

Moreover, Mr. Groombridge said his clients' win would be good for patients and good for competition. By seeking wider, nonexclusive licensing of the patent, Yeda will encourage other manufacturers whose entry into the market will apply downward pressure on pricing for such cancer treatments.

Dismissing any material adverse impact on near-term operations, ImClone said it will assess its intellectual-property position to determine longer-term impact. ImClone now pays royalties to Sanofi-Aventis "in low single digits" for an exclusive license to the patent -- a rate analysts estimate at about 3% of Erbitux sales. A nonexclusive license from Yeda would fetch a lesser fee, ImClone's spokesman said. ImClone derives royalties on the sale of Erbitux from its partners -- 39% from Bristol-Myers Squibb Co., which sells Erbitux in the U.S., and 9.5% from German drug company Merck KGaA, which sells the drug outside the U.S.

But analysts said the ruling threatens sales and profits on ImClone's only product and adds to challenges already facing the company. ImClone failed to find a suitable buyer after putting itself up for sale this year. Moreover, ImClone faces potential competition from Amgen Inc.'s rival drug Vectibix, which is headed toward approval as soon as late 2006 or early 2007.

Yesterday, a Bristol-Myers spokesman said its share of Erbitux revenue wouldn't be affected by any ImClone royalty payout to Yeda, but conceded a decline in ImClone's market value would erode the value of its 20% stake in the biotech firm. Bristol-Myers shares fell 17 cents to $24.71 as of 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

Merck KGaA prepared for such an outcome. It struck a deal with Yeda "some time ago" to protect Merck's "use of the [Erbitux] patent" and its Erbitux sales, a spokeswoman said yesterday, declining to specify terms.

Nuclear Site Nears End Of Its Conversion To A Park (NYT)

By Christopher Maag

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

FERNALD, Ohio, Sept. 19 — In about two weeks, the final trainload of radioactive waste is to leave the Fernald nuclear site.

The train will carry 5,800 tons of contaminated soil in 60 railcars, just like the 196 trains before it, which have run for seven years to a Utah dump from this scarred, cratered patch of land in the hills of southern Ohio.

DOJ_NMG_0066156

"I never thought I'd live to see this day," said Johnny Reising, who directs activity at the site for the Department of Energy.

This fall, the site will open to the public as a natural, undeveloped park following a 13-year, $4.4-billion cleanup. That is actually a bargain. Experts had originally estimated that cleanup would cost $12 billion and take until 2025.

"I remember touring the site in the 80's and thinking, 'My golly, how are we ever going to clean this up?' " said Graham Mitchell, who oversaw the site for the Ohio Environmental Protection Agency for 21 years until he retired this month.

From the time it opened in 1951 until it closed in 1989, the Feed Materials Production Center in Fernald enriched 500 million pounds of uranium, 67 percent of all the uranium used in the nation's cold war nuclear weapons program.

The center also created 1.5 billion pounds of radioactive waste, Mr. Reising said. It operated in obscurity until 1985, when neighbors discovered that the plant's waste had polluted their air, soil and drinking water.

The neighbors sued, and the resulting news coverage prompted similar revelations at nuclear facilities around the country.

The site originally included a leaky silo filled with highly radioactive uranium sludge. At the time it was the largest concentration of poisonous radon gas in the world, Mr. Reising said. Officials at the Fernald center dumped radioactive waste into pits just 20 yards from a creek that sits directly atop the Great Miami Aquifer, one of the biggest and cleanest aquifers east of the Mississippi, Mr. Mitchell said.

Rainwater carried uranium into the creek, where it sank and contaminated 225 acres, or about 0.062 percent of the aquifer, according to figures on the Web site of the Fernald Citizens Advisory Board, which represented the center's neighbors through the cleanup process.

When the Department of Energy ran out of room to bury waste at the 1,050-acre Fernald site, officials ordered it packed into 100,000 metal drums, which were left outside, exposed to the elements. Accidental releases covered 11 square miles of surrounding farmland in radioactive dust.

"When we first visited the site, I saw workers walking around in short-sleeve shirts, and their arms were covered with radioactive yellowcake," said Lisa Crawford, president of Fresh, a citizen's group that fought for cleanup at Fernald.

The original plan called for moving all the radioactive waste from Fernald to Nevada. Citizens and regulators gradually decided the plan was so expensive that it might never happen. "It took us years to realize how much dirt we were actually talking about," said Jim Bierer, chairman of the citizens board.

In the final compromise, the federal government agreed to move 1.3 million tons of the most contaminated waste to storage sites in Texas, Nevada and Arizona. Citizens agreed to place the rest — 4.7 million tons — in a landfill at Fernald.

Today, the waste site resembles a long, fat worm. Filled with uranium-laced soil, building parts and shreds of clothing, the landfill is 30 feet deep, with another 65 feet above ground, and is three-quarters of a mile long.

The landfill's outer wall of rock, plastic and clay is nine feet thick and sits 30 feet above the aquifer. It is designed to last at least 1,000 years.

At its peak, the cleanup effort employed 2,000 workers, as many people as worked at the center during the height of uranium production, Mr. Reising said.

The Department of Energy spent $216 million on buildings just to clean the site. When the buildings were no longer needed, each one had to be demolished, decontaminated and placed in the landfill. The department also built a pumping system to suck contaminated water out of the aquifer and purify it. That process will continue until the entire aquifer is clean, in about 2023, Mr. Reising said.

When the site opens as a park, the landfill will be off-limits to the public. The remaining 930 acres will include hardwood forest, prairie and wetlands intended to recreate the area's natural environment before European settlers arrived in the early 1800's, Mr. Reising said.

Native bird species not seen in the area for decades, including bobolinks and dickcissels, have been spotted at Fernald, as have endangered species including the Indiana brown bat and Sloan's crayfish. Deer wander the roads, and great blue herons stand motionless in ponds.

Humans have started to return, too. For decades, home values around Fernald stagnated because no one wanted to live near a nuclear waste dump, Mr. Bierer said.

Now two subdivisions are under construction within a mile of Fernald.

"It seemed to take forever," Mr. Bierer said. "Basically we started with a huge environmental disaster and ended up with an environmental asset."

Derailed Train Spills Hazardous Chemical, Hundreds Evacuated In Crawford, Texas (AP)

AP, September 20, 2006

CRAWFORD, Texas — A train derailed and spilled a hazardous liquid Tuesday night, prompting about half the population of Crawford to temporarily evacuate, officials said.

President Bush's ranch is several miles away from the town and was not near the area evacuated. Bush was not at the ranch at the time of the spill.

More than 300 people were told to stay away from their homes for about four hours before they were allowed to return at 10 p.m., said Crawford Police Chief Donnie Tidmore.

DOJ_NMG_0066157

No injuries were reported after the train spilled ethanolamine, said Joe Faust, spokesman for BNSF Railway.

The chemical is a colorless flammable liquid that can irritate the eyes, skin and respiratory system, according to a report on the Occupational Safety and Health Administration Web site.

"We're monitoring the air and the air is clear right now, so we're OK on that front," Tidmore said by phone from the scene.

The cause of the derailment was under investigation.

"One of the train engineers said he saw one of the cars starting to wobble and everything went from there," Tidmore said.

About 700 people live in Crawford, a central Texas city about 15 miles west of Waco.

Dumb As We Wanna Be (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

São Paulo, Brazil

I asked Dr. José Goldemberg, secretary for the environment for São Paulo State and a pioneer of Brazil's ethanol industry, the obvious question: Is the fact that the U.S. has imposed a 54-cents-a-gallon tariff to prevent Americans from importing sugar ethanol from Brazil "just stupid or really stupid."

Thanks to pressure from Midwest farmers and agribusinesses, who want to protect the U.S. corn ethanol industry from competition from Brazilian sugar ethanol, we have imposed a stiff tariff to keep it out. We do this even though Brazilian sugar ethanol provides eight times the energy of the fossil fuel used to make it, while American corn ethanol provides only 1.3 times the energy of the fossil fuel used to make it. We do this even though sugar ethanol reduces greenhouses gases more than corn ethanol. And we do this even though sugar cane ethanol can easily be grown in poor tropical countries in Africa or the Caribbean, and could actually help alleviate their poverty.

Yes, you read all this right. We tax imported sugar ethanol, which could finance our poor friends, but we don't tax imported crude oil, which definitely finances our rich enemies. We'd rather power anti-Americans with our energy purchases than promote antipoverty.

"It's really stupid," answered Dr. Goldemberg.

If I seem upset about this, I am. Development and environmental experts have long searched for environmentally sustainable ways to alleviate rural poverty — especially for people who live in places like Brazil, where there is a constant temptation to log the Amazon. Sure, ecotourism and rain forest soap are nice, but they never really scale. As a result, rural people in Brazil are always tempted go back to logging or farming sensitive areas.

Ethanol from sugar cane could be a scalable, sustainable alternative — if we are smart and get rid of silly tariffs, and if Brazil is smart and starts thinking right now about how to expand its sugar cane biofuel industry without harming the environment.

The good news is that sugar cane doesn't require irrigation and can't grow in much of the Amazon, because it is too wet. So if the Brazilian sugar industry does realize its plan to grow from 15 million to 25 million acres over the next few years, it need not threaten the Amazon.

However, sugar cane farms are located mostly in south-central Brazil, around São Paulo, and along the northeast coast, on land that was carved out of drier areas of the Atlantic rain forest, which has more different species of plants and animals per acre than the Amazon. Less than 7 percent of the total Atlantic rain forest remains — thanks to sugar, coffee, orange plantations and cattle grazing.

I flew in a helicopter over the region near São Paulo, and what I saw was not pretty: mansions being carved from forested hillsides near the city, rivers that have silted because of logging right down to the banks, and wide swaths of forest that have been cleared and will never return.

"It makes you weep," said Gustavo Fonseca, my traveling companion, a Brazilian and the executive vice president of Conservation International. "What I see here is a totally human dominated system in which most of the biodiversity is gone."

As demand for sugar ethanol rises — and that is a good thing for Brazil and the developing world, said Fonseca, "we have to make sure that the expansion is done in a planned way."

Over the past five years, the Amazon has lost 7,700 square miles a year, most of it for cattle grazing, soybean farming and palm oil. A similar expansion for sugar ethanol could destroy the cerrado, the Brazilian savannah, another incredibly species-rich area, and the best place in Brazil to grow more sugar.

A proposal is floating around the Brazilian government for a major expansion of the sugar industry, far beyond even the industry's plans. No wonder environmental activists are holding a conference in Germany this fall about the impact of biofuels. I could see some groups one day calling for an ethanol boycott — à la genetically modified foods — if they feel biofuels are raping the environment.

We have the tools to resolve these conflicts. We can map the lands that need protection for their biodiversity or the environmental benefits they provide rural communities. But sugar farmers, governments and environmentalists need to sit down early — like now — to identify those lands and commit the money needed to protect them. Otherwise, we will have a fight over every acre, and sugar ethanol will never realize its potential. That would be really, really stupid.

Federal Regulators Eye Video Bingo (AP-Y)

By Erica Werner, Associated Press Writer

DOJ_NMG_0066158

AP, September 20, 2006

At some Indian casinos, they're not playing your grandmother's church basement bingo anymore. Now the game is video bingo, played at blinking, whirring consoles virtually indistinguishable from slot machines.

Slots are subject to state approval and limits. Bingo machines aren't.

Concerned that tribes are blurring the line between the two, federal regulators are trying to clarify the difference.

New rules proposed by the National Indian Gaming Commission would slow play at video bingo terminals, mandate more player participation and require screen space to be devoted to a bingo display, making it more clear to customers that they are playing bingo rather than a slot machine.

But the draft rules face angry opposition from Indian tribes. Some rely on video bingo to supplement their state-allowed quota of slot machines, or they use the devices because they can't get state permission to run slots.

"This is serious. This is people's lives at stake here," Marjorie Mejia, chairwoman of Northern California's Lytton Band of Pomo Indians, told gaming commission officials at a daylong public hearing Tuesday. "These proposed regulations are of great concern."

The Lytton Band hasn't won permission from California lawmakers for slot machines. It gets all its revenue from 937 electronic bingo machines. Tribal officials fear such machines would no longer be allowed under the new rules, and the slower machines that would be permitted wouldn't appeal to gamblers.

"It's really termination for my people," Mejia said.

Mejia was one of a series of tribal officials offering emotional testimony against the proposed rules, which come as tribal gambling has exploded into a $22 billion-a-year industry.

Perhaps 20 percent of that revenue comes from video bingo and similar machines, the Indian gaming commission says, the rest from slots and other Nevada-style games. The commission estimates there are some 50,000 video bingo machines at hundreds of Indian casinos around the country.

Video bingo is far less lucrative than slot machines. But since some tribes can't get state permission for slots or are limited to a certain number of such machines, they want to be able to offer the most profitable video bingo they can.

Video bingo games with names like Triple Double Red Hot 7s and Double Diamond Run Bingo are marketed based on their similarity to slot machines.

As with slots, a gambler punches a button to set reels spinning. But tribes say the machines are still fundamentally bingo because they require at least two gamblers to play each other over a linked network.

Slot machines, by contrast, involve a gambler interacting only with a single machine.

But National Indian Gaming Commission Chairman Phil Hogen said that if his agency doesn't act to delineate the difference between video bingo and slots, the two will grow so indistinguishable that states might seek to control bingo.

The Justice Department has also tangled with tribes over whether video bingo is allowed, underscoring the need for more certainty, Hogen said.

"To say that the line is already clear, I so wish that were true. I would have spent the last three years a whole lot different than I did if that were true," Hogen told tribal leaders. "Clarity I continue to think is needed."

The commission's draft rules, open for public comment until Sept. 30, require gamblers to press a bingo machine's buttons more than once, as now can happen. There are seconds-long delays built in, instead of play happening nearly instantaneously. Fifty percent of a machine's screen must be displayed as bingo, and the machine must be clearly labeled as bingo.

"The games that would be permitted under the proposed regulations would be extraordinarily expensive to produce and have little commercial viability" said Charlie Lombardo, vice president of gaming operations with the Seminole Tribe of Florida. The proposal is "very unfair to tribes."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mexico Pledges To Extradite Drug Lords (AP)

By Marjorie Olster, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 20, 2006

President Vicente Fox said Tuesday that Mexico is willing to extradite any drug lord in its custody wanted by the United States.

Fox said Mexico currently has 16 "big leaders" of drug gangs in jail along with 75,000 lower level members of various cartels.

"We are fighting hard and attaining very important results," Fox said of Mexico's fight against drug dealers. He was speaking at a news conference in New York where he was attending the United Nations General Assembly.

The U.S. is believed to have requested the extradition of at least three suspected drug kingpins: Benjamin Arellano Felix of the Arellano Felix smuggling syndicate; Osiel Cardenas, reputed head of the Gulf Cartel; and Hector "El Guero" Palma, a reputed leader of the Sinaloa drug cartel.

"We will extradite all of those who have pending matters with U.S. justice," Fox said.

DOJ_NMG_0066159

It was the first time Mexico's president had made such a sweeping commitment to send wanted drug lords to face charges in the U.S.

Mexico extradited its first major drug lord - accused kingpin Francisco Rafael Arellano Felix - to the United States over the weekend. Before that, Mexico had often balked at sending drug kingpins, arguing they should face justice in Mexico and refusing to send anyone to the U.S. who would face the death penalty.

Mexico's extradition of the man who once ran the Arellano Felix drug clan was a victory for U.S. officials who have been pushing Mexico to send them more drug lords.

After serving a 10-year sentence in Mexico, Arellano Felix was loaded into a helicopter to the Mexican border town of Matamoros, then flown across and handed over to Texas officials in Brownsville. He will be taken to California to face trial on charges stemming from a 1980 case in which he allegedly sold cocaine to an undercover police officer in the United States.

U.S. authorities requested Arellano Felix's extradition on June 2, 2003. A federal judge approved that request in 2004, but it took two years for the Foreign Relations Department approve the extradition.

Mexico has fought many extraditions in the past, arguing that suspects must face justice here first. It also has refused to extradite suspects who face the death penalty in other countries.

Capital punishment is illegal here, and a 1978 extradition treaty with the United States allows Mexico to deny extradition if a person faces the death penalty in another country.

In November, Mexico's Supreme Court removed an obstacle that had prevented many of the country's most notorious criminals from facing U.S. justice when it overturned a 4-year ban on the extradition of suspects facing life in prison.

Mexico last year extradited 41 suspected criminals to the United States, up from 34 in 2004; 31 in 2003; 25 in 2002; 17 in 2001; and 12 in 2000, according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

Feds Find Drug Tunnel On U.S. Border (UPI)

UPI, September 19, 2006

U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency officials said they discovered a tunnel running 400 feet along the U.S.-Mexican border used by traffickers to smuggle drugs.

The tunnel, about 20 feet underground, reportedly was outfitted with lights and had a concrete floor, resembling in sophistication the tunnel authorities discovered last January that led from Mexico into a California border town, El Universal reported Tuesday.

Today's discovery is yet more evidence of the desperation that drug traffickers are feeling as law enforcement efforts continue to impede the flow of drugs into the U.S., said DEA agent John Fernandes.

Man Linked To Cross-border Tunnel Pleads Not Guilty To Marijuana Possession (SDUT)

By By Anna Cearley, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, September 19, 2006

A man linked to the cross-border tunnel that was found Friday in Calexico has pleaded not guilty to possessing about 1,000 pounds of marijuana found in a truck he was driving.

Jesus Bernardo Aguila Agundez made his plea at the El Centro federal courthouse Monday, according to U.S. authorities.

Aguila's arrest Friday paved the way for U.S. investigators to obtain a search warrant that same day to enter a Calexico house from which the truck had reportedly been seen leaving.

Inside, they found a 400-foot-long cross-border tunnel with lighting, ventilation and a water pump system. Mexican authorities, notified of the tunnel, found its opening in a house on the Mexicali side of the border.

Drug Enforcement Administration special agent Dan Simmons wouldn't say how a multiagency task force had grown suspicious about the Calexico house.

U.S. authorities were conducting surveillance for several weeks on cars leaving the house on East Second Street, according to court records.

On Friday, they watched a blue truck back halfway into the house's garage and someone load unidentified items onto it, according to the records.

They followed the truck to a swap meet and afterward.

Calexico police then stopped the truck and found 100 packages of marijuana covered by a tarp, according to the records.

No arrests were reported on the Mexican side, but officials there did find marijuana residue on their side of the tunnel, according to a news release from the Mexican Attorney General's Office.

The Arellano Felix drug cartel has been linked to drug tunnels in the past, but Mexican and U.S. authorities wouldn't say whether this tunnel was used by a particular group.

The Mexicali region's drug network is believed to be mostly controlled by suspected drug traffickers Ismael Zambada and Joaquin Guzman, who are rivals of the Arellanos.

DOJ_NMG_0066160

The tunnel's interior dimensions were 3½ feet by 4 feet, and it had been built about 20 feet underground, according to agency spokesman Simmons. There was about 8 inches of standing water in the tunnel, and a pump was found on the Mexican side, he said.

Such pumps are often found in tunnels where underground water tends to seep into the spaces.

The tunnel had been reinforced with wooden beams and planks. U.S. authorities also found four skateboards that may have been used to scoot the drugs through the tunnel, which had a concrete floor.

“I don't see a bunch of kids practicing with their skateboards down there,” Simmons said.

Drug Ring's Bi-state Tactic (PAET)

By Tom Quigley, The Express-times

Easton Express-Times, September 20, 2006

Made deals in Easton, fled to P'burg, officials say. Scheme meant to thwart police, investigators allege.

PHILLIPSBURG | A $17,000-a-week cocaine ring dismantled by federal and local investigators made about half its drug sales in the Easton area, a federal Drug Enforcement Agency spokesman said Tuesday.

A six-month investigation led to the arrests of 30 people facing charges ranging from state drug possession charges to federal charges of conspiracy to distribute cocaine.

DEA spokesman Douglas S. Collier said the cocaine dealers tried to use the state line between New Jersey and Pennsylvania to thwart local investigators.

"The leaders of this crack cocaine distribution network were Keisha Fredericks and Edward Rayshawn Carter, also known as Sugar Ray," Collier said.

He said the investigation was dubbed "Operation Stateline" because investigators saw several members of the distribution ring crossing between the two states.

Collier explained the dealers would sell in Pennsylvania and then retreat to what they considered the safety of Phillipsburg.

Investigators seized about three pounds of cocaine and $17,000 in cash. The cash was seized from Tim "Big Daddy" Hartwell as he tried to elude capture, authorities allege.

Hartwell, 33, of the 2200 block of Rodgers Street, Bethlehem, is one of seven people facing federal charges and is now in the custody of the U.S. Marshals Service.

Also facing federal charges for conspiracy to distribute cocaine are Fredericks, 29, of the 300 block of Washington Street, Phillipsburg; Carter, 31, of the first block of Sitgreaves Street, Phillipsburg; James "Unc" Armstrong, 30, of the 500 block of Green Street, Phillipsburg; Ray "Pops" Edward Carter, 48, of the first block of Sitgreaves Street, Phillipsburg; Pasqual "Paco" Colon, 27, of the 600 block of Berwick Street, Easton; and Daniel "Groove" Groover, 45, of the 300 block of Washington Avenue, Phillipsburg.

The federal charges against the seven carry possible life sentences, authorities said Tuesday. Plea negotiations with the U.S. Attorney's Office are ongoing, court records show.

Defense attorney Scott Alan Krasny represents Edward Rayshawn Carter and is the lead attorney in the federal case. He did not return a phone message left Tuesday at his West Trenton, N.J., office.

Twenty-three area residents face state drug charges linked to the investigation.

"We're not going away," Collier said.

Phillipsburg Police Chief Robert Mirabelli said his investigators and patrol officers took part in the investigation. The chief thanked the DEA agents involved in the investigation.

"I do believe it's had a significant impact in Phillipsburg," Mirabelli said.

The chief said now the job involves continued work to prevent others from coming into town to replace those arrested.

The Warren County Prosecutor's Office Multi-Jurisdictional Narcotics Task Force also participated in the investigation.

Federal investigators monitored cell phones, employed confidential informants, videotaped drug transactions, and made undercover drug buys as they infiltrated the underbelly of Phillipsburg's drug trade, according to court records.

The undercover investigation began in March.

A confidential informant told DEA agents that Edward Rayshawn Carter, Ray Edward Carter, Armstrong and Groover were selling large quantities of crack in and around Phillipsburg, federal records show.

Fredericks was under surveillance for months after authorities obtained a court order to tap her cell phone, records show.

Those facing criminal charges in Warren County include the son of 40-year-old Phillipsburg resident Donald O'Grady -- one of two men charged with the robbery-murder of an elderly Phillipsburg woman last month.

The ongoing investigation is part of the DEA's Mobile Enforcement Teams program. The program was developed in 1995 as a response to drug-related violence in neighborhoods.

Other agencies involved in the investigation were the Easton Police Department, Belvidere Police Department, FBI, Greenwich Township Police Department, New Jersey State Police, Pohatcong Township Police Department, Washington Borough Police Department and Warren County Sheriff's Office.

Officials Release Details On Drug Ring (MORNCALL)

The Morning Call, September 20, 2006

A crack cocaine ring based in Phillipsburg made sales on both sides of the Delaware River to stymie local police as well as rake in money, state and federal officials said Tuesday.

But any advantage the organization hoped to gain by moving across the Pennsylvania-New Jersey border collapsed this summer, the authorities said. The crack ring, believed to be the largest in rural Warren County, was put out of business six months after federal agents began using wiretaps and making undercover buys.

"They tried to manipulate the system, using the state line as their protector and shield," said Douglas S. Collier, a special agent with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration in Newark, N.J. "They were doing operations in Pennsylvania and going back to New Jersey feeling safe."

Unfortunately for the ring, Collier said, law enforcement officials on both sides of the Delaware began sharing information on what their patrol officers were seeing.

What the local police saw led to Operation Stateline, an investigation that netted 30 people on drug charges, including seven on federal charges carrying potential life prison sentences, Collier said. It also netted three pounds of crack and $17,000 in cash.

At a news conference in the Phillipsburg Municipal Building, police chiefs and other Warren County law enforcement officials lined up near an organizational chart with pictures of the seven suspects in the federal case. All have been in prison since July, when they were arrested and indicted.

About half of the ring's business was in the Easton area, Collier said. Easton Police Chief Larry Palmer had been invited to the news conference but was unable to attend.

Three Northampton County residents were among those arrested, and two who were labeled "distributors" on the organizational chart were named in federal indictments: Tim Hartwell, 33, of 2263 Rogers St., Bethlehem, and Pasqual Colon, 27, of 606 Berwick St., Easton.

Kristi Riegel, 23, of 907 Bushkill St., Easton, was among the 23 people arrested on state drug charges in Warren County, officials said.

The ring bought cocaine from suppliers at wholesale prices, ranging from $28,000 to $35,000 per kilogram, Collier said, and "cooked it up into cocaine base," known as crack. Distributors provided the crack to dealers, who sold it on the street for $5 to $10 per "rock."

Street prices for a kilogram's worth of the drug totaled well over $100,000, Collier said, bringing the ring exponential returns on its investment.

The main targets of the federal investigation were Phillipsburg residents Keisha Fredericks and Edward Rayshawn Carter, whose pictures were at the top of the organizational chart.

A glimpse into the ring's sales and production methods is contained in the federal indictment against Fredericks in a section detailing an April 26 drug deal being made over a cell phone.

When the caller asked if there was crack for sale, the indictment states, Fredericks said she had it but that "we's just chefin' it," meaning cooking the cocaine into crack.

Fredericks told the caller she needed about 20 minutes to finish cooking before heading over to a convenience store parking lot, where she later sold an ounce of crack for $1,500, the indictment states.

Collier declined to say where the ring bought cocaine wholesale, saying it came from "different sources." He said the investigation is pending.

"We're not going away," he said. "We have a lot of work to do."

Drug Ring Defendant Is Sentenced To Prison (SFC)

By Henry K. Lee, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, September 20, 2006

22 had been accused of conspiring to deal cocaine and heroin

One of the last of 22 defendants named in a 2004 federal grand jury indictment accusing them of conspiring to distribute cocaine and heroin from West Oakland was sentenced Monday to more than five years in prison.

At a hearing in Oakland, U.S. District Judge Claudia Wilken ordered Joel Diaz, 35, of Oakland to serve 63 months in prison. In April, Diaz pleaded guilty to possession with intent to distribute and distribution of cocaine while aiding and abetting.

The group was based in an area known as the Lower Bottom near 15th and Center streets in West Oakland, where drug disputes led to 10 homicides in the vicinity from 1996 until a federal complaint led to arrests in 2004, FBI Special Agent Sandra Maier wrote in an affidavit.

The charges, based largely on wiretapped phone conversations and undercover surveillance, were the result of an investigation that included Oakland police, the FBI, the Drug Enforcement Administration and state narcotics agents.

Of 22 defendants named in the complaint, most of them were indicted by a federal grand jury in Oakland. Federal prosecutors ultimately dropped charges against three defendants, court records show.

Over the past two years, the majority of those indicted have been sent to federal prison with sentences ranging from nine days to 14 years, records show.

Among those now in prison are James Edward Morrison Jr., 37, of Richmond, a convicted rapist and drug dealer known as "Chewy" who received a 10-year sentence, and Irvin Anthony Albert, 35, of San Jose, a convicted rapist known as "Tone Capone" who was sentenced to 14 years in prison.

On Sept. 11, another defendant, Henry Fryson, 42, whose nickname is "Biggie," was sentenced to more than nine years in prison. The last defendant, Mike Randall, is to be sentenced in November.

Typically, authorities have seen a "revolving door" of suspects who are back on the streets relatively quickly after being placed on county probation. Many served shorter stints in local jails where convicts could arrange drug deals or even executions from behind bars.

Drug dealers who are sent to federal court often face longer sentences and are sent to prisons across the country, far from friends and family, authorities say.

"You're going to feel totally isolated in every way from your way of life," said Officer Roland Holmgren, Oakland police spokesman. "If you continue on this path of violence and destruction, there's now warnings -- this is it."

Authorities are using the same tactic in North Richmond, where 15 suspected members or associates of the Project Trojan street gang were indicted in March by a federal grand jury in Oakland on charges of cocaine and methamphetamine trafficking.

Suspect May Be Linked To Zetas (DMN)

Lancaster: Lawyer says man denies smuggling guns for cartel enforcers

A Lancaster man arrested late last week for being a felon in possession of a firearm is part of a network that provides weapons to the drug cartel enforcers known as the Zetas, according to court documents and testimony.

Members of a local task force with the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives arrested Erasmo Arciba, 42, near his Franklin Street home Thursday. The arrest came after a five-month investigation into handguns and assault rifles that were bought in the Dallas-Fort Worth area and delivered to Mexico's Gulf cartel.

Mr. Arciba's attorney, Carlton McLarty, said his client – who is being held without bail pending a Thursday hearing – admits to being a felon in possession of guns but denies being part of an international weapons smuggling ring.

In a court hearing Monday, Dallas police Officer Paul Freese told U.S. Magistrate Judge William F. Sanderson that Mr. Arciba's case is part of an ongoing investigation of the Zetas' local connections, including weapons trafficking.

The Zetas, a paramilitary group that murders rivals and collect debts on behalf of the Gulf drug cartel, have been linked to crimes in Mexico and the U.S., including at least three killings in the Dallas area first reported in The Dallas Morning News.

Officer Freese testified in court that Mr. Arciba is affiliated with a group "that sends weapons to Mexico and Zetas ... but he is not a member" of the Zetas.

Mr. Arciba "is a hardworking person in town" who runs a construction business out of his Lancaster home, Mr. McLarty said. "He admitted to having the guns and should be granted bond."

Police say Angilita Ortiz, 21, of Grand Prairie helped Mr. Arciba buy at least two FN Herstal 5.7 USG guns from a pawnshop in the 2900 block of West Northwest Highway in Dallas on Sept. 8 and Thursday.

A probable-cause affidavit filed in the case states that Zetas use the same type of handgun as "one of their weapons of choice" and that ATF agents have watched over the purchase of the Belgian-made weapons in the Dallas area.

The pawnshop owner declined to comment on the case Tuesday, but an affidavit states that he informed ATF investigators of the purchases, because Ms. Ortiz bought two of the same type of handgun for self-defense in a short period of time and did not buy ammunition.

Officer Freese testified that guns of the same brand bought by Ms. Ortiz were used in a shootout between Zetas and Mexican federal agents in June and that ATF officials determined those weapons came from Dallas.

Ms. Ortiz did not respond to an interview request. She has not been charged with a crime.

The affidavit states that Mr. Arciba recruited Ms. Ortiz to buy guns for him, because he served 60 months in prison for a 1991 drug trafficking case in East St. Louis, Ill.

According to federal law, an ex-felon cannot purchase or be in possession of a firearm.

Tom Crowley, ATF regional spokesperson, said arms trafficking is more common along the border, but there have been several gun-purchasing cases similar to the Arciba case in Dallas-Fort Worth. Mr. Crowley said those weapons were sold to criminals in Mexico.

DOJ_NMG_0066163

Mr. Crowley said Tuesday that ATF officials are still trying to determine how many weapons were funneled into Mexico by Mr. Arciba and his associates.

According to the affidavit, ATF agents followed Mr. Arciba and Ms. Ortiz when they left Bachman Pawn and Guns on Sept. 14.

He admitted to having possession of the gun she purchased earlier in the day and had it with him. He also told agents he had three more in his garage.

According to the affidavit, Mr. Arciba told investigators that the other FN Herstal gun – the one Ms. Ortiz bought Sept. 8 – ended up in Mexico.

The News was among the first news organizations to report on the existence of the Zetas and their enforcement role for the Gulf cartel. The organization has been engaged in a bloody turf war with rival cartels along the Texas-Mexico border and elsewhere in Mexico.

Cause Of Blaze Stumps Officials (JOHNSTD)

By Mike Faher, The Tribune-Democrat

Johnstown (PA) Tribune-Democrat, September 20, 2006

More than a week after fire leveled a popular Johnstown bar, investigators say they have no idea what caused the blaze.

And local officials have called in some outside help: The federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives has dispatched agents to assist at the 1167 Franklin St. site formerly occupied by Lamont's.

But city police Chief Craig Foust cautioned that an ATF presence does not mean anyone has determined that the fire is suspicious in origin.

"It's not unusual to bring (federal investigators) in if there's a lot of damage," Foust said. "It's a challenging scene because of the extent of the damage."

Lamont's burned to the ground early Sept. 12.

City firefighters said they found the structure fully engulfed when they arrived around 3:30 a.m. The intensity of the flames and proximity of overhead power lines prevented emergency crews from getting inside.

City police and fire personnel, a state police fire marshal and now ATF representatives are involved in the probe.

"(ATF agents) have investigative skills that may help us," Johnstown fire Chief Anthony Kovacic said. "It's just additional assistance."

Foust said investigators have ruled out nothing, including the possibility that the blaze was accidental.

"That's the whole purpose of the investigation – to find out what happened," he said.

The fire scene remains under 24-hour guard. Foust said that protection was arranged by property owner Lamont Crocco's insurance company, not by city officials.

Crocco, who has said he was the last to leave the bar before the fire, has vowed to rebuild there. He operated Lamont's for 24 years.

IMMIGRATION:

Calif. Woman Admits Nazi Link (AP)

AP, September 20, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- An 83-year-old woman who admitted she had served as a guard at a concentration camp during World War II was deported to Germany, federal officials said Tuesday.

Prosecutors would not say how they learned about Elfriede Rinkel, but a department spokeswoman said investigators routinely compare guard rosters and other Nazi documents to U.S. immigration records.

Rinkel admitted in court documents that she worked as a prison guard at the Ravensbrueck camp near Furstenberg from June 1944 until the camp was abandoned by the Nazi government in April 1945. According to the U.S. Department of Justice, she worked with an SS-trained attack dog but was not a member of the Nazi party.

"Concentration camp guards such as Elfriede Rinkel played a vital role in the Nazi regime's horrific mistreatment of innocent victims," said Alice Fisher, a Justice Department lawyer. "This case reflects the government's unwavering commitment to remove Nazi persecutors from this country."

As part of her June agreement with prosecutors, Rinkel gave up her green card, moved to Germany and agreed never to return to the U.S., according to the court documents. The government agreed to not release information about Rinkel's case, which began in April, until after her departure. She left this month.

A call to her lawyer Tuesday wasn't immediately returned.

Rinkel's husband, a German Jew whom she married after coming to the U.S., died in 2004. Her brother and sister-in-law, when reached at their Northern California home, said they were unaware of Rinkel's past and believed her husband had been, too. The couple asked not to be identified by name because they feared a backlash from friends and family.

More than 130,000 women passed through Ravensbrueck's gates between 1939 and 1945; an estimated 40,000 survived, according to the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum.

In January 1945, it had more than 45,000 prisoners, mostly women. The camp had more than 150 female guards and was a major training site for female concentration camp staff.

Rinkel was a furrier by trade in her hometown of Leipzig, according to her younger brother, who fought for the German army in North Africa and was captured by U.S. troops. In 1950, the general who ran the prison camp in Wyoming where he was held helped Rinkel's brother permanently settle in the U.S.

Nine years later, the brother and sister-in-law sponsored Rinkel to come to the Bay Area where she met her husband, Fred Rinkel, at a German-American friendship club, according to the couple.

Fred Rinkel received a Jewish burial in San Francisco and his wife was to be interred next to him, but she has since changed those plans.

SF Woman Hid Nazi Past From Jewish Husband (OAKTRIB)

By Josh Richman

Oakland (CA) Tribune, September 20, 2006

Berkeley relatives shocked to learn of the 84-year-old woman's past as a concentration camp guard

An elderly San Francisco woman was deported to Germany this month after admitting she was a guard in a Nazi-operated concentration camp in the Third Reich's waning days, federal officials said Tuesday.

But although Elfriede Lina Rinkel, 84, now admits her terrible past, shocked Berkeley relatives said Tuesday she had hid her secret for more than 60 years even from them and apparently from her late husband -- a German Jew who'd fled the Holocaust himself.

Rinkel's brother and sister-in-law, longtime Berkeley residents who asked that their names not be published, said they just learned the truth Tuesday when reporters called them for comment.

"It knocked us off our feet," the sister-in-law said. "We have many, many Jewish friends who live in the Oakland/Berkeley area and this would be quite shocking to them as it was to us."

Rinkel -- charged under a federal law requiring removal of aliens who took part in acts of Nazi-sponsored persecution -- in June signed a settlement agreement with the government admitting that from June 1944 to April 1945 she was a guard at the Ravensbruck camp, built near Furstenburg, Germany almost exclusively for female prisoners.

Documents released Tuesday by the U.S. Department of Justice's Office of Special Investigations say she used a trained SS guard dog at the camp. The OSI also provided copies of her service card, taken from an SS records office, and bank records showing pay she received for her service at the camp.

Ravensbruck's construction began in late 1938, and the camp was liberated by the Russian Army on April 30, 1945, according to the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum. In the interim, an estimated 130,000 women and children were imprisoned there, of whom an estimated 90,000 died by starvation, execution, weakness or medical experimentation. The inmates came mostly from Poland and the occupied Soviet territories; almost 15 percent were Jewish.

Rinkel's husband, Fred William Rinkel, died in January 2004; his obituary said he was a longtime member of the Jewish service organization B'nai B'rith, and his funeral services were held at a Jewish memorial chapel.

The sister-in-law -- who said her husband didn't know of his sister's wartime activity, as he served in the German Army and was captured by U.S. troops in North Africa -- said Fred Rinkel almost certainly didn't know, either.

"He had to leave Germany during all that terrible stuff that happened there and had to relocate in Shanghai, a lot of the Jewish Germans went to Shanghai," she said, adding he was from a prominent Berlin family of doctors and lawyers, and had been training to become an opera singer before being forced to flee his homeland. He owned a San Francisco tie shop.

The government's charges, filed in April, say Elfriede Rinkel was born July 14, 1922 in Leipzig, Germany; served at the camp from 1944 to 1945; and applied for a U.S. immigrant visa Aug. 29, 1959 at the U.S. consulate in Frankfurt. The visa application instructed her to list all her residences from 1938 forward, but she omitted Ravensbruck.

Rinkel was admitted as an immigrant to the United States on or about Sept. 21, 1959 at San Francisco, the document says. Her sister-in-law, who with her husband had sponsored their sibling's immigration, said Tuesday Elfriede Rinkel met Fred Rinkel decades ago at a German-American

The Justice Department wouldn't discuss what Fred Rinkel knew or didn't know. "OSI is obviously aware of the background information on Fred Rinkel," spokeswoman Jaclyn Lesch said Tuesday. "We really can't speak beyond that... We're unable to speak to that subject."

DOJ_NMG_0066165

The San Francisco attorney who represented Elfriede Rinkel in the deportation proceedings didn't return a call Tuesday.

The SS, or Schutzstaffel -- German for "protective squadron" -- was a large, elite security and military arm of the Nazi party; one of its duties was operating concentration camps.

"Thousands of innocent women were brutalized and murdered at Ravensbruck through the active participation of Elfriede Rinkel and other guards, whose principal function was to prevent prisoners from escaping the abominable conditions inside the camp," OSI director Eli Rosenbaum said in a news release issued Tuesday. "Her presence in the United States was an affront to surviving Holocaust victims who have made new homes in this country."

Her address as of this April was an apartment building on Bush Street at Powell, two blocks up Nob

Hill from Union Square.

"We did help her to close up her apartment and helped her to buy her airplane ticket and go to the airport and buy her luggage -- but never a word about why she was leaving," the sister-in-law said. "We thought she was going because her situation in her apartment had deteriorated."

Elfriede Rinkel had bad arthritis, she explained, and her apartment building's elevator was often out of service. "She said she just wanted to go back to Germany, and because she told us that, we believed her."

During a sworn interview last November, it says, Rinkel admitted she'd concealed her time at Ravensbruck for fear her application would be rejected. The settlement agreement she signed in June says she admits her work as a Ravensbruck guard, and that it's a deportable offense; she agreed to give up her green card, leave the country and never return, although after death her remains can be brought back here for burial.

The government agreed not to publicize the case until after she left the country, and not to assert that she was a Nazi Party member; the Justice Department reported Tuesday she returned to Germany this month.

Rep. Tom Lantos, D-San Mateo, the only Holocaust survivor ever elected to Congress, called the case's facts "chilling, compelling, and in some ways hard to fathom. But such is the nature of individuals linked to the Holocaust; so much of what happened is difficult but important to examine, even decades after humanity endured this nightmare."

Lantos applauded the German and U.S. governments for their efforts. "This process comes years too late for many who deserved to see their day in court, but at least it is now close at hand."

S.F. Immigrant Married Holocaust Survivor, Attended Synagogue (SFC)

By Demian Bulwa, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, September 20, 2006

Those who knew San Francisco's Elfriede Rinkel never found it remarkable that the German immigrant would marry a Jewish survivor of the Holocaust, or attend synagogue with him, or plan to be buried next to him at a cemetery run by a Chevra Kadisha, a Jewish burial society that performs ritual purification.

On Tuesday, though, came a jarring twist: The U.S. Justice Department said the 84-year-old Rinkel had been deported to Germany, nearly half a century after she emigrated to the United States, because she had been a guard at a Nazi concentration camp in World War II where an estimated 90,000 people, many of them Jews, were exterminated.

"I think it may have been a type of atonement for her," her attorney, Alison Dixon, said of Elfriede's marriage to Fred Rinkel, who died two years ago. "My understanding is that she has also contributed to Jewish charities."

Dixon said Rinkel never told her husband that she had spent nearly a year as a guard at the Ravensbruck concentration camp in Germany, the only major Nazi camp for women.

She might not have told anyone in the United States -- including her brother and his wife, who dropped her off at San Francisco International Airport on Aug. 31. Rinkel told them she was returning to Germany because she was having problems with her apartment on Bush Street in downtown San Francisco. It wasn't until Tuesday that the couple learned the truth from reporters.

"I just don't have any words," said Rinkel's brother, an 82-year-old Berkeley resident who asked that his name be withheld because he is afraid of a possible backlash. "I don't have any feelings anymore. Life has given me too many things. I cannot accept it, let's just put it that way."

The government said Rinkel, a permanent resident alien who never applied for U.S. citizenship, had admitted after a two-year investigation that she had guarded female prisoners at Ravensbruck from June 1944 to April 1945, when the Nazis abandoned the camp to the advancing Allies. She now lives with her younger sister in the German city of Viersen, her brother said.

The Justice Department alleged that Rinkel had used attack dogs to march emaciated inmates to slave-labor sites. More than 130,000 women from dozens of countries -- Jews, gypsies and others -- were brought to Ravensbruck during its six years of existence. More than two-thirds of them died of malnourishment, in medical experiments and in a gas chamber, according to the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum.

Rinkel is the first woman prosecuted by the Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations, which was formed in 1979. The agency has won cases against 102 people who took part in Nazi persecution and has deported 62 of them.

Eli Rosenbaum, director of the office, would not say how the government found out about Rinkel. But he said staff historians have searched around the world for evidence such as rosters of Nazi guard units and mobile killing units, building a list of more than 70,000 names that are checked against immigration records and other documents.

"She was an integral part of the machinery of destruction and persecution at Ravensbruck," Rosenbaum said of Rinkel. "The message to would-be perpetrators of genocide and crimes against humanity is that if you dare to act on your fantasies of destruction, there is a real chance that what remains of the civilized world will pursue you for the rest of your life, even if you live for a very long time."

Attorney Dixon said Rinkel regretted her wartime actions. However, she added, "I was informed that it was not completely voluntary on her part. She answered a work ad. ... In Germany at that time, if you answered certain work ads and went to the interview and said you didn't want the job, they would put you in the camp yourself."

Rinkel admitted to the Justice Department's charges in part to avoid the publicity of a trial, Dixon said.

Rinkel's brother said he had fought in the German army and had been captured by U.S. forces in North Africa, and as a result he was in a prisoner-of-war at a camp in Wyoming when his sister allegedly worked at Ravensbruck. He emigrated to America in 1950 and nine years later petitioned for his sister to join him.

Rinkel soon met her future husband at an event for German Americans. They were a quiet couple and kept to themselves, her brother said.

Fred Rinkel, who grew up in a prominent family in Berlin, fled Germany with a brother as Nazi persecution of the Jews spread. He had trained to be an opera tenor in Germany, but after making his way to San Francisco he settled on a job as a singing waiter. Elfriede Rinkel worked as a furrier.

Fred Rinkel's past and Jewish heritage were important to him, according to those who knew him. He belonged to B'nai B'rith, one of the world's largest Jewish organizations.

He died of a heart attack Jan. 21, 2004, and was buried at the Eternal Home Cemetery in Colma. Elfriede Rinkel planned to be buried beside him, the cemetery said. It's not clear now whether that will still happen, although under an agreement with the Justice Department, she can be buried on U.S. soil.

An employee at Sinai Memorial Chapel, which owns the Colma cemetery, said those who met the Rinkels while they prepared for the end of their lives are in shock at the news.

"It's so easy to hate her and want to beat her up," said the employee, who asked that her name not be published. "But we were not there. We don't know what happened. Why did she marry a Jewish man? Maybe she loved him.

"The human soul is much more evil and good than it appears from the outside. There's a Russian expression that says you have to eat a kilogram of salt with someone before you begin to know them. There's just so much we don't know."

TOHONO O'ODHAM NATION, Ariz., Sept. 14 — The Senate is expected to vote Wednesday on legislation to build a double-layered 700-mile-long fence on the Mexican border, a proposal already approved by the House.

If the fence is built, however, it could have a long gap — about 75 miles — at one of the border's most vulnerable points because of opposition from the Indian tribe here.

More illegal immigrants are caught — and die trying to cross into the United States — in and around the Tohono O'odham Indian territory, which straddles the Arizona border, than any other spot in the state.

Tribal leaders have cooperated with Border Patrol enforcement, but they promised to fight the building of a fence out of environmental and cultural concerns.

For the Tohono O'odham, which means "desert people," the reason is fairly simple. For generations, their people and the wildlife they revere have freely crossed the border. For years, an existing four-foot-high cattle fence has had several openings — essentially cattle gates — that tribal members use to visit relatives and friends, take children to school and perform rites on the other side.

"I am O'odham first, and American or Mexican second or third," said Ramon Valenzuela, as he walked his two children to school through one gate two miles from his O'odham village in Mexico.

But the pushed-up bottom strands of the cattle fence and the surrounding desert littered with clothing, water jugs and discarded backpacks testify to the growth in illegal immigrant traffic, which surged here after a Border Patrol enforcement squeeze in California and Texas in the mid-1990's.

Crossers take advantage of a remote network of washes and trails — and sometimes Indian guides — to reach nearby highways bound for cities across the country.

Tribal members, who once gave water and food to the occasional passing migrant, say they have become fed up with groups of illegal immigrants breaking into homes and stealing food, water and clothing, and even using indoor and outdoor electrical outlets to charge cellphones.

With tribal police, health and other services overwhelmed by illegal immigration, the Indians welcomed National Guard members this summer to assist the Border Patrol here. The tribe, after negotiations with the Department of Homeland Security, also agreed to a plan for concrete vehicle barriers at the fence and the grading of the dirt road parallel to it for speedier Border Patrol and tribal police access. The Indians also donated a parcel this year for a small Border Patrol substation and holding pen.

Tribal members, however, fearing the symbolism of a solid wall and concern about the free range of deer, wild horses, coyotes, jackrabbits and other animals they regard as kin, said they would fight the kind of steel-plated fencing that Congress had in mind and that has slackened the crossing flow in previous hot spots like San Diego.

"Animals and our people need to cross freely," said Verlon Jose, a member of the tribal council representing border villages. "In our tradition we are taught to be concerned about every living thing as if they were people. We don't want that wall."

The federal government, the trustee of all Indian lands, could build the fence here without tribal permission, but that option is not being pressed because officials said it might jeopardize the tribe's cooperation on smuggling and other border crimes.

"We rely on them for cooperation and intelligence and phone calls about illegal activity as much as they depend on us to respond to calls," said Chuy Rodriguez, a spokesman for the Border Patrol in Tucson, who described overall relations as "getting better and better."

The Tohono number more than 30,000, including 14,000 on the Arizona tribal territory and 1,400 in Mexico. Building a fence would impose many challenges, apart from the political difficulties.

When steel fencing and other resources went up in California and Texas, migrant traffic shifted to the rugged terrain here, and critics say more fencing will simply force crossers to other areas without the fence. Or under it, as evidenced by the growth in the number of tunnels discovered near San Diego.

The shift in traffic to more remote, treacherous terrain has also led to hundreds of deaths of crossers, including scores on tribal land here.

The effort to curtail illegal immigration has proved especially difficult on the Tohono O'odham Nation, whose 2.8 million acres, about the size of Connecticut, make it the second largest in area.

Faced with poverty and unemployment, an increasing number of tribal members are turning to the smuggling of migrants and drugs, tribal officials say.

Just this year, the tribal council adopted a law barring the harboring of illegal immigrants in homes, a gesture to show it is taking a "zero tolerance" stand, said the tribal chairwoman, Vivian Juan-Saunders.

Two members of Ms. Juan-Saunders's family have been convicted of drug smuggling in the past several years, and she said virtually every family had been touched by drug abuse, smuggling or both.

Sgt. Ed Perez of the tribal police said members had been offered $400 per person to transport illegal immigrants from the tribal territory to Tucson, a 90-minute drive, and much more to carry drugs.

The Border Patrol and tribal authorities say the increase in manpower and technology is yielding results. Deaths are down slightly, 55 this year compared with 62 last year, and arrests of illegal immigrants in the Border Patrol sectors covering the tribal land are up about 10 percent.

But the influx of agents, many of whom are unfamiliar with the territory or Tohono ways, has brought complaints that the agents have interfered with tribal ceremonies, entered property uninvited and tried to block members crossing back and forth.

Ms. Juan-Saunders said helicopters swooped low and agents descended on a recent ceremony, apparently suspicious of a large gathering near the border, and she has complained to supervisors about agents speeding and damaging plants used for medicine and food.

Some traditional and activist tribal members later this month are organizing a conference among eight Indian nations on or near the border to address concerns here and elsewhere.

"We are in a police state," said Michael Flores, a tribal member helping to organize the conference. "It is not a tranquil place anymore."

Mr. Rodriguez acknowledged the concerns but said agents operated in a murky world where a rush of pickups from a border village just might be tribal members attending an all-night wake, or something else.

"Agents make stops based on what they see," he said. "Sometimes an agent sees something different from what tribal members or others see."

Agents, he added, are receiving more cultural training, including a new cultural awareness video just shot with the help of tribal members.

"Our relations have come a long way" in the past decade, he said.

Mr. Valenzuela said several agents knew him and waved as he traveled across the border, but others have stopped him, demanding identification. Once, he said, he left at home a card that identifies him as a tribal member and an agent demanded that he go back into Mexico and cross at the official port of entry in Sasabe, 20 miles away.

DOJ_NMG_0066168

"I told him this is my land, not his," said Mr. Valenzuela, who was finally allowed to proceed after the agent radioed supervisors.

Mr. Valenzuela said he would not be surprised if a big fence eventually went up, but Ms. Juan-Saunders said she would affirm the tribe's concerns to Congress and the Homeland Security department. She said she would await final word on the fence and its design before taking action.

Members of Congress she has met, she said, "recognize we pose some unique issues to them, and that was really what we are attempting to do, to educate them to our unique situation."

The House last week approved a Republican-backed bill 238 to 138 calling for double-layer fencing along a third of the 2,000-mile-long border, roughly from Calexico, Calif., to Douglas, Ariz.

There is considerable support for the idea in the Senate, although President Bush's position on the proposal remains uncertain. The Homeland Security secretary, Michael Chertoff, has expressed doubts about sealing the border with fences.

Texas' U.S. Senators Oppose House Plan On Border Fence (FWST)

By Dave Montgomery

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, September 20, 2006

WASHINGTON - Texas' two senators expressed opposition Tuesday to House-passed legislation calling for more than 700 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border, including stretches in the Lone Star State.

"For Washington to try to dictate to places like Laredo, Texas, exactly where fences need to be built is, to my mind, ludicrous," said Sen. John Cornyn.

"I don't think Congress should be dictating that," Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison said.

The House voted 283-138 last week to construct large sections of double-layered fencing in the four states along the U.S.-Mexico border. The Senate, which previously called for more than 300 miles of fencing, may begin consideration of the measure Wednesday.

The bill is part of a broader package of border security initiatives advanced by the House Republican leadership and includes more than 230 miles of fencing in Texas at border cities such as El Paso, Laredo, Brownsville, Del Rio and Eagle Pass.

Hutchison and Cornyn, both Republicans, said they support toughened border security measures. While some new fencing may be necessary, they said, it should be part of a mix that would include added Border Patrol agents, high-tech surveillance and unmanned aerial vehicles.

They also said that the Homeland Security Department - not Congress - should determine that mix, in consultation with the affected states and based on the needs of each.

House leaders last week announced their border security initiatives, which include relatively noncontroversial features such as beefing up the Border Patrol, amid fading prospects for a more comprehensive overhaul of the nation's immigration laws.

A stalled Senate bill would create a foreign worker program and put millions of illegal immigrants on track toward permanent legal status and U.S. citizenship.

TAX:

Taxes And Justice (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

Prosecutors have been advertising their ballyhooed case against a pack of former KPMG partners as the largest criminal tax-shelter trial in history. They'd better do some scrambling for better evidence, however, or the case could end up becoming one of the biggest flops in Justice Department history.

Last week, a previously undisclosed memo from 2004 suggested that the IRS wasn't sure that the tax shelters at issue in the trial of 18 defendants even needed to be registered with the IRS. This revelation is important because the failure to register the shelters is one of the Justice Department's justifications for charging a conspiracy to defraud the IRS.

Separately, we've obtained an internal KPMG memo to Richard Smith, one of the defendants in the case. In that 2003 memo, IRS Acting Chief Counsel Emily Parker is cited as assuring KPMG "that there has been no criminal activity" in KPMG's marketing of the shelters. The defendants have claimed all along that they thought the shelters they were publicly marketing were entirely legal, and memos such as this one will certainly help the argument for "reasonable doubt."

As early as today, the defendants are expected to file for another delay of the trial on the basis of the 2004 IRS memo. Among other things, they will demand that prosecutors make available any other internal government documents that might tend to show that the tax shelters in question were not as fraudulent as the Justice Department claims.

Failure to produce evidence of this sort runs afoul of the 1963 Supreme Court decision Brady v. Maryland, which held that prosecutors have a duty to disclose exculpatory evidence in their possession. The KPMG prosecutors have already been rapped on the knuckles by federal Judge Lewis A. Kaplan for dragging their feet on the defendants' discovery requests, so this late revelation is unlikely to please the court.

In July, Judge Kaplan excluded from evidence the statements of two defendants on the grounds that they had been coerced by the government. That order has led to a series of motions, still pending, on what other evidence should be excluded and how much of a case remains against the two in the absence of their statements.

And in the latest sign that this case is unlikely to go to trial in January, if ever, KPMG this week requested a delay in a related civil trial over the payment of legal fees for its former employees. That trial had been scheduled for October in hopes of resolving that question before the criminal trial is supposed to start. In June, Judge Kaplan ruled that the government had violated the defendants' Sixth Amendment rights to counsel by coercing KPMG to cut off legal support to its former employees. Justice is appealing that ruling, with a hearing expected in November.

At the time of that June ruling, Judge Kaplan wrote that he would not yet consider dismissing the case, in part because he hoped the legal-fee issue could be resolved prior to trial. But if KPMG's aggressive filing on Monday is any indication, there will be no quick fix here.

KPMG not only argued that it was not required to pay for the defense of the 16 defendants that formerly worked there, but that Judge Kaplan had no jurisdiction to even consider the question and, what's more, that the defendants owed the company millions of dollars for getting it in trouble in the first place. Never mind that KPMG benefited from the marketing of those shelters and had defended them right up until the time it cut a deferred-prosecution deal that included throwing those partners over the side.

So let's sum up this case to date: In the year since the indictments were handed down, Judge Kaplan has ruled that the prosecutors violated the defendants' Fifth and Sixth Amendment rights. He has found the prosecutors delinquent in responding to document requests from the defendants' lawyers. And he has excluded evidence that he found to have been coerced, as well as the "fruit" of that coerced evidence. None of this speaks well of Justice's respect for due process.

More broadly still, the evidence that is coming to light suggests that the legality of these tax shelters was a subject of debate within the government itself. Justice nonetheless decided, for the first time, to prosecute such a case before the IRS had ever won a ruling in tax court declaring the shelters to be illegal. We have no brief for tax evasion, but mere tax avoidance is not a crime. This newspaper first raised questions about due process and the underlying legal theory in this case a year ago, when the first defendants were indicted. Increasingly, those concerns are being borne out.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

A Paper Trail Leading To A Fight (WP)

By Cindy Skrzycki

The Washington Post, September 19, 2006

S usan E. Dudley , President Bush 's nominee to become his new regulatory review chief, has written extensively about federal rulemaking for years, a miles-long paper trail that is providing ammunition for her opponents.

Business supporters say Dudley, director of regulatory studies at George Mason University's Mercatus Center , is experienced, analytical and dispassionate in expressing her belief that the market will correct most problems and that rules should be subject to a tough cost-benefit test. Public interest groups fighting the nomination say those writings disqualify her for the job.

The new job, administrator of the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs at the White House's Office of Management and Budget , is an important one. It makes final decisions on which major federal regulations are approved, which are sent back for more work and which never see the light of day.

With so much at stake, many participants expect the same kind of fight that the previous administrator, John D. Graham, faced five years ago, one that brought him 37 "nay" votes on his confirmation in the Senate.

OMB Watch , a foundation-funded, liberal nonprofit group that monitors federal regulatory policy, will oppose an executive nomination for the first time, said Gary Bass , the group's executive director. "This time, we will come out swinging," he said.

OMB Watch and Public Citizen , the consumer advocacy group founded by Ralph Nader , released a 68-page report last week using Dudley's writings to attack her. It chastised her for ties to corporate donors and for what it called "Dudleynomics," an emphasis on free-market solutions to health and safety issues at the public's expense.

The study said Dudley has suggested that the Environmental Protection Agency leave it up to individual communities to control arsenic in their water; that publicly releasing information on toxics may be more costly than it's worth; and that regulators' "one-size-fits-all" approach to vehicle airbags eliminates consumer choice.

The Mercatus Center called the report "incomplete and biased" against Dudley and the center.

Dudley's backers point to what they call her personal commitment to environmental stewardship, noting that she and her husband, Brian Mannix, the EPA's associate administrator for policy, economics and innovation, drove hybrid cars before hybrids were cool. Her profile on the Mercatus Center Web site says she enjoys hiking, canoeing and fly fishing.

Business lobbyists say the 51-year-old Dudley's experience working at EPA and the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs gives her an insider's view of regulation.

DOJ_NMG_0066170

"She is very articulate and has a great read on the issues," said William Kovacs , vice president of environment, technology and regulatory affairs at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

Graham, the former regulatory review chief who is now dean of RAND Corp. 's graduate school in Santa Monica, Calif., said Dudley was a "superb choice" because she has hands-on experience at federal agencies, is an academic and has made scholarly contributions to the literature on regulation.

Under Dudley, who was paid $115,000 for the year ending August 2005, according to Mercatus's tax return, her group has analyzed a broad swath of regulatory initiatives, including growth in rulemaking expenditures and staffing. (She also wrote a mixed review of this writer's 2003 book on regulation.)

The center -- whose board of directors includes Edwin Meese , attorney general under President Ronald Reagan ; Vernon Smith , a George Mason professor who shared the Nobel Prize for economics in 2002; and Charles Koch , chief executive of Koch Industries Inc . -- regards regulations as a hidden tax on American consumers. It has urged the Bush administration to pay more attention to market solutions and allow Americans to make their own choices about the need for regulation.

Koch Industries is a privately held oil and gas company in Wichita that has contributed to the Republican Party and conservative causes for years. Its foundation has given millions to Mercatus, including $2 million in the last fiscal year, according to the center.

The center's clout in the regulatory arena is clear. When Bush took office, his administration asked for suggestions on which regulations might be changed, eliminated or improved. Mercatus responded with 44 proposals, and more than a dozen were implemented. At the time, business lobbyists said they were dumbfounded at the reach of the small group of policy wonks at Mercatus.

Some of her opponents say Dudley is more radical than her predecessor.

"Everyone thought Graham was a true believer, but there were limits beyond where even he would go," said Robert Shull , deputy directory for auto safety and regulatory policy at Public Citizen, which also opposed Graham. "I don't know if there are any limits with Dudley. She has a really distorted view of economics."

"She is rock solid," said Thomas Sullivan , chief counsel in the Small Business Administration 's Office of Advocacy . Sullivan said Dudley's prolific paper trail will be an asset, not a liability, "because it gives amazing insight into her philosophy."

With little time left in this session of Congress, experts on both sides are betting that a Dudley confirmation hearing, not yet scheduled, will become a proxy for the administration's record on regulation but will not lead to a Senate vote. More likely, they say, is a recess appointment after Congress adjourns. If that comes early next year, Dudley would be able to serve until the end of the Bush administration.

House Demands Student Search Policies (AP)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod

AP, September 20, 2006

The House issued an ultimatum to school boards Tuesday: Establish policies on student searches or risk losing federal funds.

The House passed a bill by voice vote that would require the search rules. The Senate has not yet considered a companion measure.

"Shocking acts of violence have been planned and unfortunately executed at our schools," said Rep. Geoff Davis, R-Ky., a sponsor of the bill. He said the measure would help curb violence.

The legislation relies on a standard for school searches that was established in a 1985 Supreme Court ruling.

The bill states that the policies implemented by school boards should spell out that searches have to be conducted by a full-time teacher or school officials acting on a reasonable suspicion that a student has weapons, drugs or other dangerous materials. The bill says search methods cannot be "excessively intrusive."

Rep. Mark Kirk, R-Ill., another sponsor of the bill, said teachers in his district are looking for guidelines. "They want to search the book bags, and the policies are not clear," he said.

The bill has the backing of the National Education Association, the largest teachers union. But the American Teachers Federation, another teachers union, called the measure unnecessary and said it might put additional burdens on teachers.

California Rep. George Miller, the senior Democrat on the House committee that oversees education issues, called the legislation an intrusion into local affairs.

"Schools and school districts already have policies in place regarding student searches," Miller said. "Those policies are the product of consultation with local administrators, teachers and parents. They take in the concerns of the community."

Mary Kusler, a lobbyist for the American Association of School Administrators, said her group opposes the bill. She said she is concerned it is a political stunt to help Davis win a tough re-election campaign against a former member of Congress, Democratic Rep. Ken Lucas.

"We worry that it's just election-year messaging, and we don't think that's a good reason to pass a bill," Kusler said.

DOJ_NMG_0066171

In his effort to pass the bill, Davis cited an Education Department report that said 29 percent of high school students in 2003 reported drugs were made available to them. Nine percent of students were threatened or injured with a weapon on school property, according to that report.

The Education Department has not taken a position on the legislation.

A Quiet Break For Corporations (WP)

By Joe Stephens

The Washington Post, September 20, 2006

For three generations, the Dungey family of Auburn, N.Y., has produced handmade dog collars and leashes for pet stores around the country. The family's six-person shop has staved off competition from cheaper foreign labor by offering a range of products, from affordable "Sparky's Choice" leashes to a $100 beveled-brass collar known as the "Gatsby."

One day this spring, the company president, Anita Dungey, happened across a few words on a Web site, leading her to a startling discovery: One of her small advantages over imports was about to disappear, thanks to a little-noticed proposal in the Senate. The plan, it turned out, had been promoted by Wal-Mart Stores Inc.

In Connecticut, chemical company executive Kenneth Kelly got a similar jolt when a business associate called to warn that a bill tailored to benefit a German-owned competitor was working its way through Congress.

Dungey and Kelly had stumbled upon a largely unknown congressional apparatus that allows companies to erase tariffs -- taxes levied on products and materials shipped to the United States from overseas -- for years at a time.

Each legislative season, corporate executives and lobbyists quietly draft hundreds of bills to suspend tariffs. Over time, the changes cost taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars in lost revenue, a Washington Post analysis of U.S. trade data found.

Most of the tariff suspensions involve obscure chemicals and dyes, but many other products show up, including boilers for nuclear reactors, green peanuts, child potty seats, unicycles -- even chocolate coatings for laxatives.

"It's become sort of a lobbyists' dream," said Jim Schollaert, a former State Department trade specialist who now represents domestic manufacturers. "It's a gravy train, and there's little work to it."

The bills in Congress generally give no hint of whom the suspensions have been designed to benefit and sometimes refer to the products only by strings of numbers linked to phone-book-size tariff tables. But many corporate names can be found in reports on the legislation produced for Congress by the U.S. International Trade Commission.

Lawmakers usually introduce the provisions at the behest of companies in their districts. Many of those companies and their executives have given federal campaign contributions totaling millions of dollars.

The dog-collar proposal was introduced by Sen. Blanche Lincoln (D), who represents Wal-Mart's home state of Arkansas. Rep. Henry E. Brown Jr. (R-S.C.) sponsored the suspension of tariffs on a chemical virtually identical to one produced by Kelly's firm, R.T. Vanderbilt Co. The request came from Lanxess Corp., which has two plants in South Carolina.

Since 2003, Wal-Mart's political committee has contributed $9,000 to Lincoln's campaigns. Lanxess is a 2004 spinoff of Bayer AG, a German company whose U.S. political committee has donated $3,500 to Brown's campaigns since 2000.

Congressional sponsors of such bills said they are trying to lower consumer prices and create jobs by cutting costs for U.S. manufacturers and retailers. They said they do not want to hurt domestic businesses and they generally drop legislation if trade officials find a U.S. company that objects.

"Removing these tariffs will help reduce costs for American businesses," House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Calif.) said in a statement in March, when the House passed an omnibus bill with hundreds of tariff suspensions. "This is absolutely the right thing to do."

The practice of not naming companies in the legislation obscures a fact revealed by The Post's analysis: The biggest beneficiaries of the rising tide of tariff-suspension bills are domestic subsidiaries of foreign corporations. Of the 10 companies that stand to benefit from the greatest number of bills examined in the study, eight are owned by or affiliated with German and Swiss chemical companies.

Companies linked to Bayer and Lanxess, for example, initiated more than 100 bills in the current session of Congress, records show. If passed, over the next two years the bills could cost the U.S. Treasury more than $44 million.

The Post's findings come at a time when pork-barrel spending in the form of congressional earmarks is drawing increasing criticism from the public -- and occasional attention from federal prosecutors. Meanwhile, tax breaks delivered to corporations in the form of tariff suspensions have gone largely without public notice.

The current session of Congress is on track to enact a record number of suspensions, the Post analysis found. Since the beginning of last year, legislators have introduced more than 1,400 bills seeking new or renewed tariff waivers or reductions.

"It's a huge number," said John Deming, a lobbyist for Ciba Specialty Chemicals, which the analysis shows has initiated more than 30 tariff-suspension bills in the past two years. "The chemical industry has always been doing this, and now other people are doing it. It's amazing this time, everybody understands how this works now."

Although suspensions are supposed to be shelved if competitors object, trade officials acknowledge that some smaller companies may never hear about the proposals.

"I was shocked when I saw how many there are, and I wondered how you could possibly keep abreast of what's proposed," said Kelly, the chemical executive.Congress's Tip Sheet

Tariffs have been around since the earliest years of the republic -- they funded the government long before income taxes. In the 19th century, legislators began using them increasingly to protect domestic businesses from cheap imports.

Tariff suspensions have a long history, too. Traditionally each suspension was introduced as a separate bill. Their popularity leapt 20 years ago when Congress decided to combine most of the unopposed suspension bills into one huge piece of legislation, to be passed quickly and unanimously at the end of each session. Today corporate lobbyists deliver a steady stream of proposed tariff suspensions to congressional aides, who use computer spreadsheets to track the avalanche of paperwork.

The last time Congress passed an omnibus bill, in 2004, budget analysts estimated that the waivers would result in at least $172 million in lost revenue. The next set of suspensions, slated for passage this fall, is looking much more costly.

Budget analysts estimate that the grab bag of tariff suspensions passed by the House in March, if approved by the Senate and signed into law, would cost taxpayers $278 million. Last month, in an unusual move, the Senate attached 262 of the suspensions to a pension bill. The rest, with an unknown number of the Senate's own proposals, are expected to be rolled into a miscellaneous tariff bill this month.

The House Ways and Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee review most of the bills in what members say is an attempt to weed out those too costly to the Treasury. Making the tariff suspensions temporary -- usually three years -- avoids interference with trade negotiations, aides said.

The process has become so standardized that Ways and Means has drawn up a tip sheet for companies to streamline the procedure. One tip says sponsors should "avoid using trade names for products." Instead, a product "should be described precisely" in the bill. That can help customs officials in the field identify obscure chemicals. But it also can mask which companies would benefit.

The Post analysis shows that some members of Congress went to bat repeatedly for their corporate constituents. At least 36 members of Congress have introduced five or more tariff-suspension bills in the current session.

Rep. Sue Myrick (R-N.C.) has introduced at least 34 such bills. She did not respond to interview requests.

South Carolina's Brown ranked second among House members, with 32 bills. Brown declined to be interviewed but issued a statement calling the suspensions "a budget-neutral means of promoting a positive economic climate."

Other leading bill sponsors in the House included Pennsylvania Republicans Tim Murphy and Phil English, each with 23, and Emanuel Cleaver (D-Mo.) with 21.

Murphy said in a statement: "American companies are being forced to pay duties on materials not available in the United States that they need. Eliminating these duties keeps American businesses globally competitive and thousands of jobs right here at home."Juggling the Ball Bills

Under guidelines set by Congress, each tariff suspension is supposed to cost taxpayers no more than $500,000 a year. Many proposals above the limit are rejected; others win approval anyway.

Some lawmakers adopt another strategy, The Post's analysis found.

On June 8, 2005, Rep. Richard E. Neal (D-Mass.) introduced a bill seeking to suspend the tariff on one small category of inflatable balls -- in this case, leather basketballs.

Before the day was over, Neal introduced a nearly identical bill covering rubber basketballs, another for synthetic basketballs, and another covering basketballs "other than leather, rubber or synthetic."

Still not done, Neal introduced yet another bill covering "certain volleyballs."

Neal returned the next day to introduce a final bill for what he described simply as "certain . . . inflatable balls other than basketballs and volleyballs."

Each change is supposed to be reviewed before passage by analysts at the trade commission. The analysts found that each of Neal's six bills would result in annual revenue losses that fell just below or somewhat above the guideline. Added together, however, the bills could cost $3.7 million a year.

In an interview, Neal said he was unaware of how much the bills would cost taxpayers, but he added, "I think it's really negligible."

The bills mention no beneficiaries, but Neal said he was asked to sponsor the suspensions by Spalding, a sporting goods maker in Springfield, Mass. "For a company in my district, I was happy to help," Neal said.

Neal's legislative director, Peg McGlinch, acknowledged that multiple bills were filed to avoid violating the $500,000 guideline. "That's why they split it up," she said. An aide on the Ways and Means Committee confirmed: "We advise people to do it that way."

Bryan Wolfe, customs director for Russell Corp., Spalding's parent company, said the tariff reductions would benefit a number of U.S. importers and would not hurt American manufacturers because most inflatable balls are made in China.

Provisions covering four types of balls were rolled into the Pension Protection Act of 2006, which President Bush signed into law on Aug. 17. The other bills remain pending.

There are many similar examples. Shoes of various stripes are the subject of at least 19 tariff-suspension bills. Payless ShoeSource Inc., listed as the proponent of the bills, did not respond to phone messages.

David Beck, acting director of the trade commission's tariffs office in Washington, said analysts have noticed the strategy. "Depending on how you look at it, it might not pass the sniff test," Beck said. He said Congress has been "pretty liberal on it."Overseas Winners

No government agency has calculated the economic impact of the tariff suspensions. Some corporations acknowledge keeping some or most of the savings, but many say consumers also benefit.

"Any ability we have to eliminate a 1 to 3 percent tariff and save a couple pennies for our consumers, we think is important," said Wal-Mart lobbyist Angela Marshall Hofmann, who previously helped oversee the process as an aide for the Senate Finance Committee.

Hofmann has written to lawmakers that Wal-Mart supports 41 current tariff-suspension bills but that "it is our understanding that these products are not manufactured in any commercially viable manner in the United States."

Lobbyists and lawmakers said many tariff suspensions aid small businesses. The savings "can be especially meaningful for a small company, or one struggling to stay afloat in the United States," Senate Finance Chairman Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) said in a statement.

But The Post's analysis of data from nearly 600 trade commission reports from this session of Congress found that the biggest winners are not small U.S. firms but rather domestic subsidiaries of European corporations.

During this session, eight foreign corporations alone have generated at least 277 tariff-suspension bills. The total is undoubtedly higher, since the Post study could not identify the corporate sponsors of many bills.

The analysis shows that various Bayer subsidiaries were the unnamed primary beneficiaries of more than 70 suspension bills covering imported chemicals, including the ingredients for aspirin. Over the next two years those suspensions would cost the Treasury more than $35 million on imports worth nearly $850 million. A Bayer spokesman would say only that Bayer expects other corporations to share in the savings.

Since 2000, Bayer's political committee has made campaign contributions totaling $951,000, according to the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics. In 2005 alone, Bayer and its U.S. affiliates spent $3.2 million on lobbying.Finding Competitors

To safeguard domestic producers, trade commission analysts try to identify U.S.-based companies that might make the products, then ask them whether the suspensions would be damaging.

But identifying affected companies that are small and based far from Washington can be difficult. The trade commission's Beck said that despite analysts' best efforts, they occasionally miss such firms. "It happens, but not very often," he said. "In the last 10 years I'd say I've seen one or two examples."

Grassley said his staff posts proposed suspensions on his committee's Web site and welcomes public comment. "Our process is transparent and well publicized," he said. "It probably isn't perfect, but no process is."

Kelly, general manager of R.T. Vanderbilt Co. of Connecticut, said it was largely luck when a colleague tipped off his firm about Brown's bill to suspend the tariff on Vulkanox ZMB, a chemical used in rubber production. Kelly's company produces a similar chemical at a Kentucky plant that employs more than 100 people.

The company dashed off a letter to the Ways and Means Committee, arguing that the waiver would give Lanxess, which imports Vulkanox, a competitive advantage and might force Vanderbilt to shut its factory.

"We do not understand why this legislation is needed, and its sponsor has not provided an explanation," the letter said. ". . . [T]he only result of the legislation would be windfall profits at our expense to the German, Indian and Chinese suppliers."

The letter also called it "ironic" that the European Union charges a 6.5 percent tariff on Vanderbilt's chemical.

Kelly said his company has no practical way to ensure another waiver does not slip through without its knowledge -- short of hiring a lobbyist just to keep watch.

"There maybe should be a higher bar on our elected officials on making clear why they want to do this," Kelly said.

Dungey, who co-owns Auburn Leathercrafters in Upstate New York, launched a one-woman campaign against four bills that would cut the 2.4 percent tariff on imported dog collars and leashes. She argued that anyone familiar with the industry would realize domestic producers would find the waivers "devastating."

She said she believes that Wal-Mart and other big importers count on U.S.-based manufacturers never learning about the obscure legislation. "A lot of people just don't have the time to devote to staying on top of it," Dungey said.

Wal-Mart officials said their only motivation is to save consumers money. While the dog-collar bills would cost taxpayers more than $9 million over the next three years, the company stressed that all importers would share the benefits.

The bills' legislative sponsor, Sen. Lincoln, said in a statement that she was pleased that the Senate process had allowed Dungey to raise objections. In response, Lincoln said, the measures have been removed from consideration.

Dungey said no one had told her the tariff suspension was dead. Had she not stumbled across the mention on a Web site and spent days on research, Dungey said, she is convinced the cut in tariffs would have passed without opposition -- and led to the end of her company.

DOJ_NMG_0066174

"The suspension is . . . just about long enough to put most of the small guys out of business," Dungey said. "I would have just shaken my head and said, 'How can Wal-Mart sell for this price?' "

Air Controllers Chafe At Plan To Reduce Staffing Levels (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

DALLAS, Sept. 13 — A drive by the Federal Aviation Administration to cut the number of air traffic controllers nationally by 10 percent below negotiated levels, and even more sharply at places like the busy radar center here, is producing tension, anger and occasional shows of defiance among controllers.

At the radar office that controls planes around Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport and at a cluster of other airports where staffing levels are falling fast, unhappiness is usually not visible in the darkened radar centers where they work, except when it is glaringly obvious.

Like the recent day when a controller here went to work in lime green pants and a clashing brown jacket, along with hair dyed blue, to protest a new dress code. Elsewhere, male controllers have rebelled by going to work in dresses.

Most controllers here say they are far more concerned with workplace changes that do not involve wardrobe, including salary caps, lower pay for new hires and stricter control of vacation schedules and sick leave.

The F.A.A. imposed the changes on Sept. 3, three months after it declared an impasse in contract talks. Most of the changes have had little effect on the public. But one in particular may have safety implications, controllers and some outside experts said. That is the ending of contractual protection against being kept working on a radar screen controlling traffic for more than two hours without a break.

The agency has been defensive about staffing rules since a plane crash on Sept. 1 in Lexington, Ky., in a case where the workload of the lone controller on duty violated policy.

Having just one controller on duty "degrades the safety net," said Pat Forrey, president of the National Air Traffic Controllers Association, "by not having another set of eyes and ears." Mr. Forrey and others make a similar argument about keeping controllers at their work stations in positions that require intense concentration for extended periods.

The president of the union local here, Michael Conely, said that with the number of controllers now scheduled, "you can't staff all the positions properly."

"You are on position longer, watching more airplanes, and it becomes a tired-eye syndrome," Mr. Conely said.

The aviation agency says that traffic is down in the Dallas region and that the goal is to "staff to traffic" and not to an arbitrary standard.

Controllers, who earn more than $100,000 a year, are too expensive to leave idle, the agency says, and nationally, it has a goal of gradually increasing each controller's workload 10 percent. The manager here, Dan Gutwein, said controllers spent five and a half hours a day at their radarscopes, up from four hours historically.

In an interview, the administrator of the agency, Marion C. Blakey, said the goal of the changes was to make the agency run more like a business.

"You can't serve an industry that's largely teetering on bankruptcy and ask for a bigger slice of the pie," Ms. Blakey said last month in a speech. Explaining why the dress code matters, Ms. Blakey said there are "folks who push outside the norms of what is professional dress and what's professional behavior."

The dress code bans jeans, as well as T-shirts and shirts with big lettering and requires that controllers not appear "disheveled," rules that are not onerous, she said.

Ms. Blakey is trying to reshape the agency as two-thirds of the controllers face retirement in the next 10 years. That bulge is a result of extensive hiring in the early 1980's to replace thousands of striking controllers whom President Ronald Reagan fired.

The controllers, many with two decades in positions in which they are entrusted with thousands of lives, say the changes make them feel trivialized. A cartoon that controllers circulated by e-mail shows a radar screen with two converging airplanes and a picture of a man's sneaker, banned under the new dress code. The caption asks which should be the priority.

The agency says the controllers' attire must not "erode public confidence," although most work in windowless rooms, out of public view. The lighting in the radar room here is so dim that it is not easy, at a glance, to tell whether controllers are wearing the now-banned sneakers or sandals.

Mr. Conely said in an interview that the dress code was about more than clothes.

"It's absolutely a power thing," he said. "They want to show they're in charge and this is how we're going to do it and if you don't like it quit."

Some controllers are convinced that quitting is what the agency hopes they will do. Under the new rules, their replacements will earn substantially less. By the union count, 86 controllers worked here as of Jan. 1. Ten have retired, the union says, with some leaving early because of the new rules.

In the late 1990's, the controllers and the agency negotiated a national staffing pact that called for 117 controllers here. The agency disagrees on the current count and says many changes that grate on controllers are needed for scheduling flexibility.

The agency says that controllers are no longer guaranteed two consecutive weeks of vacation and that vacations can be canceled at the last minute. Controllers scheduled to work on holidays can be called off a few hours before and lose the holiday pay.

Management also gave itself the flexibility to keep controllers on their scopes for more than two hours. Two hours is still the goal, but controllers can no longer file grievances if they are there longer.

A former controller, Craig Carlson, now a co-director of the Air Traffic Control Program at the University of North Dakota, which provides initial training in air traffic control, said, “When it’s really busy, it gets really taxing on you if you are sitting there for a full two hours.”

Referring to tougher schedules for controllers, John Cox, an aviation safety expert and a former safety official at the Air Line Pilots Association, said, “This is exactly what the airlines have done with pilots.”

“The airline pilots today are flying more hours, flying more days, and they are being more efficiently scheduled, and fatigue is an issue for them,” he said.

A longtime controller here said what the agency had done with the changes “feels awfully retaliatory.” The controller, who insisted on anonymity because of fears that managers would take offense, and others did say that some people had, in fact, abused sick leave, but that the remedy should not be rules that made everyone’s lives miserable.

Nonetheless, the controller said, he loved his work and would not quit despite significant pay cuts and the difficulty in planning vacations.

Excess Reserves Help Slow The Rise In Health-Care Costs (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, September 20, 2006

Health insurance premiums for federal employees will increase by an average of 1.8 percent next year, the lowest annual increase in the government's employee program since 1997.

Officials said they substantially slowed the rise in 2007 insurance rates by dipping into excess financial reserves of the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program, which provides about $33 billion in health-care benefits annually. They said the reserves had increased in recent months because insurance claims and other expenses had not grown as fast as estimated.

Next year, 63 percent of FEHBP enrollees "will see no increase in their premium," said Linda M. Springer , director of the Office of Personnel Management, which administers the program. "That is amazing."

She said 15 percent of the program's enrollees will see a premium increase of less than 5 percent.

The federal program will offer 284 plans next year and will provide insurance coverage to about 8 million Americans -- civil service and postal workers, retirees, and family members. The government picks up about 71 percent of premium costs in its role as an employer.

Next year, individuals will pay an average of $1.45 more per two-week pay period, and families will pay $3.13 more biweekly.

More than 56 percent of FEHBP enrollees are in two plans provided by the Blue Cross and Blue Shield Association, and Blue Cross enrollees will see their share of the premium drop or stay the same.

Enrollees in the Blue Cross standard option will pay $57.30 biweekly, 77 cents less than this year. Families covered by the standard option will pay $134.30 biweekly, $1.29 less.

The Blue Cross basic option, which requires enrollees to stay in the Blue network, will not raise premiums for the third consecutive year. The enrollee cost will be $37.99 for individuals and $88.99 for families on a biweekly basis.

Data provided by the OPM showed that $500 million will be drawn out of the program's cash reserves, bringing down next year's premium increase by 5 percentage points. Otherwise, federal employees and retirees could have faced a rate increase of 6.8 percent, in line with this year's premium rise.

The program's reserves "are more than adequate," Springer said. "Everything is financially sound here." Rate decisions "are not things that are manipulated," she said. "They are certainly not political."

The use of the program's reserves helped reduce rate increases next year for national fee-for-service plans, which are required to set aside money for contingencies. The program's health maintenance organizations do not build up reserves because they operate on fixed-price contracts each year, officials said.

As a result, the national plans' average premium will rise 0.3 percent, and HMOs will rise an average 6.3 percent.

Premium increases in the federal employee program usually are lower than the annual rate increases in other large plans. The California Public Employees' Retirement System, for example, plans to increase HMO rates by an average of 11.6 percent and premiums for preferred-provider organizations by 12.6 percent next year.

Tom Billet , a senior consultant with Watson Wyatt Worldwide in Stamford, Conn., said surveys show that most private-sector employees' premiums will increase by 9 to 10 percent next year.

"Even when companies are fortunate to have a low increase, we find they are choosing to pass along something more than that so that it will be consistent with their long-term message -- health-care costs are high and that people should act responsibly to control them," Billet said.

DOJ_NMG_0066176

Springer also said enhanced dental and vision benefits will be added to the federal benefits package next year. Premiums will vary by plan and by region, she said.

House To Big House (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, September 20, 2006

With Rep. Bob Ney's (R-Ohio) guilty plea on federal corruption charges last Friday and a stint in prison looming for the lawmaker, the House suddenly finds the ranks of its alumni behind bars growing to a level not seen in a decade.

When Ney heads off to prison, likely sometime next year, he will become the fourth Member to be locked up for criminal behavior, and the Ohio Republican may not be the last. Ney will join ex-Reps. James Traficant (D-Ohio), Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.) and Frank Ballance (D-N.C.), all of whom currently are being held in federal correctional facilities. Ney will appear in front of a federal judge on Oct. 13 to formally plead guilty to conspiracy and making false statements.

Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) could join this group of disgraced Members soon. Jefferson is at the center of a federal bribery probe that already has resulted in lengthy prison terms for two men involved in the scandal, including Brett Pfeffer, a former Jefferson aide. Jefferson has not been charged in the case and has repeatedly denied any wrongdoing, but FBI agents turned up $90,000 in marked bills in Jefferson's freezer when they searched his home last year.

In fact, not since the early 1990s, when the House Bank, Post Office and Page scandals were roiling Capitol Hill and prematurely ending dozens of political careers, have so many lawmakers been in prosecutors' sights.

From 1993 to 1996, 10 Members went to prison for varying lengths of time, and at least four, and possibly as many as six, were imprisoned at the same time, according to media reports. The list of jailed lawmakers included House stalwarts such as Rep. Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.), the powerful chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. The stench of corruption emanating from the Democrat-controlled House helped Republicans win control of the chamber in 1994, and they immediately instituted a reform agenda that included new restrictions on lobbyists and gifts to lawmakers and staff.

Rep. Jay Kim (R-Calif.), convicted in 1997 for campaign finance violations, barely avoided jail time and instead was sentenced to two months of electronic home detention when he should have been out on the re-election trail. Kim was defeated in a GOP primary in 1998.

There were so many ex-Members in the slammer during the 1990s that Roll Call, at that time, debuted the "Jailbird Caucus" to help its readers keep track of who was in, and who was out, of prison.

A decade earlier, the Abscam scandal of 1980-81 ended up landing six House Members and a Senator in prison, and the seven served contemporaneous prison sentences between one and three years.

Unlike previous periods when scandals plagued Congress, the current wave of corruption convictions does not involve a single thread of illicit behavior, although the Abramoff affair still has the potential to spread on Capitol Hill. So far, seven individuals, including Ney and Abramoff himself, have pleaded guilty or been convicted in that investigation. Adam Kidan, Abramoff's business partner in the purchase of a Florida cruise ship company, also has pleaded guilty to fraud charges not directly tied to the Washington, D.C., scandal.

Rather, up until this time, it is a series of smaller scandals involving individual lawmakers and their donors, staffers and families, that has brought down Members.

Two current Democratic lawmakers, Reps. Jan Schakowsky (Ill.) and Juanita Millender-McDonald (Calif.), even have close family members behind bars.

Robert Creamer, Schakowsky's husband, is incarcerated in the Federal Correctional Institution in Terre Haute, Ind., where he is serving five months for bank fraud and failure to pay withholding taxes as part of a check-kiting scheme. Creamer, who is scheduled to be released on Nov. 9, also will have to serve 11 months of home detention.

Roderick Keith McDonald, Millender-McDonald's son, is serving a 41-month prison sentence for mail fraud, money laundering, bribery and conspiracy to extort. He will be released on Dec. 31, 2008.

Ballance's son, Garey, a former judge, was just released from federal prison on Aug. 31 after serving a nine-month sentence for tax evasion. The younger Ballance failed to pay taxes on a $20,000 gift from his father.

Ney, who signed onto a plea agreement with federal prosecutors last week after nearly two years of denials, is expected to receive the lightest sentence of any of the incarcerated pols. Justice Department officials have agreed to recommend a 27-month term for the Ohio Republican. Ney is currently in an alcohol-abuse treatment center receiving counseling for what he called a "dependency" problem.

Ballance was sentenced to four years in prison for fraud and money laundering related to more than $300,000 in state funds that Ballance steered to a North Carolina nonprofit he controlled. Ballance is not scheduled to be released from federal custody until June 2009, according to the U.S. Bureau of Prisons.

Ballance, who served one term in the House after nearly 20 years in the North Carolina Legislature, recently applied to have his conviction overturned, although a federal appeals court asked him to resubmit his application because it wasn't filed on the proper form. Ballance argues that federal prosecutors "wired" his case by threatening family members, including his 86-year-old mother, with jail terms unless he cooperated with the FBI. He also alleges that prosecutors "made false and/or misleading answers to the court about alleged evidence in my case," according to a legal document filed by Ballance.

Cunningham, whose case has kicked off a wider investigation by the Justice Department into spending earmarks and government contracts, received eight years and four months — the longest prison term ever meted out to a former lawmaker — for taking more than $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors, as well as tax evasion and fraud. Cunningham's sentence is set to expire in June 2013.

Traficant, who was convicted of bribery, fraud and racketeering in 2002, among other charges, was sentenced to eight years in prison. He will be in prison until at least September 2009.

Scandals Play Varied Roles In Midterm Races As Election Day Nears (RC)

By Louis Jacobson

Roll Call, September 20, 2006

In recent months, the ranks of Out There's periodic scandal checklist have thinned significantly.

Since we last assessed the vulnerability of politicians facing ethical allegations, five people have vanished from our list.

Four besieged politicians were given the heave-ho by voters: Rep. Cynthia McKinney (D-Ga.), Alaska Gov. Frank Murkowski (R), Georgia lieutenant governor candidate Ralph Reed (R) and ex-Alabama Gov. Don Siegelman (D) all lost primaries this summer. A fifth, Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), bowed out of the re-election campaign as a federal probe into his ties with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff intensified; last week he pleaded guilty to charges stemming from that case.

In addition to making these changes, we've also streamlined the list a bit. We've removed Ohio Gov. Bob Taft (R), who's not running for re-election; his potential

Republican successor, Secretary of State Ken Blackwell, has seen his race turn largely on issues unrelated to any personal role in the state GOP's corruption scandal. We've also temporarily removed embattled Kentucky Gov. Ernie Fletcher (R) because he does not face the voters until 2007.

But that leaves plenty of names on our scandal checklist. Here's the rundown.

Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.)

Jefferson has notched a minor victory or two in his legal challenge to the FBI's unprecedented search of his Rayburn House Office Building suite on May 20, but most observers suspect that an indictment over bribery allegations is only a matter of time.

Risk factor: high. Jefferson has maintained his innocence, but he already has serious primary challengers, and if he doesn't step down first, he could well lose.

Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.)

Though not much new has been made public about the ties between Burns and Abramoff, the issue continues to dog him back home in Big Sky Country. Burns has acknowledged that language favorable to an Abramoff client, the Saginaw Chippewa Tribe of Michigan, was included in a spending bill he was responsible for, though Burns said the language was added without his knowledge.

Risk factor: medium-high. We've moved Burns' vulnerability up a notch, given the tough challenge he's facing from Democrat Jon Tester, who can nearly match Burns' good-ol'-boy persona but without the ethical baggage. Burns hasn't helped his cause by committing a series of gaffes, most notably his intemperate outburst at out-of-state crews fighting forest fires. But don't count him out yet.

Wisconsin Gov. Jim Doyle (D)

Both the U.S. attorney in Milwaukee and state prosecutors are reviewing possible links between campaign donations and state contracts. While Doyle has not been directly implicated so far, the media are having a field day with the corruption issue, and a legal bombshell that affects the governor is certainly considered possible.

Risk factor: medium. While Doyle is narrowly ahead in most polls, the continuing scrutiny has kept him under 50 percent. The general environment isn't good either: In addition to Doyle's problems, the voters are in a funk over scandals in the Legislature (which have affected both parties) as well as the troubles of another key statewide Democrat, Attorney General Peggy Lautenschlager, who was convicted for drunken driving after running a state car into a ditch and lost her primary earlier this month.

Despite a ruling by the state ethics board requiring him to return more than $400,000 in campaign donations, Rep. Mark Green (R) has earned good marks as a candidate, outraised Doyle during the previous quarter and is in the odd position of seeming cleaner for being in Washington, D.C., than in Madison. Unless Doyle improves his game, Green could slip into the governor's chair.

Sen. Bob Menendez (D-N.J.)

Menendez comes from Hudson County, a jurisdiction known for its old-fashioned machine politics. In early September, federal prosecutors subpoenaed documents related to a Hudson County community center that received federal funding and once paid Menendez rent.

Risk factor: medium. Menendez, an appointee to the Senate, already faced a tough race for an elected term against state Sen. Tom Kean Jr. (R), and he hasn't been helped by the malaise surrounding the man who appointed him, freshman Gov. Jon Corzine (D). Now, with federal subpoenas public, Kean and the media finally have a hook for discussing Menendez's ethics.

Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich (D)

Blagojevich, who successfully campaigned against the corruption scandals surrounding his now-convicted Republican predecessor, George Ryan, continues to be the subject of federal investigations. Chicago-based U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald has said, in a letter to state Attorney General Lisa Madigan (D), that he has found "very serious allegations of endemic hiring fraud" in the administration. And the FBI is looking into allegations by the wife of his former campaign treasurer that involve a state job supposedly bought with a check made out to one of the governor's children.

Risk factor: medium. Blagojevich's ethical position probably has eroded as the year has gone on, but his political outlook hasn't suffered as much as one might expect. In an independent poll released earlier this week, he led by 30 points, partly because Republican nominee Judy Baar Topinka has been running an underwhelming (and underfunded) campaign. Voters seem, at best, blasé about Blagojevich, but in a Democratic state and a likely Democratic year, he could well survive, despite his predicament.

Rep. Don Sherwood (R-Pa.)

Last year, Sherwood, who's married, acknowledged a long-running extramarital affair and settled a $5.5 million lawsuit with his former mistress.

Risk factor: medium. In the May 16 Republican primary, political neophyte Kathy Scott held Sherwood to 56 percent, leading Democrats to work harder to elect Penn State Worthington Scranton political science professor Chris Carney, a lieutenant commander in the Naval Reserve and a counterterrorism expert. But while Democrats feel good about their chances of toppling Sen. Rick Santorum (R) and a couple of House Republicans from the Keystone State, the Sherwood seat remains out of the spotlight, overshadowed by the rest of Pennsylvania's competitive contests this fall. In a district that gave President Bush 60 percent of the vote in 2004, Carney may not be able to win without a more concerted Democratic effort.

Rep. Alan Mollohan (D-W.Va.)

An investigative report released by a conservative activist group and referred to the Justice Department accused Mollohan of underreporting financial assets and steering federal earmarks to entities he founded or controlled. Mollohan has denied any wrongdoing, though he did step down as the House ethics committee's ranking member.

Risk factor: medium. While little new and dramatic has emerged about Mollohan's troubles since they first came to light, the allegations are serious, and Republicans are putting their hopes on state Del. Chris Wakim (First lady Laura Bush made a visit to Fairmont — Mollohan's home — to stump for Wakim). But with poll data scarce, opinion in West Virginia continues to predict that Mollohan will survive, given the 12-term incumbent's record of delivering for his district, his social conservatism, his continued support from key business leaders and an endorsement from the National Rifle Association. In addition, Wakim has taken a hit for allegations that he inflated his résumé.

Rep. Charles Taylor (R-N.C.)

Taylor has faced a number of ethical questions in the past, most notably during investigations into Blue Ridge Savings Bank, which he founded in 1978. Hayes Martin, the bank's former president, was convicted in 2001 and alleged that Taylor was involved in bank fraud and money laundering. But Taylor vigorously denied those allegations, and he was never questioned, much less charged, in the case.

Risk factor: medium-low. Taylor occupies one of those House seats that is considered a reach for Democrats if a wave develops. But if the Democrats don't crest high enough here, Taylor has the personal wealth and the record of delivering to his district to be able to beat Heath Shuler (D), a political novice who gained fame as a quarterback at the University of Tennessee and in the NFL.

Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.)

The powerful House Appropriations chairman is facing fallout from the bribery case involving former Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.). The Justice Department is looking into the relationship between Lewis and several lobbyists who passed through the Congressional-K Street revolving door, including former Rep. Bill Lowery (R-Calif.), Jeff Shockey and Letitia White. Earlier this year, Roll Call reported that Lewis dropped the salary that White, then an aide on the panel, earned before she joined an appropriations-oriented lobbying firm, which made it possible for White to sidestep lobbying barriers and begin a lucrative career more quickly.

Risk factor: medium-low. Lewis' relatively secure status owes more to his lack of serious electoral opposition than to his legal situation. The continuing drip-drip of revelations about the sweet deals worked out with his current and former staffers suggests that the investigation could be a long and difficult one for the California Republican as he looks toward 2008.

Rep. John Doolittle (R-Calif.)

Aside from an Abramoff-related subpoena to Doolittle's wife, Julie, the questions surrounding Doolittle — who serves on the House Appropriations Committee and as Republican Conference secretary — have been raised only in the media. Beyond Abramoff, Doolittle's name has come up in connection with Cunningham and an alleged Cunningham co-conspirator, defense contractor Brent Wilkes. Doolittle has denied any suggestion of wrongdoing.

Risk factor: low. If prosecutors have Doolittle in their sights, they've been awfully quiet about it. And unless an investigation rapidly snowballs, Doolittle, a seasoned fundraiser, seems unlikely to lose to retired Air Force Lt. Col. Charlie Brown (D), despite a late-August poll commissioned by Brown that had Doolittle up by just 2 points.

Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.)

Several ex-aides claim that Conyers forced them to perform campaign work on government time, to baby-sit his children and to tutor his wife for law school. Conyers has denied any wrongdoing.

DOJ_NMG_0066179

Risk factor: low. The ethics committee so far has shown no interest, and Conyers faces only nominal opposition in November. If the Democrats take over the House on Election Day, Conyers can look forward to becoming the Judiciary chairman.

Check back after Election Day and we'll see who survived.

Congress Is Ignoring Ethics, Voting Problems; So What Else Is New? (RC)

By Norman Ornstein

Roll Call, September 20, 2006

You can't make this stuff up: Republican leaders in the House found another way to deep-six any serious ethics and lobbying reform, on the very same day that prosecutors heralded the sorry end to the career of Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) and documented the sordid list of activities that has led him to a prison term.

Speaker Dennis Hastert (Ill.), Majority Leader John Boehner (Ohio) and Rules Chairman David Dreier (Calif.) decided to take up and pass a laughable sham of an earmark "reform" and hoped that nobody would notice it is neither serious nor a reform. They concocted a fig-leaf rules change that provides disclosure on earmarks, but one that does not encompass all or most earmarks, that is not at all certain to stay in place and that provides no protection against chicanery in earmarking, including last-minute lawmaking and lawmakers or their family members exploiting the system for personal gain.

The promises made by Hastert after the Jack Abramoff scandal broke — specifically that his party would lead the fight to enact sweeping lobbying reform — were dropped like a hot rock as soon as the public scrutiny eased, which strongly suggests that the intent of the Speaker was to deflect public outrage, not significantly change the status quo.

Boehner, too, kicked off his campaign to become Majority Leader by proclaiming his credentials as an original reformer — a charter member of the "Gang of Seven" that shamed the chamber over its excesses under Democratic rule. But then he turned his reform campaign into an anti-reform campaign once he saw that Members had no interest in making serious changes.

Ever since, the energies of the leadership have gone to minimizing change in the House. The Senate is no better. So far at least, it hasn't even felt the need to pass a sham reform.

The earmark culture has careened out of control. The wheeling and dealing of staffers enriching themselves and others as they exploit the revolving door is shocking, with Exhibit A being the House Appropriations Committee under Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.).

As time goes on, more lawmakers will be spotlighted, and probably some will be directly investigated. We have pitifully inadequate lobby disclosure rules and pitifully weak ethics procedures. The leaders may be right; voters will not make this their major issue this fall. But surely there is more at stake than how voters feel. The integrity of Congress, anyone? Doesn't anybody in power care about that?

With that off my chest — yet again — I want to turn this column's attention to another outrage, namely the integrity of the voting system as we approach critical elections. One week ago Tuesday, bright and early (way early for me) at 6:45 a.m., I was waiting expectantly at my neighborhood school in Chevy Chase, Md., for the polls to open at 7 so I could do my civic duty before tooling down to Capitol Hill for a 7:30 appointment. But 7 came and went; at 7:15, an embarrassed poll worker came out to the crowd and said they could not find the cards to activate the touch-screen machines. I left, as did many others — a few apparently to catch planes. I was able to get back before the polls closed that evening, but others clearly did not, or could not, return to vote.

Montgomery County has long prided itself as a bastion of civic responsibility — a role model in its voting processes. This was a meltdown, and one that was echoed, to varying degrees, in other parts of the state. Could there be a bigger or clearer wake-up call to the potential disaster that awaits us in the general elections?

The House majority is up for grabs; the most likely outcome is a House that will be within a handful of seats either way. And there very likely will be a half-dozen or more seats that are within a couple hundred votes or less. So here is a nightmare of nightmares: The House hangs in the balance, and the districts that make the difference cannot do recounts because there is no paper trail; the paper trail in jurisdictions that have it find huge discrepancies between it and the numbers recorded on the machines; screw-ups like Montgomery County's, or worse, disenfranchise large numbers of voters and make any outcome seem less legitimate; jurisdictions across the country lack established procedures for handling disputed elections and get mired in litigation or gridlock; and partisan election officials (à la Florida Republican Rep. Katherine Harris) make decisions that produce outcomes that are questionable at best.

This is not fanciful; it is all too real. And the reality would be even worse than the litany above suggests. All of the horrors above actually could occur with machines that are widely considered to be benign and safe from any corrupting influences. But we do not have such machines.

To all who have not yet done so, I urge you to look at the video of Princeton University researchers corrupting a widely used Diebold voting machine in less than one minute and creating a virus that alters results, spreads from one machine to another and corrupts the whole network, and disappears without a trace after the elections are over. The same computer scientists, led by Edward Felten at Princeton's Center for Information Technology Policy, discovered by chance that the "lock" protecting these machines can be opened by the key used by hotels to open mini-bars, keys that also can be purchased widely on eBay.

Diebold reacted to this news in the way that it and the other manufacturers of voting machines always react — they attacked the scientists. These companies have no interest in the integrity of elections, only in selling as many machines as they can and squelching any doubt about their efficacy.

The problem, of course, goes beyond the machines. There's also the lack of resources and professionalism in election administration around the country, which makes it easy to produce the kinds of screw-ups like we had in Montgomery County. Apparently, the checklist of equipment to be sent to each polling place failed to list the cards — a low-tech snafu if there ever was one.

The new machines are operated in most places by veteran volunteer poll workers who all too often are technologically challenged. (One test that ought to be applied before a poll worker is brought aboard is to see if he or she can turn the flashing 12:00 on a VCR to the actual time of day.)

A study by experts of voting in the 2006 primary in Cuyahoga County, Ohio, where touch-screen machines with paper trails are used, found huge differences in results between the machines' internals and the paper trails — and they found that many of the Smart Cards that record precinct results got lost on the way to the central office, resulting in incomplete results.

At the same time, the level of confidence in the election system is low, partisan tension is high, and Congress has been absent without leave as this problem looms. Brace yourselves: Troubled as its election was, we could end up looking with envy at Mexico.

Intense Dislike Of The President Remains Evident In The Polls (RC)

By Karlyn Bowman

Roll Call, September 20, 2006

One of the most notable features of polling about President Bush has been the intensity of the opposition to him.

In a September NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll, 36 percent said they had "very negative" feelings about the president. Since September 2005, more than three of every 10 respondents have expressed this view in the poll.

In the new poll, 23 percent had a "very positive" feeling about the president. His overall numbers were 42 percent positive, 49 percent negative.

In the meantime, ABC News asks respondents whether they approve or disapprove of the way the president is handling his job, then asks them whether they approve or disapprove strongly or somewhat. In the latest poll, 42 percent said they approved and 55 percent said they disapproved.

The poll found that the intensity of feeling was on the negative side as 43 percent disapproved strongly. Since June 2005, more than four in 10 have strongly disapproved of the job the president is doing.

An Aug. 30-Sept. 2 Opinion Research Corporation/CNN poll found that 30 percent thought Bush should be impeached and removed from office, while 69 percent thought he should not be.

CNN and Time asked the identical question seven times about former President Bill Clinton. In two September 1998 polls, 29 percent (the highest response) thought he should be impeached and removed. Bush's current ratings are similar to Clinton's in the fall of 1994.

Congressional Leaders. In an NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll, 50 percent of respondents didn't know of or weren't familiar with House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). Of the remainder, 15 percent had positive feelings and 23 percent negative ones.

As for Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), 55 percent were unfamiliar with him, with 13 percent positive and 15 percent negative.

Fifty-seven percent didn't recognize the name of Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) or have an opinion about him; 10 percent were positive, 18 percent negative.

And 38 percent were unfamiliar with Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), while 21 percent had positive feelings about him and 23 percent had negative ones.

Congressional Decision Time. One-quarter of likely voters told Fox News/Opinion Dynamics interviewers in mid-September that they already had decided whom they would vote for in November. Twenty-six percent of Democrats and 31 percent of Republicans said they have made up their minds.

Confidence in Rumsfeld. Thirty-one percent of respondents in a Sept. 8-11 NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll had positive feelings about Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, while 43 percent had negative ones (including 32 percent who felt very negatively about him). In January, feelings about Rumsfeld were 39 percent positive and 34 percent negative. In the September poll, 44 percent thought he should resign because of his handling of the war, while 46 percent did not.

In a Sept. 5-7 ABC News poll, 42 percent approved of the way Rumsfeld was handling his job, with 49 percent disapproving. His current rating is slightly better than his rating in December, when 35 percent approved and 53 percent disapproved. In a Sept. 8-11 Harris Poll, 38 percent rated him as doing an "excellent" or "good" job compared to 58 percent who said he was doing only a "fair" or "poor" job.

Gasoline Prices. With the recent decline in gasoline prices, the issue has lost some of its potency, polls show. In a Sept. 5-7 ABC News poll, 5 percent of respondents cited gas prices as the top issue driving in their vote, down from 15 percent in August.

In a Sept. 6-10 Pew Research Center Poll, 7 percent mentioned energy, gas or heating prices as the most important issue facing the country, down from 14 percent in May. When people were asked in the same poll about how often 11 different topics come up in their conversations with friends and family, 75 percent said gas prices came up frequently. More than 70 percent of Democrats and Republicans talked about them frequently. The next closest topics nationally were Iraq, the economy and education. For each of those three topics, 54 percent of respondents said they discussed the issue frequently.

Imprisoning Suspected Terrorists. In a September NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll, 54 percent of respondents said the Bush administration had taken the right course of action in its imprisonment and treatment of suspected terrorists and foreign fighters, with 34 percent saying the administration had gone too far.

A Royal Heir. In March and April, when the Pew Research Center interviewed Japanese adults about whether there should be a change in the Imperial Household Act to allow females to ascend to the imperial throne, 76 percent were in favor and only 19 percent were opposed. Men were more opposed than women were, at 26 percent compared to 13 percent.

Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi has endorsed a change in the law. But the birth of a male heir in early September reduced the urgency of the issue, leaving the fate of the proposal unknown.

All The King's Earmarks (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, September 20, 2006

Willie Stark would have had a good laugh.

Stark is the archetypal politician at the center of Robert Penn Warren's "All the King's Men." Not so loosely modeled on Louisiana's Depression-era governor and senator, Huey Long, he embodies the essential grittiness of politics and its inevitable corruptions, large and small.

One morning last week, I went to see the new film version of "All the King's Men." (Sean Penn plays a somewhat over-the-top Willie Stark.) So Stark was on my mind later that day as I watched members of the House of Representatives debate how to stop themselves -- or, more accurately, how to appear to stop themselves -- from spending money on pet projects.

The subject was earmarking, a practice whose attractions Willie Stark would have instantly understood. Earmarking is a polite term for the federal slush funds available to lawmakers to direct as they see fit, currying favor with constituents and contributors.

Stark would have been a champion earmarker. "I'm going to build me the God-damnedest, biggest, chromium-platedest, formaldehyde-stinkingest free hospital and health center the All-Father ever let live," Stark vows in the book.

And he has no doubt what he plans to name his project: "I'm going to call it the Willie Stark Hospital and it will be there a long time after I'm dead and gone and you are dead and gone and all those sons-of-bitches are dead and gone."

And so Stark, as I said, would have found the congressional debate a hoot. Because this charade of earmark reform involved lawmakers forcing themselves to take credit for their earmarks -- in essence, engaging in the legislative equivalent of naming the hospital after themselves.

Under the new rule, some -- but not all -- earmarks will require that the sponsoring lawmaker be identified. Big whoop. The problem with the most egregious earmarks isn't that the public doesn't know who's behind them. It's that the patrons are completely unabashed about the pork they are pushing.

Exhibit A: Alaska Sen. Ted Stevens's tirade on the Senate floor against efforts to take away funding for his "bridge to nowhere."

Exhibit B: the entire state of West Virginia, crammed with the earmarked products of the Senate Appropriations Committee's senior Democrat. To wit, the Robert C. Byrd Federal Building and Courthouse in Charleston (not to be confused with the Robert C. Byrd Federal Building and Courthouse in Beckley); the Robert C. Byrd Expressway (not to be confused with the Robert C. Byrd Freeway or the Robert C. Byrd Bridge); the Robert C. Byrd National Technology Transfer Center at Wheeling Jesuit University (not to be confused with the Robert C. Byrd Science and Technology Center at Shepherd University or the Robert C. Byrd Technology Center at Alderson-Broaddus College). "I don't care if you list the members who sponsor earmarks. I put out press releases on every one of them," Rep. David Obey (D-Wis.), the ranking Democrat on the House Appropriations Committee, said in explaining how ineffective this change would be.

That didn't stop the House leadership from congratulating itself. "Today is an important day for the House as an institution," pronounced Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio). Perhaps, in the sense that it showed how resistant the chamber is to any deviation from business as usual.

So resistant, in fact, that the writers of large checks, also known as the House Appropriations Committee, greeted this minor incursion on their power with howls of outrage. They were being unfairly singled out for abuse, the appropriators bleated behind closed doors; the new rule would still let the tax writers and the authorizers get away with their special-interest shenanigans.

By all accounts, this indignation was heartfelt, in the "they do it too" way that a 6-year-old punished for popping someone on the playground is sincerely outraged that his friend wasn't busted for the same offense. Yet you have to question whether the canniest of the appropriators don't recognize how easily they got off.

It brought to mind the scene in "All the King's Men" in which the narrator, reporter-turned-fixer Jack Burden, ponders whether Stark really had been the gullible rube he seemed when the two first met in the backroom of Slade's pool hall.

Burden recalls his introduction: "Willie's hand gave mine three decorous pump-handle motions, and he said, 'Glad to meetcha, Mr. Burden,' . . . and then, I could have sworn, he gave me a wink. Then looking into that dead pan, I wasn't sure."

DOJ_NMG_0066182

Years later, Burden tries to find out. " 'Well, Boss,' I demanded, 'did you or didn't you wink at me?' " Stark, for his part, is deliberately noncommittal. " 'Boy,' he said, and smiled at me paternally over his glass, 'that is a mystery. . . . Suppose I just had something in my eye?' " I wonder: Did the appropriators wink? Or was there just something in their eyes?

New-Home Starts Sink As Sales Slow, Inventories Rise (WSJ)

By Rafael Gerena-Morales

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

Construction starts on new homes plunged last month as builders curtailed production in response to mounting inventory and slowing sales.

The Commerce Department reported yesterday that housing starts dropped 6% in August from a month earlier to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1.665 million units. That was the fifth decline in construction starts in the past six months and the slowest rate of starts since April 2003. When compared with a year earlier, construction starts were down 19.8%.

The weak housing report helped send stocks lower yesterday, with the Dow Jones Industrial Average falling 14.09 to 11540.91.

WAITING FOR THE FED

David Wessel, The Wall Street Journal's deputy Washington bureau chief, says there's a lot of disagreement over where Fed will go with interest rates this year. While central-bank officials emphasize inflation risk, Wall Street is worried about a slowing economy. Listen to David Wessel's NPR interview2.

Construction starts on single-family homes fell 5.9% in August from a month earlier and declined 20.6% from a year earlier, the government report showed. Housing starts for multifamily homes with five or more units fell 8.2% in August from the previous month and declined 16.9% from a year earlier.

The Commerce Department report also showed that building permits -- a barometer of future construction activity -- fell 2.3% to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1.722 million in August when compared with the month before and were down 21.9% in August from a year earlier.

It is "pretty darn clear that ... we're in a pretty substantial downswing here," said David Seiders, chief economist of the National Association of Home Builders. Developers "can't keep bringing new supply on the market until [home] inventories come down and affordability is restored. The downside risk of [housing] to the real economy should be getting a lot of attention."

Yesterday's report on construction starts and building permits comes on the heels of a pessimistic reading on the home-builder association's confidence index, which was released Monday. The index indicated that home builders feel pessimistic about housing-market conditions and are likely to cut construction activity further for the rest of the year. The association reported Monday that its sentiment index for U.S. sales of new, single-family homes fell in September to 30 from 33 in August, indicating that most builders think the housing market is in poor shape. The housing index, compiled by the NAHB and Wells Fargo, was at 65 a year ago. A reading of 50 would indicate builder sentiment was balanced between good and poor.

Phillip Neuhart, an economic analyst with Wachovia Corp. in Charlotte, N.C., said the pullback in housing-construction activity will likely trim economic growth in the second half by at least 0.5 percentage point. The NAHB's Mr. Seiders said the slowing housing market could shave second-half economic growth by as much as a full percentage point. The 56 economists surveyed in WSJ.com's September survey said they expect economic growth averaging roughly 2.7% during the second half.

Amid a national housing boom, residential-construction activity contributed at least 0.5 percentage point to economic growth in 2004 and 2005, according to government data. However, a slowing housing market subtracted 0.63 percentage point from economic growth in this year's second quarter. "That's a dramatic swing" from previous years that is likely to worsen, Mr. Neuhart says. In the housing sector, "we expect choppy waters for the rest of the year."

Meanwhile, inflation pressures on the producer, or wholesale, level moderated last month -- offering welcome news for the economy. The Labor Department said its producer-price index for finished goods rose a seasonally adjusted 0.1% last month, matching July's increase. Producer prices in August were 3.7% higher than a year earlier, on an unadjusted basis, down from July's year-over-year increase of 4.2%. Core producer prices, excluding food and energy, fell 0.4% in August from a month earlier, in part because of a steep decline in automobile prices. The August decline in core producer prices was the sharpest drop since April 2003 and the second-straight monthly slide.

"We're not going to get these types of [auto-price] declines every month," said Joshua Shapiro, chief U.S. economist at consulting firm MFR Inc. Nonetheless, yesterday's data underscoring a cooling housing market and easing inflation "offer an overall message of comfort to the Fed. There's no incentive for them to do anything right now" with interest rates.

Separately, the Federal Reserve reported yesterday that the total net worth of U.S. households rose 0.1% to $53.33 trillion in the second quarter, marking the 15th consecutive quarterly increase. That was up from the revised first-quarter figure of $53.27 trillion, the Fed said in its quarterly "flow of funds" report. Meanwhile, the Fed reported that U.S. household debt grew at a seasonally adjusted annual pace of 9.1% in the second quarter, as "home-mortgage debt slowed to a single-digit pace for the first time in several years." U.S. household debt grew at a 9.6% annualized rate in the first quarter.

In US Housing Slump, Wider Concerns Rise (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

The Christian Science Monitor, September 20, 2006

These are tough times for the people who use hammers and nails to build the American dream - and those who employ them.

In some markets, buyers have gone missing - glued to their money in the expectation that home prices will fall. Desperate, sellers and developers are trying to sweeten their deals to unload McMansions and houses built on speculation. Now comes the news that new construction on homes has fallen so sharply that some economists use the "R" word when they talk about the housing market - and warn about what that might mean for the economy as a whole.

"Housing's in a recession, there are no two ways about it," says Paul Kasriel, chief economist at Northern Trust Co. in Chicago. "Typically when we get declines in housing of this magnitude, with a lag, the economy goes into recession. There have been exceptions, but not many."

Tuesday gave economists more cause for concern. The government reported new home starts fell 6 percent in August compared with July.

New home construction is now down about 20 percent compared with last year. There are seven months of unsold homes waiting for buyers - a record number.

The housing slump won't be welcome news in Washington when the Federal Reserve meets Wednesday to set interest-rate policy. Partly because of the problems in the housing sector, economists expect the Fed to leave interest rates unchanged as it did last month.

"Housing is a big worry for the Fed," says Scott Brown, chief economist at Raymond James & Associates in St. Petersburg, Fla. "At the start of the year they expected an orderly decline, but this summer the market started to fall apart."

Despite the drop in the housing market, many economists continue to forecast that the economy as a whole will weather the slump. Retail sales and employment remain healthy. Gasoline prices have fallen almost 50 cents a gallon in the past month. The Dow Jones Industrial Average is close to its all-time highs.

"It does not appear the bottom will fall out by any means," says Peter Morici, a professor at the University of Maryland School of Business in College Park. "I think lower oil prices - they are now down $15 a barrel - have taken any further slowdown off the table."

Economist Stuart Hoffman echoes this optimistic view. He says business will get a boost from exports as the rest of the world's economy grows. He notes that commercial construction, road work, and new warehouses are improving and will partially offset the drop-off in housing.

"You have to look at where housing is coming from," he says. "We knew it was frenzied in terms of starts and sales. But compared to the last few years, this would be considered a normal year."

However, Mr. Kasriel says, there is no clear sign of a bottom in housing. In July the number of homes for sale rose 35 percent while the number of new homes sold fell 15 percent. "We haven't seen such a wide disparity since 1984, when these data started," he says.

Despite these numbers, some economists are predicting the housing market will start to stabilize. David Wyss, chief economist at Standard & Poor's, is forecasting new housing construction will fall 25 percent from 2005 levels. He expects some overly hot markets will see prices fall. Nationally, he anticipates home prices will flatten out.

"We're in the stage now where people are beginning to lower their price or take what they can," he says. "The third stage wrings out the excesses. A year from now will be the best time to buy."

To move houses, real estate developers are trying to entice buyers with some unusual efforts. Indianapolis-based Davis Homes is straddling the line between builder and real estate agency. For a fee, Davis will buy a customer's old home if it isn't sold by a certain amount of time. The strategy frees the customer from shouldering two mortgages on two houses - and it helps Davis sweeten its deals for building new homes.

"It's just another avenue to get clients to their new home," says Cathy Epps, director of the company's Guaranteed Sale program. "Whoever thought of it, I think it was a great idea."

Alongside the Guaranteed Sale program that Ms. Epps directs, Davis also helps potential customers spruce up and sell their homes so they can buy new ones.

U.S. Economy: Housing Starts, Producer Prices Fall (BLOOM)

By Bob Willis And Courtney Schlisserman

Bloomberg, September 20, 2006

Sept. 19 (Bloomberg) -- Housing construction in the U.S. fell to a three-year low and a measure of wholesale prices dropped, increasing speculation the Federal Reserve is done raising interest rates through year-end and possibly beyond.

DOJ_NMG_0066184

Housing starts plunged 6 percent last month to an annual rate of 1.665 million, the Commerce Department said today in Washington, a steeper slide than economists forecast. Prices paid to U.S. producers excluding food and energy declined 0.4 percent from July, the Labor Department said, marking the first back-to-back monthly drop since the end of 2002.

The slump in housing, which fueled growth for half a decade, is now so deep that it raises concerns the rest of the economy will be dragged down with it. Today's price figures suggest the Fed isn't under any pressure to resume raising interest rates following 17 consecutive increases that ended in June. Treasury notes jumped and stocks fell.

``Right now, it's just housing that's slowing, but this can spread to the rest of the economy very quickly,'' said Chris Low, chief economist at FTN Financial in New York. ``It should be absolutely clear to the Fed that they've done enough.''

Fed policy makers meet tomorrow and will keep their benchmark lending rate at 5.25 percent for a second month, according to all 109 economists surveyed by Bloomberg News.

Building permits dropped to an annual rate of 1.722 million from 1.763 million the prior month. Not since May to November 1986 have permits declined seven straight months.

Economists expected starts to fall to an annual rate of 1.746 million from an originally reported 1.795 million pace in July, based on the median of forecasts in a Bloomberg survey.

Recession Risk

``In the past couple of months we've watched the growth side, housing in particular, deteriorate faster than anybody expected,'' said Gregory Miller, chief economist at SunTrust Banks Inc. in Atlanta. ``I'm not ready to raise the flag to start calling a recession, but there's clearly a risk.''

Miller predicts the Fed will lower borrowing costs next year.

Diminishing increases in home prices helped bring the smallest gain in household net worth in four years last quarter, the Fed reported today. Total net worth rose $54.1 billion to a record $53.33 trillion in the second quarter, the central bank said in its Flow of Funds report.

Borrowing rose at an annual rate of 6.4 percent from April through June, the smallest increase since the first quarter of 2002, the Fed report showed.

Producer Prices

In a sign of easing inflation, overall prices paid to producers rose 0.1 percent for a second month in August, the Labor Department said. Economists surveyed by Bloomberg News expected a 0.3 percent rise.

New-home sales dropped in July and inventories of unsold new homes rose to a record, the Commerce Department said on Aug. 24, leaving builders with little choice but to cut construction and offer incentives to spur demand.

Bonds notes rallied with the yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note dropping 8 basis points to 4.73 percent at 4:11 p.m. in New York. The Standard & Poor's Supercomposite Homebuilding Index retreated 1.7 percent to 622.71, while the S&P 500 dropped 2.9 points, or 0.2 percent.

`Unsustainable' Expansion

Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson told his counterparts at a Group of Seven meeting in Singapore on Sept. 16 that they needn't worry about a housing-led collapse of the world's largest economy. The real-estate market is cooling from an ``unsustainable'' expansion, he said.

Construction of single-family homes declined 5.9 percent in August to a 1.36 million rate, the slowest since February 2003, the Commerce Department said today. New construction of multifamily homes, such as townhouses and apartment buildings, fell 6.7 percent to an annual rate of 305,000.

Starts fell in all regions but the Northeast. They decreased 12 percent in the Midwest to 267,000, the lowest since December 2000; 6.1 percent in the South to an 833,000 pace; and 5.5 percent in the West to 410,000. Starts rose 5.4 percent in the Northeast to a 155,000 pace.

Industry Incentives

Wells Fargo & Co. Chief Executive Officer Richard Kovacevich said yesterday that the housing market is probably weaker than economic data suggest because homebuilders are using ``very significant incentives'' to attract buyers.

``We will see, over the next five to six months, inventories increase quite substantially'' as that strategy becomes less successful in tempering the decline in demand for new homes, Kovacevich, whose bank is the second-biggest U.S. mortgage lender, said at a conference in San Francisco.

Builder confidence is suffering. The National Association of Home Builders/Wells Fargo said yesterday that its index of builder optimism fell this month to the lowest level in 15 years. The Standard and Poor's 500 Homebuilding Index, made up of five of the largest U.S. builders, has fallen by more than a quarter this year, the second-worst performance among S&P 500 industry groups.

Lennar Corp., the second-largest U.S. homebuilder by market value, on Sept. 8 said profit fell in the fiscal third quarter for the first time in six years.

DOJ_NMG_0066185

``The U.S. housing market has continued to deteriorate," Stuart Miller, Lennar's president and chief executive officer, said in a statement. ``Given difficult market conditions, we have limited our land purchases while we have remained focused on even flow production and minimizing completed inventory."

Home sales will probably drop 8 percent this year and another 2 percent next, according to a National Association of Realtors forecast issued Sept. 7.

Median existing home prices will rise 2.8 percent this year to $225,900 after rising 10.5 percent in 2005, the Realtors forecast. Home prices in some months this year may dip below year-ago levels, the Realtors forecast.

The group's measure of housing affordability fell in July to its lowest level since 1989 as mortgage rates increased and home prices edged up.

Home construction in the second quarter subtracted more from economic growth than at any time since the first three months of 1991, according to the Commerce Department. The slowdown in the real estate market is also producing smaller gains in home prices that may remove a source of strength for consumer spending as fewer home owners refinance.

Oil Trades Near Six-Month Low On Rising Stockpiles, Iran Talks (BLOOM)

By Gavin Evans

Bloomberg, September 20, 2006

Sept. 20 (Bloomberg) -- Crude oil traded near a six-month low in New York after plunging yesterday on signs rising fuel stockpiles and protracted negotiations over Iran's nuclear program have prompted investment funds to cut their holdings.

Oil posted its biggest fall in four months after U.S. President George W. Bush said he will give European diplomacy a chance to end the dispute with Iran, the world's fourth-biggest oil producer. A government report later today will probably show U.S. fuel stockpiles, already above average, extended their gains of the past month.

``The mentality of the market has changed," said Mark Waggoner, president of Excel Futures Inc. in Huntington Beach, California. ``We've got rising stockpiles, the summer driving season is over" and worries about Iran are ``falling by the wayside."

Crude oil for October delivery was at $61.78 a barrel, up 12 cents, in after-hours electronic trading on the New York Mercantile Exchange at 10:03 a.m. in Singapore.

The contract, which expires today, fell $2.14, or 3.4 percent, to $61.66 a barrel yesterday, the lowest close since March 21 and the biggest one-day decline since May 15.

The more actively traded November contract was at $62.25, up 8 cents, in after-hours trading, after falling 3.7 percent yesterday.

Oil futures reached a record $78.40 a barrel on July 14. Prices have fallen 21 percent the past two months as U.S. stockpiles rose and the United Nation's Aug. 31 deadline for Iran to stop uranium enrichment passed without sanctions being imposed.

French Initiative

French President Jacques Chirac yesterday proposed the suspension of plans for sanctions against Iran if the Islamic republic also suspended its enrichment during negotiations.

The U.S. agrees with the French strategy and will ``come to the table," once Iran has suspended its enrichment, Bush said yesterday. The U.S. has ``no objection" to Iran's pursuing of a truly peaceful nuclear power program, he said.

``The Bush speech was tame relative to what a lot of us expected," Nauman Barakat, senior vice president of global energy futures at Macquarie Futures USA Inc. in New York, said yesterday. He ``appears to have moved to the European position."

Hedge funds may also be selling futures after seeing others lose money in the energy market and as the pace of the decline in oil has accelerated, analysts and traders said.

``We can't know that for sure, but I think some of that probably is happening," Excel's Waggoner said. ``The trend is now down and you go with the trend."

Amaranth

Amaranth Advisors LLC, a hedge-fund manager overseeing about $9.5 billion, told investors Sept. 18 that its two main funds fell an estimated 50 percent this month because of a plunge in natural-gas prices.

``The Amaranth debacle has spread to other markets to an extent," Aaron Kildow, a broker at Prudential Financial Derivatives LLC in New York, said yesterday.

Hedge-fund managers and other large speculators have cut their bets on rising oil prices for each of the past four weeks, according to the Commodity Futures Trading Commission.

Net long positions, the difference between bets on rising prices and bets on falling prices, fell by 22 percent to 37,020 contracts in the week ended Sept. 15. Short positions rose to their highest since March 14.

``These funds can go short as quickly as they went long," Jason Schenker, an economist with Wachovia Corp. in Charlotte, North Carolina, said yesterday. ``I think the most important thing at the moment is how lush product inventories are."

Stockpiles

An Energy Department report today will probably show U.S. supplies of distillates, including diesel and heating oil, rose by 1.8 million barrels last week, their sixth straight gain, based on the median estimate from a Bloomberg News survey of 16 analysts.

DOJ_NMG_0066186

Inventories held 144.6 million barrels the week before, 12 percent more than the five-year average for the period.

Gasoline supplies probably rose for a fifth week, gaining 650,000 barrels according to analyst survey. Inventories held 207 million barrels on Sept. 8, 3.8 percent higher than the five-year average.

Gasoline for October delivery was at $1.5090 a gallon in after-hours trading, after falling 4.8 percent to $1.5038 yesterday, the lowest close since Feb. 22.

October heating oil was at $1.6980 a gallon, after falling 2 percent to $1.6916 yesterday, the lowest close since March 10.

Wall Street Dips On Mix Of Negative News (FT)

By John O'Doherty

Financial Times, September 20, 2006

Wall Street finished lower on Tuesday as investor confidence was soured by data showing a precipitous drop in housing starts, a warning on profits from internet group Yahoo, and news of a possible coup in Thailand.

Yahoo slumped 11.2 per cent to $25.75, erasing eight weeks of gains, after its chief financial officer said the company's quarterly results would be at the bottom end of a previously forecast range, due to slowing advertising demand.

The news also dragged down other internet stocks. Google shed 2.6 per cent to $403.81, and Ebay sank 3.3 per cent to $25.95.

Crude oil prices tumbled, as high inventories helped ease supply worries. The front-month Nymex contract lost 3.2 per cent to $61.66 a barrel, its biggest single day decline since May. Valero slid 4.3 per cent to $50.10, and Devon Energy lost 3.8 per cent to $64.32.

Mining stocks were also hurt by falls in copper and gold prices. Barrick Gold sank 4.1 per cent to $28.76, and Freeport McMoran also slipped 4.1 per cent to $51.26.

Semiconductor group Maxim Integrated Products lowered its revenue and earnings guidance for the fiscal first quarter due to sluggish orders. Its shares fell 4.9 per cent to $29.84. The stock has fallen 17 per cent since the start of the year.

Time Warner announced that its strategy of not charging its AOL broadband subscribers access fees was succeeding in attracting new internet users. Its shares rose 1.5 per cent to $17.3 9.

At the close, the S&P 500 was down 0.2 per cent, or 2.87 points, at 1,318.31, while the Nasdaq Composite was down 0.6 per cent, or 13.38 points, at 2,222.37. The Dow Jones Industrial Average dropped 0.1 per cent, or 14.09 points, to 11,540.91.

The producer price index – a measure of inflation at the wholesale level – fell more than expected in August, boosting investor confidence that further interest rate increases were not on the horizon.

However, housing starts fell 6 per cent in August, more than twice as much as expected. The steep decline in housing starts followed a report on Monday that sh owed confidence among homebuilders at a 15-year low.

Uncertainty deepened after the Thai military was reported to have declared martial law and to have announced a suspension of the constitution.

Pharmaceuticals group ImClone Systems tumbled 4.5 per cent to $29.16 after a New York judge ruled that three Israeli scientists from the Yeda research institute were the true inventors of a process used to create its cancer drug Erbitux.

"Last night's development is the worst possible scenario for ImClone, since Yeda, as sole inventors, might be entitled to large-sum damages," said Yaron Werber of Citigroup, who reiterated a "sell" rating on the stock.

U.S. Stocks Fall On Yahoo Forecast, Signs Of Housing Slowdown (BLOOM)

By Allen Wan

Bloomberg, September 20, 2006

Sept. 19 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. stocks retreated, snapping the Nasdaq Composite Index's longest winning streak in eight months, as slowing advertising growth at Yahoo! Inc. and a drop in home construction suggested the economy is losing momentum.

Yahoo, the most-visited U.S. Web site, tumbled 11 percent and spurred losses in technology shares. Toll Brothers Inc. led declines among homebuilders, the market's worst performers this year aside from Internet companies.

Stocks reached the day's lows after Thailand's military seized control of the country and the prime minister declared a state of emergency. While prices rebounded in afternoon trading, an inflation report that suggested the Federal Reserve will keep interest rates unchanged tomorrow failed to reassure investors.

``The market's vulnerable," said David Briggs, senior vice president of equity trading at Federated Investment Management in Pittsburgh, which has $30 billion in stocks. ``People begin to wonder about the psyche of the average consumer and how it might slow up the economy."

The Standard & Poor's 500 Index fell 2.87, or 0.2 percent, to 1318.31. Energy shares had the biggest drop among the benchmark's 10 industry groups as oil tumbled to a six-month low. The Dow Jones Industrial Average lost 14.09, or 0.1 percent, to 11,540.91.

Nasdaq's Drop

The Nasdaq fell for the first time in eight days, declining 13.38, or 0.6 percent, to 2222.37. The gauge last rose for seven consecutive sessions in the period ended Jan. 11.

DOJ_NMG_0066187

Stocks opened lower after the government said a glut of unsold homes spurred a 6 percent plunge in housing starts. Losses accelerated after Yahoo said its profit and sales will be at the low end of its forecasts this quarter and Thai military chiefs took the capital.

Shares of mutual funds that invest in Thailand dropped in U.S. trading. Thai Fund Inc. fell 3.8 percent to $8.65 after earlier tumbling as much as 7.1 percent. Thai Capital Fund Inc. lost 4.4 percent to $9.70.

The housing report, along with Yahoo's forecast, raised concern that corporate profits may slow and supplanted confidence that the Fed will keep interest rates at 5.25 percent tomorrow for the second straight meeting after raising them for two consecutive years.

Yahoo Slumps

Yahoo plunged $3.25 to $25.75 for the biggest decline in the S&P 500.

Profit and sales this quarter will be at the low end of the company's forecast range on slower advertising demand from automakers and financial services companies, Chief Financial Officer Susan Decker said. It was Yahoo's biggest retreat since July 19.

Other Internet shares declined. Google Inc., the most-used Internet search engine, slid $10.88 to $403.81. Monster Worldwide Inc., owner of online job-listing service Monster.com, plunged $2.83 to $37.10. IAC/InterActiveCorp, an Internet and media company run by Barry Diller, was down 45 cents at $27.97.

Oracle Corp. rose $1.48, or 9.2 percent, to $17.61 in extended trading. The world's third-largest software maker said profit excluding some costs was 18 cents a share in the first quarter, beating a 16-cent estimate by Rick Sherlund, an analyst at Goldman, Sachs & Co. The shares fell 12 cents to $16.13 in regular trading.

Toll Brothers

Toll Brothers, the biggest luxury homebuilder, slumped 74 cents to $27.42. Pulte Homes Inc., the largest homebuilder by market value, slid 46 cents to $31.61.

The Commerce Department said builders started work on homes at an annual rate of 1.665 million last month, after a 1.772 million pace in July. Economists forecast 1.746 million.

``The lower-than-expected housing starts data raised the specter that the economy is slowing deeper than thought, corporate profits may slow and that stocks are not as fairly valued as investors thought they were," said Ken Tower, chief market strategist at CyberTrader Inc.

In a separate report, the Labor Department said producer prices rose 0.1 percent in August, matching the July increase. Economists had forecast a 0.3 percent gain. Excluding food and energy, prices dropped 0.4 percent, following a 0.3 percent decline in July. Economists expected a 0.2 percent increase.

About five stocks retreated for every three that rose on the New York Stock Exchange. Some 1.5 billion shares changed hands on the Big Board, 1.6 percent less than the three-month daily average.

Energy Stocks

A measure of energy stocks retreated 1.6 percent. Exxon Mobil Corp., the world's biggest oil company, declined 80 cents to $65.50.

Crude oil for October delivery fell 3.4 percent to $61.66 a barrel in New York, the lowest since March 21, after President George W. Bush said he will give diplomacy a chance to end a dispute with Iran over the country's nuclear program.

Micron Technology Inc. slid 39 cents to $17.74. Shares of the largest U.S. maker of computer-memory chips are expensive after price gains over the last several months, according to Citigroup Investment Research. Analyst Glen Yeung cut the stock to ``hold" from ``buy."

Dow Jones & Co., publisher of The Wall Street Journal, cut its third-quarter earnings forecast because of declining ad revenue at the paper. Profit will be as much as 11 cents a share, excluding a tax benefit of about 7 cents and severance costs of 1 cent. The company earlier forecast per-share profit in the ``low teens." The shares fell $1.08 to $32.79.

Icahn's Move

ImClone Systems Inc. plunged $1.36 to $29.16. The biotechnology company lost a court ruling that may result in the company paying royalties on its experimental cancer drug Erbitux to an Israeli research institute.

Billionaire financier Carl Icahn is also poised to gain control of one-third of ImClone's board and push to replace management. ImClone investors will vote on his board appointment at the company's annual meeting tomorrow.

Walt Disney Co. rose 41 cents, or 1.4 percent, to $30.47 for the biggest advance in the Dow. Chief Executive Officer Robert Iger expects the second-largest U.S. media company to sell $50 million worth of movies on Apple Computer Inc.'s iTunes Web site this year.

AutoZone Inc. added $4.57, or 4.9 percent, to $98.67 for the top gain in the S&P 500. The largest U.S. seller of auto parts had net income of $2.92 a share last quarter, beating the average analyst estimate of $2.79, according to Thomson Financial.

S&P 500 shares, called Spiders, fell 33 cents to $131.81. Nasdaq-100 tracking shares, known by their QQQQ symbol, slipped 26 cents to $39.85.

S&P 500 futures expiring in December lost 3.70 to 1330.50 on the Chicago Mercantile Exchange. Nasdaq-100 Index futures sank 10 to 1642.50.

The Russell 2000 Index, a benchmark for companies with a median market value of $596 million, fell 0.5 percent to 725.45. The Dow Jones Wilshire 5000 Total Market Index, the broadest measure of U.S. shares, retreated 0.3 percent to 13,170.14. Based on its decline, the value of stocks fell by $42.8 billion.

Fed Will Likely Pause On Interest Rates; Analysts See End Of Tightening (MCT)

By Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, September 20, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Federal Reserve is expected to leave interest rates unchanged Wednesday for a second straight month, and many analysts now think there won't be any more rate increases this year.

If true, that's good news for consumers, since the Fed's increases in the benchmark federal funds rate, an overnight rate that banks charge each other, influence a broad array of bank loans to consumers and businesses.

Falling oil and gasoline prices, along with a steeper-than-expected drop in new housing starts, are combining to reduce inflationary pressures that push up prices throughout the economy. The Fed's main job is to keep inflation in check. It now appears that the Fed's pause last month, which left the fed-funds rate at 5.25 percent after 17 consecutive quarter-point rate raises, may have ended the credit-tightening cycle that began in June 2004.

"I think we've probably seen the peak in terms of the Fed tightening. I think the economy will be soft enough for the second half of the year that over time it will help curb inflationary pressures," said Martin Regalia, chief economist of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and former Fed staffer.

When the Fed paused on Aug. 8, it issued a statement indicating that monetary policymakers believed the slowing U.S. economy would remove enough inflationary pressures to make another rate increase essentially overkill. The Fed said it wanted time to gauge the effects of its previous rate hikes, which take time to affect the economy.

Two months ago, crude oil cost more than $70 a barrel, and other raw materials were in hot demand globally and therefore were pricey. These trends drove up inflation, or the general rise of prices across the economy.

But in recent weeks, prices for oil, gasoline and many commodities have fallen sharply. And on Tuesday, the Commerce Department reported that housing starts dropped 6 percent in August to an annualized rate of 1.665 million.

That's the lowest rate in more than three years and a steeper plunge than most economists expected. Since housing drives much of U.S. economic activity, the slump points to a slowing economy. While a hot economy fans inflation, a slowing one douses it, reducing pressure on the Fed to raise rates.

"My view is we're done, and we'll have enough slowness brought on by the housing market and related consumer spending that they are probably cutting rates by the first quarter of next year," said Keith Hembre, the chief economist for First American Funds in Minneapolis.

It all depends, however, on whether energy prices spike up again and whether consumer and producer prices continue their downward trend. Both have been at the high end of the Fed's perceived tolerance zone.

The Labor Department reported Tuesday that wholesale prices are moderating but have been rising at a 3.7 percent annualized rate. Consumer prices are up 3.8 percent over the past 12 months.

But when the volatile energy and food sectors are stripped out, annual wholesale inflation stands at 0.9 percent, well within the Fed's comfort zone of 2 percent or less. Core consumer prices remain more problematic, rising by 2.8 percent from August 2005 through August 2006, but they now appear to be moderating.

"It seems highly unlikely that conditions change enough to put the Fed back in play," Hembre said.

Gauge Of Inflation Falls In August (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

A widely watched gauge of inflation fell again in August, providing fresh evidence that prices, which have climbed steadily for most of the year, may now be settling down.

The Labor Department reported today that the producer price index, which measures the wholesale prices that businesses charge one another, rose just 0.1 percent overall, matching the slowest pace of growth seen so far this year.

More tellingly, the so-called core index, excluding the volatile prices of food and energy, declined in August, as it did in July.

Adding to the weight of evidence that the economy is cooling, a separate statistical report showed further weakness in the housing market, with housing starts and new building permits both declining.

DOJ_NMG_0066189

It was the inflation data, however, that surprised economists the most. Few had predicted that the core index would decline in August; it had been rising about 0.3 percent a month for most of the year, and the July decline of 0.3 percent might have been an anomaly. But the Labor Department said today that the core index fell 0.4 percent in August.

The August results helped lower the annual wholesale inflation rate to 0.9 percent, the first reading below 1 percent since early in 2004.

The Federal Reserve, which had ratcheted up interest rates steadily for two years in an effort to rein in inflation, stopped doing so only last month, with its key overnight lending rate at 5.25 percent. Together, today's statistics and a report last week that consumer-price inflation is moderating give the Fed some breathing room to leave interest rates untouched again when its policy committee meets tomorrow.

Certainly, standing pat is what many economists expect the Fed to do. "The unexpected 0.4 percent decline in core P.P.I. in August is more good news on the inflation front," wrote Capital Economics this morning in a research report. "Today's data provides more evidence, if any were needed, that rates are on hold and the next move will be downwards."

Mickey Levy, chief economist with the Bank of America, said today's report will further reinforce the public perception that inflationary pressures are easing. "It changes the psychology of inflation," he said. "It gives a boost to the consumer at exactly the right time, when housing clearly has downside momentum."

Today's data also showed that prices of goods in the early stages of the production chain are not increasing as quickly, a sign that wholesale prices could continue to moderate in future months.

But the link between producer prices and consumer prices is never a direct one, so it is unclear how much the decline in wholesale price increases in August will affect consumer prices in the coming months.

"Businesses still have some pricing power," Mr. Levy said, adding that he thinks consumer prices will be little changed.

Federal Judges Take Steps To Improve Accountability (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 19 — The federal judiciary's top leadership responded Tuesday to criticism from Congress and elsewhere about asserted lapses in judicial ethics by announcing several steps aimed at enhanced self-policing and greater public accountability.

All federal judges below the Supreme Court level will be required to install "conflict checking" software on their computers to avoid unwittingly participating in cases in which they have a financial interest. Such software has recently become available but is not being used widely by federal judges, said Judge Thomas F. Hogan, who leads the executive committee of the Judicial Conference of the United States, which took the action at its semiannual meeting at the Supreme Court.

The conference, a group of 27 judges led by the chief justice of the United States, sets policy for the federal courts, but its jurisdiction does not extend to the Supreme Court.

The conference also adopted a policy on the attendance by federal judges at educational seminars sponsored by outside groups, the source of considerable controversy in recent years.

Judges will be prohibited from accepting reimbursement for attending a private seminar unless its sponsor has filed a public disclosure statement on the content of the program and all sources of financing. Judges will have 30 days to report their attendance at such seminars, and both the judges' and the seminars' reports will be available on judicial Web sites. The policy does not apply to bar association activities.

Federal judges have been criticized for attending expenses-paid seminars on economic and environmental issues sponsored by business-oriented groups that oppose much government regulation. Since 2000, bills have been introduced in Congress to ban judges' attendance at private seminars.

The conference has opposed the legislation as raising concerns of free speech and the separation of powers. In 2001, Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist denounced it in a speech as "antithetical to our American system."

Douglas T. Kendall, a leading critic of judges' attendance at private seminars, called the new policy "a dramatic change for the better."

Mr. Kendall, executive director of Community Rights Counsel, a public policy group here, has pursued the issue for years, at one point publicizing the names of more than 200 judges who had taken trips sponsored by business interests. In an interview on Tuesday, he said the new policy was a "very positive development that should have a significant effect on this practice."

Separately on Tuesday, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. endorsed a report proposing improvements in the handling of individual complaints against federal judges under the Judicial Conduct and Disability Act of 1980. The report was the product of a six-member committee, led by Justice Stephen G. Breyer, that Chief Justice Rehnquist set up two years ago.

The 1980 law established a complex and decentralized system for dealing with complaints from members of the public that a judge had "engaged in conduct prejudicial to the effective and expeditious administration of the business of the courts." Complaints are initially reviewed by each federal circuit's chief judge, who has considerable discretion in how to proceed.

Justice Breyer's committee found that while the bulk of routine complaints, about 700 a year, were handled properly, there was an "error rate" of nearly 30 percent in nonroutine cases, those in which complaints against judges had attained some degree of public visibility. That error rate was "far too high," the report said in recommending various steps for dealing with the problem.

One proposal was to encourage chief judges to refer sensitive cases to another of the 13 federal circuits. Others dealt with better education and training for the chief judges, who serve seven-year terms and thus may encounter only a handful of serious complaints in their tenure.

With Justice Breyer by his side, Chief Justice Roberts briefed reporters on the 183-page report, describing it as a "very important step on the judiciary's behalf in responding to criticism."

With some members of Congress calling for an inspector general to police the judiciary, many federal judges have grown increasingly concerned about the judiciary's public image and what they perceive as threats to the tradition of judicial independence. Earlier this year, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg called the independent counsel proposal "a really scary idea."

A clear if unspoken theme of the presentation on Tuesday was that judges were capable of policing themselves. Referring to Congress, Judge Hogan told reporters, "I would hope they would let us handle our own matters."

Justice Breyer described his committee's work as a "direct response" to criticism about lapses in judicial discipline. "The criticism turned out to be constructive," he said, adding that while the system was not "riddled with problems," it needed improvement to maintain public confidence.

Federal Judges Get New Disclosure Rules (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, September 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — The nation's federal judges will be required to disclose their attendance at corporate-sponsored seminars within 30 days of such programs, under rules approved Tuesday by the Judicial Conference of the United States.

The conference, the policymaking arm of the federal judiciary, also voted to require judges to use computer software that identifies cases in which a judge might have a conflict of interest and should not participate.

The moves are designed "to maintain public confidence in the system," said U.S. District Judge Thomas Hogan, a member of the 27-judge conference. He said it was important to have "transparency" in judges' off-bench activities.

Separately Tuesday, Chief Justice John Roberts released the results of a two-year study on how court circuits handle complaints of judicial misconduct. The study, led by Justice Stephen Breyer, found that about 30% of certain "high-visibility" claims — those that had been subject to considerable media attention — had been mishandled. The study recommended ways for judges to improve responses to such complaints.

The actions apply to all 875 life-tenured federal judges except the nine-member Supreme Court, which is exempt from the Judicial Conference rules but generally bound by ethical canons. The moves come as judges have been subject to increasing complaints on a range of matters. Among them: whether judges are sufficiently vigilant about possible conflicts of interests or appearances of impropriety in accepting privately financed travel, and whether they are policing their own.

Critics have included members of Congress — notably House Judiciary Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., who has proposed that an "inspector general" be created for the judiciary to investigate waste, fraud and ethical violations. Among outside groups that have been most critical of judges is the Community Rights Counsel, which has questioned whether some judges have been influenced by corporate-backed outings.

The Judicial Conference's most significant action was requiring judges to disclose their attendance at privately financed seminars within 30 days of a program, rather than waiting to do so on their annual financial disclosure filings. The conference said judges may attend such seminars only when sponsors have made public the companies and other sources supporting them, the topics to be covered and the names of the speakers.

Federal Judges Step Up Disclosure (AP-Y)

By Mark Sherman

AP, September 19, 2006

Federal judges decided Tuesday to require faster and fuller disclosure of their expense-paid trips, a response to criticism that the travel could undermine the public's faith in an impartial judiciary.

The nation's 2,200 federal judges also will have to use computer software that is intended to make it easier for them to identify and step aside from cases in which they have a financial conflict.

The changes were made by the Judicial Conference of the United States, a 27-judge body led by Chief Justice John Roberts that met at the Supreme Court.

Roberts also released a report from a committee headed by Justice Stephen Breyer that found problems in the way judges have handled high-profile complaints against their colleagues. Mistakes in these matters "might discourage people with legitimate complaints from filing them," Breyer said in a briefing for reporters in which he was joined by Roberts.

DOJ_NMG_0066191

The work represents an aggressive effort by the Roberts-led federal judiciary to demonstrate its responsiveness to public criticism and ward off proposals in Congress to clamp down on judicial ethics through a travel ban or creation of an ethics watchdog for the court.

"I'd hope they'd let us work on our situations, as they come up, ourselves," said Chief Judge Thomas Hogan of U.S. District Court in Washington, the chairman of the Judicial Conference's executive committee.

Under the new trips policy, sponsors must reveal in advance who is paying for a judge's travel to private seminars. The information is to be posted on the judicial branch's Web site.

Judges may not accept travel from sponsors who refuse to disclose the information.

Then, within 30 days of the end of the program, judges must file a report about the trip. Local court Web sites will have the information.

Until now, judges have had to report their expense-paid travel in their annual financial disclosures.

The new rules will not apply to the Supreme Court, which has no written ethics rules and is not covered by the Judicial Conference.

The attention to judges' travel has increased in recent years with reports in 2004 that Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia went duck hunting with Vice President Dick Cheney as the court was considering Cheney's appeal in a records secrecy case. Scalia refused to step down from hearing the case.

A liberal-leaning environmental organization, the Community Rights Counsel, also has produced records showing that cigarette-makers and oil companies gave money to two conservative groups that host seminars for judges.

The groups, the Foundation for Research on Economics and the Environment in Bozeman, Mont., and the Law and Economics Center at George Mason University in Virginia, have said that corporate money they receive is not linked to the seminars.

Doug Kendall, executive director of the Community Rights Counsel, said the new travel policy sends "an unmistakable message to judges that they need to be careful, that they need to think long and hard before attending a junket."

Computer software for identifying financial conflicts has been around for years, but Hogan said that judges had found it cumbersome. A new version is easier to use, he said.

Judges, including Supreme Court justices, are required by law to stay out of cases in which they have a financial stake. Members of the high court, however, decide for themselves when to recuse with no oversight.

The conflict issue arose during Supreme Court Justice Samuel Alito's confirmation hearings. Alito, then a judge on the 3rd Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals, failed to disqualify himself from participating in a Vanguard case in 2002 despite having investments in Vanguard mutual funds.

Alito and his backers offered differing reasons for his inaction, including a computer glitch in conflict-checking software.

New Rules Mean Shift Toward Accountability For Judiciary (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 20, 2006

Responding to complaints about judicial junkets and conflicts of interest, the Judicial Conference on Tuesday enacted new rules to force judges to use conflict-checking software and to promptly disclose their participation in privately sponsored seminars for which they are reimbursed.

Separately, a committee headed by Supreme Court Justice Stephen Breyer issued a report recommending modest changes in how federal courts handle ethical complaints that members of the public file against judges. Among the recommendations is what Breyer described as a "Dutch uncle approach," whereby judges would seek advice on handling certain complaints from judges of another circuit to avoid "home court" bias.

Together, Tuesday's actions represent a major shift toward accountability -- or at least transparency -- from segments of a branch of government that has often resisted both.

Judges also hoped to defuse pressure from Congress, primarily in the person of House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., who has proposed creating an inspector general's office to oversee the judiciary's handling of ethical complaints. The late Chief Justice William Rehnquist appointed the Breyer Committee in 2004, mainly in response to congressional complaints.

"Issuance of the two policies and the Breyer Committee report are responsive to these concerns," says University of Richmond law professor Carl Tobias. "If the judiciary does not police itself, Congress may well attempt to do so in ways that judges may find troubling."

Tuesday's focus on judicial ethics comes on the eve of the Sept. 21 hearings by the House Judiciary Committee that could lead to the impeachment of California federal trial Judge Manuel Real, which would be the first judicial impeachment since 1989.

Chief Justice John Roberts Jr., in a rare impromptu press conference at the Court, applauded both of Tuesday's moves and urged federal judges to take "prompt action."

Significantly, none of what happened Tuesday affects the Supreme Court itself. The Judicial Conference never sets policy for the high court, and Breyer, speaking at the same press conference, said the scope of his committee's study of disciplinary procedures did not include the Supreme Court. As a result, it appears the justices have still not taken action on a 1993 recommendation by a blue-ribbon government commission that the Court consider establishing procedures for handling complaints against its own members.

Breyer said his committee concluded that, overall, the handling of ethical complaints by lower federal courts "does not suggest a serious problem," but a better job needs to be done in some instances, especially in the handling of complex complaints that receive media attention.

The Judicial Conference actions could have the most immediate impact on privately sponsored seminars other than those hosted by bar associations and judicial education groups.

Under the new rules, judges will be barred from accepting reimbursement for seminars hosted by organizations that do not publicly disclose their funding sources, speakers' names, and other information. Once they attend, judges will have to publicly disclose their attendance on their court's Web site within 30 days.

"The new junket rules are a pretty dramatic change of course for the judiciary, and they send a clear statement to judges that they should think twice before attending junkets," Doug Kendall of the Community Rights Counsel said Tuesday. Kendall's group has repeatedly criticized judges for attending seminars funded by companies with an interest in influencing how judges handle economic and environmental cases.

One of the targets of Kendall's criticism has been the Montana-based Foundation for Research on Economics & the Environment (FREE), which has hosted hundreds of federal judges in the past 15 years. It asserts that none of the funding for its judicial seminars comes from any corporate entity or any foundation that participates in federal litigation.

"I've seen the requirements, and everything they ask for, we've been doing voluntarily," says FREE Executive Vice President Pete Geddes. "FREE is happy to do anything it can to reassure the public about the integrity and independence of the judiciary."

The conference's action on conflict-checking software reflects the concern that many judges don't think it works well and have not put it to use. Now they will have to, said D.C. District Court Chief Judge Thomas Hogan, head of the conference's executive committee.

Hogan told reporters his software reminds him of a potential conflict of interest every time a party named Johnson appears before him. That, he said with a laugh, is because he and his wife own stock in the medical company Johnson & Johnson.

McAuliffe To Join Clinton (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, September 20, 2006

Former Democratic National Committee Chairman Terry McAuliffe has told business associates and Democratic donors that he will chair Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's (D-N.Y.) presidential campaign next year, according to several Democratic sources.

Together, Clinton, the favorite to win the Democratic nomination, and McAuliffe, the top money man in Democratic politics, have a good chance of raising $100 million before the first official contest, the Iowa caucuses in January 2008.

While Clinton and her staff insist she is focused solely on winning reelection in New York this November, the decision over who will be in charge of getting her elected to the White House is already settled.

McAuliffe told The Hill yesterday that Clinton has not made a decision on running for president and will not do so until after Nov. 7. McAuliffe also denied telling friends that he will serve as chairman, although sources contradict him.

He acknowledged that he would play a "huge role" in her presidential campaign if it materializes and that he has recruited donors for a possible White House run.

"I would just say that I hope she runs," said McAuliffe. "She's focused on the Senate and I'm focused on helping Democrats.

"Would I have a huge role on the campaign? Of course, that's not real news. People know that I have has been around lining up people if she decides to run."

Clinton referred questions to her Senate campaign, where spokeswoman Ann Lewis said, "There is no decision, there is no [presidential] campaign; if there is no campaign there are no titles."

Clinton's camp is not the only one among presidential hopefuls lining up donors for 2008. Allies of each of the Democratic contenders are aggressively seeking commitments because of the huge amount of money that will be needed next year.

McAuliffe, who became DNC chairman in 2001, said he has had no conversations with Clinton about titles and that Democrats are merely speculating about the role he would serve in the campaign.

Since he stepped down as DNC chairman after the 2004 election, he has been involved with about a dozen private companies by his own estimate. He said he has raised money for investment funds and real estate deals, and even dabbled in the energy sector. He has also served on the advisory board of Carret Asset Management, an investment firm in New York.

But McAuliffe said he would quickly drop these commitments to help Clinton if she ran for president.

"I would take off time and go full time," he said of his expected level of commitment.

Early next year, around the time Clinton is expected to launch an exploratory campaign committee, McAuliffe's new book " What a Party!: My Life Among Democrats" is expected to be in stores. It will span McAuliffe's 25 years in politics and discuss the strengths and weaknesses of his party, including the successes of the Clinton presidency.

Although McAuliffe's specialty is raising money, he would probably not be satisfied serving only as Clinton's presidential finance chairman.

"To be finance chair would be beneath him," said one Democratic donor close to Clinton, who added that McAuliffe is "trying to make his presence felt" in moneyed Democratic circles.

No Democratic fundraiser has as high a profile as McAuliffe. Nevertheless, he may be feeling some competition from the many Clinton allies who are positioning themselves as important financial players for her presidential campaign.

"She's got a full operation," said Wade Randlett, a prominent Democratic fundraiser based in San Francisco, of the network of Democrats who are laying the financial groundwork for Clinton in the Bay Area. "There are many, many friends who are active for her."

Randlett said donors who have met Clinton leave the room certain that she will run for president. He said the same clear impression is given by two other hopefuls, Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) and former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner (D).

"For Kerry, for Warner, and for Hillary, they are all a certainty," said Randlett. "People leaving the room all think she's running for president."

Randlett also said Bay Area donors have been told that Clinton will not visit there again between now and Election Day so as not to compete for campaign contributions in a Democratic fundraising hub with candidates running for the House and Senate.

Democratic fundraisers report that all politicians with an eye on the White House have been vigorously recruiting donors for primary season. That's because the Democrats have front-loaded the season even more than in 2004.

With key contests crammed into the first few weeks of 2008, giving the early front-runner the chance to eliminate rivals almost in a fell swoop, there is a premium on raising primary money next year ready to hit the early races in a winter avalanche.

"People are going to have to telescope and enormous amount of fundraising in a very short period of time," said Steve Grossman, a Democratic fundraiser who served as DNC chairman under Clinton. "In my judgment, if you can't raise the better part of $50 million, you're not going to be a first tier candidate.

Given Clinton's stature and McAuliffe's stature as a fundraiser, Republicans have little doubt that she will have close to $100 million in her presidential campaign coffers at the end of next year.

Raising that amount of money in the year before an election year would not be unprecedented. The Bush-Cheney '04 campaign reported $99.1 million in its account at the end of 2003.

"There's a growing consensus that the top-tier candidates of both political parties are going to opt out of the public financing for the general election as well as the primaries, which [would be] the first time in history that has occurred," said Federal Election Commission Chairman Michael Toner.

If candidates forego public funding for the 2008 presidential primary and general elections, they will be able to collect contributions for both elections as soon as they form exploratory committees.

Said Toner: "The higher contribution limits of [the] McCain-Feingold [campaign finance law] combined with candidates raising money for general and primary combined with a polarized electorate sets the stage for record-breaking fundraising."

McCain May Alienate Some Conservatives (AP-Y)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, September 20, 2006

Republican Sen. John McCain's standoff with the White House over treatment of detainees — an issue the former POW knows intimately well — threatens to exacerbate his already contentious relationship with conservatives.

"Maverick status is looked upon as a strength in Congress, but a maverick in the White House is not looked upon with great admiration from our folks," Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, said Monday.

"Politically, this isn't wise," added the Rev. Louis Sheldon, chairman of the Traditional Values Coalition, which supports the president's call for Congress to approve tough interrogation techniques for terrorism suspects.

McCain, with his eye on a 2008 presidential bid, had taken steps to improve his relationship with conservatives, addressing a graduation class at Liberty University earlier this year at the invitation of the Rev. Jerry Falwell, a former adversary.

The Arizona senator has been a staunch supporter of President Bush on the Iraq war. He has alienated conservatives, however, for opposing a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage and supporting federal expansion of embryonic stem-cell research.

Social conservatives also have taken issue with his effort to overhaul the immigration system, in part, by granting millions of illegal immigrants a path to eventual citizenship, and his work with a rogue group of senators to avert a Senate fight over Bush's judicial nominations.

The warnings from conservatives over the detainee issue illustrate the risk McCain faces in taking on the White House — alienating a base of support he would need to win the Republican presidential nomination.

As the clash escalated, McCain shrugged off suggestions that the dust-up could hurt him politically, telling reporters last week that his "credibility with the American people is that I do what I think is right."

Meantime, one of McCain's potential rivals for the GOP nomination, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, has made it known that he supports the president's immigration position, saying that Republicans who have broken rank with Bush "made a big mistake."

DOJ_NMG_0066194

Still, McCain could benefit by showing voters he stands alone and inoculating himself from future efforts to link him to the legacy of Bush, whose support in public opinion polls hovers in the low 40 percent range.

McCain advisers brush off the notion of long-term political consequences.

"At the end of the day, he's going to do what he thinks is right, and when he does that, it works out politically," said John Weaver, a senior political adviser for McCain. He added that when McCain doesn't hold true to that, it usually "blows up in our face."

Long known as a maverick, McCain's latest tussle with the White House is over the president's insistence that Congress allow the CIA to use aggressive methods against terrorism suspects.

McCain and a growing group of Senate Republicans contend the United States must adhere strictly to the Geneva Conventions international standards.

Bush wants Congress to quickly pass his own proposed legislation authorizing military tribunals for detainees and harsh interrogations of terror suspects. Last week, he singled out McCain, a rival for the presidential nomination in 2000, making clear whom he blamed for standing in the way.

A year ago, McCain led a high-profile charge in Congress to clarify a law against torture by extending it to also ban cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment of prisoners. The White House issued a veto threat.

But McCain, a former Navy pilot tortured during nearly six years of imprisonment in Vietnam, attracted enough support in the House and Senate to override a veto. After a very public spat, the White House and McCain reached an agreement that essentially resulted in the senator getting what he wanted. Bush signed the bill in December.

Since then, McCain has resisted engaging in a public battle over how the administration has implemented the law, choosing instead to use back channels to make known his displeasure and negotiate with the Pentagon and the White House. That changed last week.

"We have an honest disagreement with some particular points of this topic," said Weaver, who characterized the relationship between McCain and the White House as excellent.

Over the past year, McCain's ties to the president have grown. Several of Bush's high-profile campaign strategists have lined up behind McCain, widely considered the front-runner for the GOP's presidential nomination though he has yet to formally enter the race.

Traveling in politically pivotal New Hampshire over the weekend, McCain again was the target of conservatives' ire — this time because of his interrogation position.

The editorial page of the Manchester Union-Leader accused McCain of "blocking our ability to gain from terrorist captives the vital information we need to fight a war in which the enemy strikes us here at home from multiple locations around the world."

Sixteen months from presidential primary season, some Republicans believe McCain's latest haggling with the White House won't have lasting negative implications.

"In the long term, no one can hold a candle to McCain on national security issues," said Scott Reed, a Republican strategist. Plus, he said: "Strong poll numbers and a commanding lead in a presidential race allows everyone to forgive and forget."

The Republican Divide (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

With fewer than 50 days left until Election Day, as many as 40 House and 10 Senate seats are in play, fueling Democratic hopes of capturing power in November. Washington is awaiting polling data that will show how much success the White House has had in trying to put Democrats on the defensive on national security — and whether that effort has been undercut by the battle among Republicans over what is permissible in interrogating terrorism suspects.

Conventional wisdom is that the battling has derailed the effort to engage Democrats on the issue. But some Republicans say that while intramural warfare is never pretty, it has knocked Iraq out of the news and kept the campaign story line precisely where President Bush and Karl Rove want it.

But Republicans face additional peril from a public distressed at a Republican-controlled Congress that accomplished little this year. Strategists in both parties see increasing pressure on the two Republican camps to cut a deal on interrogation.

Redistricting Leaves Races In California, Elsewhere Cold Campaign Journal Offers Insights About Political Developments From The Front Lines Of The Fall Races Through Election Day. (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

MONTEREY, Calif. -- It's a red-hot election year, with control of Congress at stake, and this political reporter has come to the state with a whopping 53 of the 435 U.S. House seats. That's one-eighth of the congressional total and 21 more seats than the next biggest state, Texas. So why do the seagulls over Monterey Bay seem to be screaming in reproach?

Because it's less than eight weeks until Election Day Nov. 7, and not a single one of those 53 congressional contests is competitive enough to merit a busy correspondent's attention.

In a year of anti-Republican and anti-incumbent fever, that fact stands as a testament to the completeness of California's bipartisan gerrymandering. The mapping of political lines for partisan advantage after each decennial census may have originated back east with Massachusetts Gov. Elbridge Gerry 194 years ago, but it has been perfected here on the West Coast.

Of course, California isn't alone. Nearly all states have maps for their legislatures and congressional districts drawn by incumbents, to protect incumbents. Where one party dominates, as in Texas, the lines reflect that. Where power is divided, the two parties' mutual back-scratching makes the redistricting process a bipartisan one even when nothing else is.

For all the talk, then, of what a contentious campaign year this is -- and it is -- some perspective is in order: The nation's political chattering class now counts about 45 U.S. House seats as potentially winnable by either party; most are currently held by the beleaguered Republicans. That total is more competitive districts than in most election years, but it is still just over 10% of the total House. That means in almost nine out of 10 House districts, voters could be excused for not knowing there's a congressional election come November. So while Democrats need just 15 seats to regain the majority they lost in 1994, the pool of pickings is a small one. (See related article8.)

Consider these excerpts from the most recent outlook for House races from nonpartisan handicapper Stuart Rothenberg: "Alabama…No competive races." "Alaska…Forget it." "Arkansas…Nothing." "Delaware…A snoozer." "Kansas…No races of interest." "Maine…Nothing of interest." "Massachusetts…No contests of note." "Michigan…Nothing especially compelling." "Mississippi…Don't bother." Ditto for the Dakotas, Oklahoma, Oregon, Rhode Island and Utah.

California did draw national attention briefly last spring, for a June special election to fill the seat that former Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham vacated for a prison cell after his conviction on corruption charges. Although the suburban San Diego district is a mostly Republican enclave, Democrats had high hopes of seizing the seat, given the notoriety of Mr. Cunningham's case and the political headwinds against Republicans generally. But the Republican candidate, former Rep. Brian Bilbray, easily dispatched with Democrat Francine Busby. The two are on the ballot again in November for a full two-year term, and Mr. Bilbray now rates as the prohibitive favorite.

Similarly, national Democrats initially targeted Republican Rep. Richard Pombo of California's Central Valley, with help from environmentalists outraged by his record as the House Resources Committee chairman. But their preferred candidate, a former Navy officer, lost in June's Democratic primary to wind-energy engineer Jerry McNerney, who lost overwhelmingly to Mr. Pombo in 2004. Now most race-watchers are ignoring this one, too, though just this week the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee put the Pombo-McNerney contest on a new list called "emerging races."

Also on that long-shot list is the suburban Sacramento district represented for 16 years by Rep. John Doolittle; he and his wife have been implicated in the scandal involving convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff. This week the Sacramento Bee newspaper endorsed Democratic challenger Charlie Brown, a former Air Force pilot in Vietnam and the first Persian Gulf war, saying, "Doolittle is emblematic of what's wrong in Washington." It takes a big scandal to turn a safe seat like Mr. Doolittle's into one the opposition party can seize, but often even that isn't enough -- as Republicans' retention of the former Cunningham seat shows.

Redistricting in California "has really done a very effective job of creating safe Republican and Democratic seats, and it's just really hard to break in," says Leon Panetta, the Democrat who represented the Monterey Bay area for eight terms until he left in 1993 to be President Clinton's budget director and then White House chief of staff. Among other things, Mr. Panetta and his wife, Sylvia, have founded the Panetta Institute for Public Policy here, and every year they invite speakers from Washington to address policy, politics and the press for students from the California State University system. The current group of students ask lots of questions about U.S. politics. None go to their home state's congressional races.

Here, as in most places, the state legislative leaders draw the political boundaries for the state House and Senate districts every 10 years, but let the state's senior members of Congress effectively draw the U.S. House district lines. In California in 2001, that meant Republican Rep. David Dreier, chairman of the powerful House Rules Committee, and Democratic Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi. In a state where the parties generally are more polarized than anywhere, both sides agreed to turn over the job of redistricting to expert Michael Berman, brother of longtime Democratic Rep. Howard Berman. The resulting map protected all but one Republican incumbent and preserved Democrats' big 33-20 majority of the U.S. House delegation for the increasingly blue state.

In both 2002 and 2004, only one of the 53 districts was at all competitive. So this year's dearth of races isn't surprising, except that it occurs in one of the most volatile, anti-incumbent seasons in years. In effect, Democrats have all the seats they can possibly grab here.

Last year, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger called on voters to approve an initiative that would leave the redistricting of state and federal districts to a nonpartisan commission of retired judges. Mr. Panetta, who supported the proposal, says the Governator told him that rarely do the state legislative leaders of both parties come to his office at the same time, but on this one "they walked in together and said, 'You cannot put this initiative forward.'" Mr. Schwarzenegger told Mr. Panetta, "When that happened, I knew it was the right thing to do."

But the ballot initiative, like redistricting itself, was "the one area where bipartisanship prevailed -- both Republicans and Democrats opposed it," Mr. Panetta recalls. A bipartisan bankroll financed the media campaign against the initiative, and it was easily defeated. Which helps explain why a national reporter visiting here now is watching seagulls instead of candidates.

Republicans Maintain Strong Fund-Raising Edge (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings
The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As both political parties steel themselves for a furious final push before Election Day, Republicans maintain a strong fund-raising advantage that could play a pivotal role in close races.

Financial-disclosure reports to be released today will show that the Republican National Committee has more than triple the cash as its counterpart, the Democratic National Committee. The RNC raised $7.6 million in August and has $39 million in the bank, compared with the DNC's August donations of $6.7 million and a balance of $11 million in the bank.

RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman has promised to use that money to bombard the airwaves with negative advertisements aimed at Democrats and to run a high-tech, get-out-the-vote operation that will overwhelm their opponents' operations.

The Democratic financial disadvantage stems from a decision by DNC Chairman Howard Dean to spend money to hire full-time workers in state party offices who can help produce a national turnout program this year, as well as sustain the party through more than one election cycle.

Mr. Dean's decision has created friction with House and Senate Democratic leaders, who fear the more immediate consequences of such an imbalance -- particularly when the opposition onslaught hits the television airwaves.

That barrage could be offset somewhat by the work of the Democrats' House campaign committee, which released numbers yesterday that show continued fundraising strength and spending discipline.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee raised $5 million in August and ended the month with $35 million -- a million dollars shy of its counterpart. The National Republican Congressional Committee said yesterday it collected $8.5 million in August donations and has $36 million in the bank.

The senatorial committees are expected to release their figures tomorrow.

The biggest stakes are in the House, where Democrats see enough seats in play to gain the 15 they need to capture control. Still, it is an uphill slog that requires ousting several entrenched incumbents.

In a meeting with reporters yesterday, New York Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds, the NRCC chairman, said he is confident his party will prevail in the end, particularly given its national committee's overwhelming financial advantage. "We are not going to be outgunned. We are not going to be outrun," he said.

But during a wide-ranging discussion of closely contested races, Mr. Reynolds also conceded that his incumbent colleagues are being forced to fight their way to victory.

In his own state of New York, Democrats are expected to dominate the gubernatorial and Senate races. That means, Mr. Reynolds said, that he and other House Republicans must try to create their own voter-turnout operation after relying for years on outgoing Republican Gov. George Pataki's organization.

Party Groups Evenly Matched Financially (AP-Y)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, September 19, 2006

Republican and Democratic committees battling over control of the House held almost equal amounts in their bank accounts, giving neither side a substantial financial advantage going into the final stretch of the congressional campaign.

Rep. Tom Reynolds, R-N.Y., the chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, said his organization raised $8.5 million last month and had $36 million cash on hand at the end of August. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee said it had collected $5 million in contributions last month and had $35 million in the bank.

Both committees are in substantially better shape financially than they were at a comparable point during the 2004 election. Reynolds said the NRCC had $10 million more in the bank than it did then. DCCC spokesman Bill Burton said the Democratic group was $15 million ahead of its 2004 mark.

"It's clear that Democrats are motivated for November and our historic fundraising shows the tremendous momentum behind the idea of a new direction," Burton said.

Democrats need to gain 15 seats in the House on Nov. 7 to take control after a dozen years of Republican rule. The two parties are battling in 36-40 competitive congressional districts.

Democrats are counting on public opinion polls that show them with a national political advantage. DCCC chairman Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., said voters are hungry for a "new direction."

"We will not be outgunned, we will not be outrun, and we are going to be in the majority in the 110th Congress," Reynolds countered.

Meanwhile, the Republican National Committee, the party's overarching political organization, said it would report raising $7.6 million in August, and cash on hand totaling more than $39 million. The Democratic National Committee said it raised nearly $6.7 million and had $10.9 million in the bank.

The overall election effort is being carried out by the national party committees and their respective House and Senate campaign committees. Together, their cumulative resources will help candidates in competitive races with advertising, mailing and voter mobilization. The two Senate committees did not release their August financial totals.

DOJ_NMG_0066198

The RNC has already weighed in specific Senate races, buttressing the national Republican Senatorial Committee in Tennessee and in Ohio. On Tuesday, the RNC reported spending more than $500,000 in new advertising aimed at Sherrod Brown, the Democrat challenging incumbent Republican Mike DeWine. Overall, the RNC has spent more than $1.6 million in that contest.

Fundraising Picks Up For Committees (RC)

By David M. Drucker

Roll Call, September 20, 2006

Seven weeks before Election Day, an upbeat National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) guaranteed on Tuesday that his party would hold the House majority on the strength of its war chest, political organization and positions on the issues in the 36 districts that matter.

Reynolds announced that the NRCC would report raising more than $8.5 million in August, to end the month with $36 million on hand, when it files its report with the Federal Election Commission today. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee isn't far behind, raising $5 million in August and banking $35 million.

"Reports of our majority's demise are greatly exaggerated. We will be in the majority next Congress. You can count on it," Reynolds told reporters during a news conference.

While Reynolds boasted of being $10 million ahead of where the NRCC was in 2004 and raising $10 million to date for the committee's Battleground program, the DCCC countered that it is $15 million above where it was in the previous cycle.

Compared to 2004, when the DCCC at a similar point in the cycle trailed the NRCC by $4.7 million in cash on hand, the difference this year is negligible, said DCCC spokesman Bill Burton.

"The DCCC is competitive nationally and Democratic challengers are competitive locally," Burton said. "It's clear that Democrats are motivated for November, and our historic fundraising shows the tremendous momentum behind the idea of a new direction."

The DCCC's effort has been aided by several high-profile Democrats.

According to DCCC estimates obtained by Roll Call, a series of e-mails and direct-mail pieces pegged to Rep. John Murtha's (Pa.) anti-Iraq War message have netted the committee approximately $500,000 for the cycle.

Those figures, which include an e-mail plea released Monday, put the Pennsylvania lawmaker among the most prolific direct-mail fundraisers for the committee, behind only House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), who has raised about $15 million through e-mail and mail solicitations.

Former President Bill Clinton and former Vice President Al Gore round out the list of most prolific direct-mail participants, raising about $200,000 each this cycle.

The direct-mail contributions represent less than half of the approximately $1.2 million Murtha — who in June announced that he would seek the Majority Leader's office if Democrats retake control of the House this fall — has raised for the committee this cycle, according to DCCC records.

The Pennsylvania lawmaker, among the top contributors to the DCCC, remains shy of completing his dues payments however, contributing $242,500 of the $250,000 required from ranking members on exclusive subcommittees.

House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (Md.) — who holds the No. 2 post in the Democratic leadership and widely had been considered the heir apparent to the Leader's office — has raised fewer funds via direct mail, but he has contributed more than $3 million to the DCCC this cycle, as well as the full $600,000 in dues required by his post.

Meanwhile, Reynolds on Tuesday was peppered with questions about Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) and whether it would be politically advantageous for Republicans if the admitted felon resigned from Congress.

Ney recently pleaded guilty to two felony counts of conspiracy and making false statements, including accepting "things of value" from disgraced GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff and a foreign businessman in return for official actions.

State Sen. Joy Padgett (R), who replaced Ney on the ballot in Ohio's 18th district, has called for Ney's resignation. But Reynolds, saying Padgett did what she felt she had to do to be successful in her race, declined to go that far.

"It's not going to be an issue in other seats in the country. That's between Bob Ney and his district, and Sen. Padgett has had her opinion," Reynolds said. "Right now he's in alcohol rehab, and I don't know of anyone that is going to talk to him."

Four Democrats Boost DSCC (RC)

By Paul Kane

Roll Call, September 20, 2006

A quartet of leading Senate Democrats gave $1 million each from their campaign accounts to the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee in recent days, as the Caucus makes its final push to give itself as much of a financial edge as possible over its GOP counterpart.

Sens. Edward Kennedy (Mass.), Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), Dick Durbin (Ill.) and Dianne Feinstein (Calif.) each gave $1 million from their campaign committees to the DSCC, according to Senators, aides and strategists. The Senators' campaign committees are allowed to give unlimited donations to national and state party organizations.

The donations — which represent the largest contributions the committee has received so far this election cycle — are part of the daily effort by DSCC Chairman Charles Schumer (N.Y.) to round up as much cash as possible to boost his committee's financial advantage over the National Republican Senatorial Committee, which trailed the DSCC by $15 million in cash on hand at the end of July.

The DSCC declined to discuss these contributions and Schumer's ongoing effort to round up even cash from the Caucus. But DSCC officials said Democratic incumbents are now putting up more money than in previous cycles.

"Democratic Senators are stepping up to the plate helping get us positioned to win," said Phil Singer, DSCC spokesman.

New figures through the end of August will be out today for the party campaign committees, but the $4 million worth of donations from Kennedy, Clinton, Durbin and Feinstein won't officially register with the Federal Election Commission until next month, sources said.

Senate Democrats have made raising money from electorally safe incumbents a critical component of their finance operation ever since the abolition at the end of 2002 of soft money — the unlimited donations from individuals, unions and other interests that the DSCC previously had relied on. In the 2004 cycle, Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), then Minority Whip, solidified his standing with his caucus by forking over a $1 million check to the DSCC, an amount that Schumer topped when he cut $2.5 million worth of checks to the committee and to state party committees in battleground states two years ago.

Despite the DSCC's $15 million edge over the NRSC, Schumer and Democrats are well aware that the GOP is banking on the Republican National Committee — which held a $33 million cash-on-hand advantage over the Democratic National Committee — to level the financial playing field for Senate races.

Senators in both parties are expected to lend a hand in fundraising, particularly in making calls to their most loyal donors to gather cash for party campaign committees and top candidates. But in the final weeks of the campaign season, donations straight from their campaign accounts to the DSCC and NRSC are highly sought after, since they are the easiest and quickest infusions of cash.

With his $1 million donation, Durbin is now the single largest donor to the DSCC, having already cut a check for $235,000 in January 2005 in an effort to help the committee wipe out its debt from the '04 cycle.

Through the end of July, the largest Senatorial donor to the NRSC was Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (Ky.), who donated $400,000 from his campaign account last year, according to FEC reports. These figures for the two campaign committees do not include donations that Senators gave from their separate political action committees, which are allowed to give $15,000 per year and $30,000 total for the two-year cycle.

Ann Lewis, a spokeswoman for Clinton's political operations, said the Senator thought of the $1 million check from her Friends of Hillary committee to be "the most direct support she can show, and she's pleased she'll be able to do it."

For Clinton, parting with $1 million was a bit easier than it was for other Senators. As of June 30, Clinton was sitting on $22 million for a re-election bid that has turned into a virtual coronation. Kennedy and Feinstein, who also are facing nominal challenges in November, were sitting on $8.7 million and $8 million, respectively, at mid-summer.

However, Clinton is considering a presidential bid, and any leftover money from this Senate campaign can be directly transferred into a White House campaign account, providing her with a financial leg up over almost any opponent she may end up facing. Lewis noted that, since taking office in January 2001, Clinton has helped raise $60 million for Democratic candidates nationwide, adding that her $1 million contribution to the DSCC "for the moment" was her last donation to the committee, but that there was still a long way to go until Election Day, and the situation could change.

This marks the second straight campaign cycle in which New York Republicans have not fielded a strong challenge to an incumbent Democratic Senator, allowing Schumer and now Clinton to start steering millions of dollars into DSCC coffers that will help in other states. Schumer still holds $10.1 million in his account.

Democratic aides and strategists are privately monitoring several other Senators who are sitting on large, multimillion-dollar stockpiles of campaign cash yet not facing stiff challenges, including Sen. Evan Bayh (Ind.), who held $10.4 million in his campaign account at the end of June but had yet to turn over any donations to the DSCC.

Like Clinton, Bayh is considering a presidential run, and money in his Evan Bayh Committee would be the seed money.

Another potential donor could be Sen. Bill Nelson (Fla.), who held more than $12 million in his campaign account June 30. Nelson's opponent, Rep. Katherine Harris (R), has run a campaign so marred by political and personal embarrassments that Nelson is considered the overwhelming favorite.

Sen. Fumes Over Jewish Debate Question (AP-Y)

By Bob Lewis

AP, September 20, 2006

A day after being asked in a debate about his immigrant mother's heritage, Sen. George Allen fired back in a written statement Tuesday confirming his Jewish ancestry.

Allen, a Republican seeking re-election in a close race, denounced the reporter's question as "reprehensible" and irrelevant and said he only recently learned that his maternal grandfather was Jewish.

"Whenever we would ask my mother through the years about our family background on her side, the answer always was, `Who cares about that?'" Allen wrote in the statement.

DOJ_NMG_0066200

During a debate Monday with Democrat Jim Webb, Allen was indignant when a panelist asked him whether his forebears included Jews. An audience of about 600 business executives booed and hissed at the question from Peggy Fox of WUSA-TV in Washington, D.C.

"To be getting into what religion my mother is, I don't think it's relevant," Allen tersely replied to Fox. "So I'd like to ask you, why is that relevant? My religion? Jim's religion ..." he said as applause drowned out his remarks.

"My mother is French-Italian with a little Spanish blood in her," Allen told the panelist, but did not mention any Jewish heritage.

On Tuesday, Allen said his mother, Henriette "Etty" Allen, grew up in the Christian faith. She is a French-speaking native of Tunisia.

Allen and his siblings also were raised as Christians. He said he became aware only recently that his grandfather, Felix Lumbroso, who had been imprisoned by the Nazis, was Jewish.

"I embrace and take great pride in every aspect of my diverse heritage, including the Lumbroso family line's Jewish heritage, which I learned of from a recent magazine article and my mother confirmed," Allen said in the statement.

Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams would not specify when Allen's mother told him about her ancestry. As a child, Allen knew Lumbroso, who is now deceased, Wadhams said.

Allen accused Webb's campaign of peddling the notion that he is embarrassed by his heritage, a claim Webb spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd rejected as "completely, totally false."

Fox defended her questions. She said she wanted to determine if there was a political reason Allen was not forthcoming about a Jewish ancestor. "I don't know why it would be so upsetting to him," she said in a telephone interview Tuesday. "I was shocked at how he took offense to the question."

Fox had also asked Allen whether he had learned the word "Macaca" from his mother. Allen had applied the word to a Webb campaign volunteer of Indian descent during an Aug. 11 rally before a mostly white crowd. In some cultures, including Tunisia, the word is considered a racial slur.

Allen glared at Fox for a moment, then said, "I hope you're not trying to bring my mother into this matter."

References to the nationality of Allen's mother prompted the first report of his Jewish ancestry on Aug. 25 in The Forward, a Jewish daily newspaper, said its editor, Ami Eden.

"There was some talk at that time that perhaps he picked this up from his mother, and it was an easy way to get to the story behind the headlines," Eden said in a telephone interview from New York.

Allen Says He Embraces His Jewish Ancestry (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, September 20, 2006

Virginia Sen. George Allen (R) said for the first time publicly yesterday that he has Jewish ancestry, a day after responding angrily to an exchange that included questions about his mother's racial sensitivity and whether his family has Jewish roots.

At a campaign debate with Democratic challenger James Webb on Monday, a reporter asked Allen whether his mother's father, Felix Lumbroso, was Jewish. He became visibly upset, saying his mother's religion was not relevant to the campaign and chiding the reporter for "making aspersions about people because of their religious beliefs."

Allen's campaign manager said the senator believed the question was hostile because it followed another one about whether Allen had learned the word "macaca" from his mother. The word, which Allen used last month to describe a Webb volunteer, is a French slur for a dark-skinned person. Allen's mother, Henreitte "Etty" Allen, is a native of Tunisia and speaks French.

In a statement released by his campaign yesterday, Allen said he was proud to have recently discovered that his grandfather, a Nazi resistance fighter in North Africa, was part of a well-known Jewish family.

"I was raised as a Christian and my mother was raised as a Christian," Allen, 54, said. "And I embrace and take great pride in every aspect of my diverse heritage, including my Lumbroso family line's Jewish heritage, which I learned about from a recent magazine article and my mother confirmed."

Allen's religious background has not been a campaign issue. But when the reporter asked Allen about it Monday, the exchange triggered a flood of critical commentary on Internet blogs yesterday, demanding that Allen clarify his ancestry.

The Jewish weekly newspaper the Forward recently explored Allen's possible Jewish roots and his connection to the Lumbrosos, a prominent Jewish family that settled in Italy in the 15th century. Allen's campaign spokesman did not return calls seeking confirmation, according to that article.

Peggy Fox, the WUSA (Channel 9) reporter who asked the question at the debate, said she read the article in the Forward. "I had heard from other reporters that his staff had been asked the question before. I thought it was fair game," she said yesterday.

Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams said, "Saying your mother was a racist. That was exactly the intent and the thrust of the question. Then she [Fox] went on to introduce religion. Introducing religion at all into the debate was inappropriate."

The question about Allen's religion and his delayed response to it are the latest twists in a bizarre Senate campaign that has been dominated for five weeks by Allen's "macaca" comment and more recently by allegations that Webb demeaned military women in an article written 27 years ago.

Polls have indicated that Webb is closing the double-digit lead Allen held earlier this summer. But in addition to a debate over the Iraq war with Webb, a decorated Marine and former Navy secretary, Allen has repeatedly been distracted by other issues.

Allen is not the first public official to discover Jewish roots late in life, including former presidential candidates Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) and Gen. Wesley K. Clark. In 1997, Secretary of State Madeline Albright revealed that her family history includes three Jewish grandparents who were killed in the Holocaust.

Some Jewish leaders said that Allen's angry reaction to the question about his Jewish heritage bothered them.

"He was visibly uncomfortable and called it an 'aspersion,' " said J. J. Goldberg, editor in chief of the Forward. "What is it that makes him so uncomfortable with it? It raises more questions about who the guy is."

"How does one not know that his grandfather was a Jew?" asked Samuel Heilman, a professor of sociology at the City University of New York. Heilman called it a "tempest in a teapot" but said it would be a big story to American Jews.

"It is the case that for many people who are so much a part of blue-blood America, it's hard to imagine there is a Jew in their cupboard there," Heilman said.

But other Jewish leaders defended Allen's reaction, saying he was clearly upset not about being called a Jew but at what he considered to be the negative tone of the questioner.

"This was an 'I got you' question -- 'See, you really are a racist,' " said Rabbi Irwin Kula, author of "Yearnings: Embracing the Sacred Messiness of Life." Kula said there are many people who have been raised Christian and are not aware that they have any Jewish heritage. "I felt tremendous empathy for George Allen. It is 100 percent possible."

Allen has been asked before about his religious background. Bob Gibson, a reporter at the Charlottesville Daily Progress who has written about the senator for almost three decades, told the New Republic that Allen once wanted a correction "when I wrote about his mother's Jewish family origins. He insisted, through a press secretary, that his mother was raised a Christian."

Part of the interest in Allen's heritage comes from his speeches, in which he often includes references to his grandfather being incarcerated in a Nazi concentration camp. In 2000, he told the Richmond Times-Dispatch his grandfather was put in the camp because he was an Allied sympathizer.

He brought up his grandfather's incarceration at the Monday debate, just before Fox asked her question.

"If there's one lesson that I learned more than from anyone else, it was my mother, whose father was incarcerated by the Nazis in World War II," Allen said. "And of all people in my life who told me about tolerance and not judging people by their religious beliefs or their ethnicity or their race, it is my mother."

But people close to Allen have been reluctant to discuss his grandfather's religion in the past. Asked about it several weeks ago, campaign advisers either said they did not know or refused to comment. They also refused to ask Allen about it, saying at the time that it was not relevant to his job.

Yesterday, Wadhams accused Webb's campaign and liberal bloggers of anti-Semitism for raising the issue of the senator's religious background.

Bloggers, some of whom are on Webb's staff, spent yesterday writing furiously about the debate question and Allen's answer. "What does Allen have against Jews?" one headline read on a national liberal blog.

"Introducing religion at all into the debate was inappropriate. It makes no difference what anybody's religion is," Wadhams said.

Wadhams also accused Webb's campaign of mailing an anti-Semitic flier to Virginia voters during the state's Democratic primary this year. That flier depicted Webb's Jewish opponent, Harris Miller, with money coming out of his pockets.

"They have been continuing that anti-Semitic strategy through their paid bloggers," Wadhams said.

Webb spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd called that charge "completely false." She said the flier was not anti-Semitic and declined to comment about Allen's Jewish heritage.

"We are in the race for Senate to talk about ideas, issues and what's best for Virginia," she said. "That's all we are here to do."

In the statement issued yesterday, Allen called Fox's questions "especially reprehensible" and "deeply offensive." And he confronted questions about why he did not know about his heritage sooner.

"Some may find it odd that I have not probed deeply into the details of my family history, but it's a fact," he said. "Whenever we would ask my mother through the years about our family background on her side, the answer always was, 'Who cares about that?' "

New Twist In Senate Race In Virginia (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 19 — The turbulent re-election campaign of Senator George Allen took another unexpected turn Tuesday when Mr. Allen, a Virginia Republican, issued a statement confirming his Jewish ancestry.

“I embrace and take great pride in every aspect of my diverse heritage, including my Lumbroso family line’s Jewish heritage, which I learned about from a recent magazine article and my mother confirmed,” Mr. Allen said in a statement.

The issue was injected into the campaign on Monday in a debate with Mr. Allen’s Democratic opponent, Jim Webb, when a panelist asked Mr. Allen, a former governor, if his mother was Jewish.

"To be getting into what religion my mother is, I don't think it's relevant," he responded angrily.

But the campaign, which had earlier found itself on the defensive over Mr. Allen's reference to a volunteer for Mr. Webb as "macaca," apparently decided to try to defuse the issue quickly by putting out a statement acknowledging his family ties.

It was apparently the first time Mr. Allen, a practicing Presbyterian, had done so publicly, and he said he learned of his ancestry only through an article last month in The Forward, a Jewish publication.

"Some may find it odd that I have not probed deeply into the details of my family history, but it's a fact," Mr. Allen's statement said. "We in the Allen household were simply taught that what matters is a person's character, integrity, effort and performance — not race, gender, ethnicity or religion."

Before the question arose in the debate, Mr. Allen had mentioned that a grandfather had been incarcerated by the Nazis. He said in his statement that he had never known the circumstances surrounding that chapter in his family history.

After the macaca comment, which drew national attention, The Forward published an article suggesting that Mr. Allen's mother, Henriette, who was born in Tunisia, came from a prominent Jewish family and that Mr. Allen would most likely be considered Jewish under rabbinic law.

Mr. Allen was considered a potential presidential prospect for 2008 and had been rated a near-lock for re-election as senator. But the difficult political environment for Republicans and the macaca comment have made his contest more competitive than anticipated.

Mr. Allen apologized to the young volunteer of Indian ancestry who was the object of the comment, which was perceived by some as a racial slur.

Victory Of The Non-Pol? (WP)

By Lee Hockstader

The Washington Post, September 20, 2006

This politics business, it's a struggle for Jim Webb.

Cerebral, private and generally solemn, he garbles sound bites and chokes at asking people for money, which the Democrat badly needs if he's to overtake Republican incumbent George Allen in the remaining seven weeks of their race for the U.S. Senate in Virginia. Wading into crowds gives him the willies. "I know how hard it is, I've had a camera three foot from my face for eight months now at any public place," he said Sunday on "Meet the Press."

On the road, the Webb campaign is unorthodox. In Arlington a few months ago, he appeared at a rally with his wife -- and was introduced to the crowd by his ex-wife. His driver, Mac McGarvey, lost an arm to a mine while serving as Webb's radio operator in Vietnam; before signing on with the campaign, he was managing a honky tonk in Nashville.

Webb's son, a Marine lance corporal who shipped out to Iraq this month, is stationed in Ramadi. If elected, Webb will be one of a tiny handful of members of Congress with a child serving in Iraq (or Afghanistan, for that matter). But while he mentions his son from time to time, and wears a pair of his son's combat boots, he seems unable or unwilling to exploit the fact of his service for all it's worth.

He is, in short, a consummate non-pol, which makes his race for the Senate among the most interesting, and treacherous, of the year. Badly underfunded so far and mostly allergic to stump speech mumbo jumbo, he could just blunder his way into the Senate on the strength of Allen's problematic past and bullying present -- and on Webb's consistent stance that the war in Iraq is a terrible strategic blunder. Or, just as easily, he could drown in the sea of Allen's financial advantage if the Democratic fundraising machine doesn't deliver in the next few weeks.

Not that it seems to matter overwhelmingly to Webb. In the scheme of things, Webb said in a debate at Tysons Corner on Monday, whether or not he is a senator won't rate very high "on my agenda."

In the Tysons debate, and the one on "Meet the Press," it wasn't hard to tell which candidate was the amateur politician. Webb's delivery was choppier, his demeanor slightly grim, his collar a size too small. At times, particularly when challenged on his views on women in the military, he seemed to delve into the dead ends of ancient debates hearkening back to his days as Ronald Reagan's secretary of the Navy a generation ago.

But there were no major gaffes either, and on balance he managed well against the more practiced, more fluent Allen. Unlike some of his earlier performances, Webb seemed prepared to discuss not only grand strategy and Iraq but also domestic policy. His advisers, convinced the campaign's momentum is with them, were thrilled.

Allen, whose national and statewide reputation has tanked since he mocked an Indian American campaign aide of Webb's by repeatedly calling him "macaca" in a nearly all-white part of southwest Virginia, is unleashing what is certain to be a nonstop negative assault on Webb.

He is in trouble not only because of the macaca remark but also because of revelations in the New Republic this year about his schoolboy romance with the Confederate flag and his own sister's depiction of the young Allen as nasty and thuggish. (It is a strange aspect of this race that Webb seems on better terms with his ex-wife than Allen does with his own sister.)

Allen has tried to square the circle of seeming moderate enough to be reelected this fall while staying conservative enough to compete in the 2008 presidential primaries. It's an impossible trick, as illustrated by his current squirm in the debate on torture, in which he cannot bring himself to side either with the White House or with fellow Virginia Sen. John Warner, whom Allen likes to call "my partner."

Although Allen is a smarter, more sophisticated candidate than Jerry W. Kilgore, the Republican who lost the race for governor of Virginia last fall, he may face a similar demographic problem in the Northern Virginia suburbs, whose wealthy, well-schooled electorate includes tens of thousands of new voters, many of them Democrats and independents.

The macaca flap has hurt him badly there, and his good-ol'-boy shtick can't help much either. At a Labor Day parade, Allen, who favors cowboy boots for daily wear, rode a horse called Bubba. And his campaign is gearing up for its 11th annual "Hoe Down" fundraiser, where contributors of $1,000 will have the title of "Buckaroo" bestowed upon them, while deeper-pocketed donors will be dubbed "Ranch Boss" and "El Ranchero Grande."

Then again, it was Webb who insisted on arguing over the candidates' southwest Virginia roots, sparking a debate-within-a-debate in Tysons over which one of them is more authentically country. ("I've been coming to southwest Virginia since George Allen was a Californian," said Webb, who has relatives there. "For me," said Allen, "it's a place in my heart, not a place on a map.")

Many of the dark-suited business types in the audience at Tysons must have been mystified. After all, most of southwest Virginia is closer to Nashville than to Northern Virginia. But if Webb's unvarnished performance convinces many voters that he is somehow the more genuine and likable of the candidates, the non-pol may just pull this race out.

Black Leaders Endorse Cardin (WT)

By S.A. Miller And Jon Ward

The Washington Times, September 20, 2006

U.S. Rep. Elijah E. Cummings and other black Democratic leaders yesterday endorsed Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin for the U.S. Senate, as the Cardin campaign and that of his Republican rival -- Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele -- sought approval from supporters of Kweisi Mfume.

"We know where Ben Cardin stands on all the issues," said Mr. Cummings, who had backed the primary campaign of Mr. Mfume, the former president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. "We do not know who Michael Steele is, and we do not know what he stands for."

Meanwhile, Mr. Steele has aired a new TV ad that mocks negative campaigning and features him professing to "love puppies."

He congratulated Mr. Cardin on his endorsements yesterday, saying, "It just tells me I've got to work harder," and brushed aside Mr. Cummings' criticisms.

"They want to sound bite people's experiences and sound bite people's lives into 30 seconds, and people don't live that way," Mr. Steele said during a tour of Ellicott City.

"I'm not engaged in a conversation with Ben Cardin or Elijah Cummings," he said. "I'm talking to real Marylanders whose problems aren't red or blue, conservative or liberal, Republican or Democrat. They're real."

Race has played a key role in the U.S. Senate contest, which pits Mr. Cardin, a white 10-term congressman from Baltimore, against Mr. Steele, the first black to win statewide office in Maryland.

Mr. Steele's potential to break the Democratic lock on black votes has made Maryland's Senate race one of the most closely watched campaigns in the country and one of the most fiercely fought between the national parties.

Among the black leaders endorsing Mr. Cardin yesterday were Mr. Cummings; state Sen. Verna Jones, chairman of the state legislature's black caucus; and state Senate Majority Leader Nathaniel J. McFadden -- all Baltimore Democrats who endorsed Mr. Mfume in the primary election.

Mr. Cardin beat Mr. Mfume, 43.7 percent to 40.4 percent, statewide but lost in Baltimore and Prince George's County, two of the state's most populated and heavily Democratic jurisdictions, which are also both more than 65 percent black.

In Baltimore, Mr. Cardin received 24,637 votes to Mr. Mfume's 50,731, losing by 30.82 percent to 63.46 percent, according to unofficial results from the State Board of Elections.

The margin was wider In Prince George's County, where Mr. Cardin lost by more than 52,000 votes or 18.71 percent to 69.79 percent, unofficial results show.

U.S. Rep. Albert R. Wynn, a black Maryland Democrat who endorsed Mr. Mfume, has not announced whom he will support in the general election.

Cardin campaign spokesman Oren Shur said that yesterday's public endorsements were "important" in wooing support of black voters from Mr. Steele.

"Democrats are united," Mr. Shur said.

Mr. Cardin, Mr. Cummings and others at the event linked Mr. Steele with President Bush, whose approval rating is about 34 percent in Maryland and even lower among the state's black voters.

Mr. Cummings said Mr. Steele has hidden his positions on issues such as judicial nominations, stem-cell research, universal health care, education and the Iraq war.

"Where do you stand?" he said.

Mr. McFadden called out, "Behind George Bush," eliciting laughter and cheers from the officials on the stage.

DOJ_NMG_0066204

Also yesterday, Mr. Cardin pressed Mr. Steele to start "immediately" debating him twice a week, saying that Mr. Mfume "didn't duck debates, we engaged in them."

Steele campaign officials said that they have not been contacted by the Cardin campaign and that their phone calls and letters to the Cardin campaign have not been returned.

"That's the old, 'Oh he won't debate me,'" Mr. Steele said. "You know, trust me, be ready."

Black Officials Proclaim Support For Cardin (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, September 20, 2006

U.S. Senate candidate Benjamin L. Cardin reached out to African American leaders within the Democratic Party yesterday, trying to heal lingering racial divisions from the Democratic Primary and focus the contest on issues.

In front of Baltimore City Hall, a succession of black elected officials pledged their support for the veteran lawmaker, who is white, in his campaign against Republican Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, the first African American to win a statewide office in Maryland.

"It's time for all Democrats to come home," said state Sen. Nathaniel J. McFadden (D-Baltimore). "We are family!" he boomed. " We are family !"

The task before Cardin may not be so easy. African Americans have been among the most loyal Democratic voters in Maryland, but the dynamics of this campaign could test that loyalty.

Cardin's chief rival in last week's primary, Kweisi Mfume, has signaled that he will rally behind the Democratic nominee but did not appear at yesterday's event and has not formally endorsed him.

In the primary, Cardin drew limited support in two jurisdictions where African Americans make up the majority of voters. In Prince George's County, Mfume collected nearly 71,000 votes to Cardin's 18,600. In Baltimore, Mfume led Cardin 50,731 to 24,637.

Steele, meanwhile, has dedicated much of his campaign machinery to wooing black voters. After sewing up the primary last week, Steele's first move was to visit the election night parties of the two candidates for county executive in Prince George's. He spent the next morning talking to black voters at a barbershop in suburban Baltimore.

But Wayne K. Curry, a former Prince George's county executive, said Cardin can not assume that the county's black voters will line up behind the Democrat this time.

"It's going to be a different kind of election," Curry said. "Steele is a very attractive candidate. Flogging him with partisan labels is not going to be enough."

Steele's campaign pushed yesterday for more answers from Cardin about the caustic remarks a former staff member posted in a personal diary on the Internet. The staffer vented about a work environment she described as being hypersensitive about race and described her discomfort in being a "sex object" for Cardin's Jewish friends, whom she described using ethnic stereotypes.

Cardin fired the staffer Friday, but Steele's campaign has urged reporters to dig deeper to determine whether the woman really was a low-level staffer, as Cardin has described her. They also called the incident part of a pattern of racial insensitivity toward Steele.

"It goes to the heart of why people are sick and tired of politics as usual," said Doug Heye, Steele's spokesman.

Cardin said the matter was behind him and suggested that an attempt to draw further attention to it was a diversion.

He sought to focus the contest on issues at yesterday's event, and speaker after speaker said Steele's candidacy would not survive scrutiny once his views are known. "We know where Ben Cardin stands" Rep. Elijah E. Cummings (D-Md.) said. "We do not know who Michael Steele is, and we do not know what he stands for."

Cardin called on Steele to debate twice a week for the remaining seven weeks of the campaign. "Since this campaign started, Ben Cardin has participated in more than a dozen debates. Many of these debates included Democrats, Republicans and third-party candidates. Michael Steele never once showed up," said Cardin campaign spokesman Oren Shur.

In response, the Steele campaign said it was Cardin who has not responded to a request for debate. "We're still waiting for them to return our campaign manager's call," Heye said.

Third-party candidate Kevin Zeese said he, too, should be included in any debate.

Corker-Ford May Tip Senate (RC)

By Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, September 20, 2006

SODDY-DAISY, Tenn. — Sitting behind the counter of the Soddy Bible and Church Supplies store Friday afternoon, proprietor Frank Copeland admitted he hasn't devoted much attention to the Volunteer State's hotly contested Senate race. He's been focused instead on fighting a November referendum that would allow restaurants in this beer-only town to serve liquor by the drink.

In the contest between Rep. Harold Ford Jr. (D) and former Chattanooga Mayor Bob Corker (R) — a critical part of the math for Democrats to win a majority in the chamber this fall — Copeland said he is undecided about whom he will vote for.

But he does know he likes what he sees in Ford's newest campaign commercial, which features the 36-year-old Congressman in a church sanctuary talking about faith.

"I like his new ads," said Copeland, a retired power plant employee who took over the bible and church supply store as a hobby six years ago. "As a Christian, I'm definitely going to look at moral issues before other things."

Soddy-Daisy, a town of almost 12,000 located halfway between Chattanooga and Dayton, home of the 1925 Scopes Monkey Trial, isn't traditionally fertile territory for Democrats. But Ford must appeal to and convert voters like Copeland across the state to have any shot at winning the seat being vacated by retiring Sen. Bill Frist (R).

The race is tight and a poll done for Ford's campaign in late August showed the Congressman with a two-point lead.

Still, while Copeland remains open to Ford's message, his wife, Donna, is sure she's voting for Corker. And the reason is no mystery.

"Because he's a Republican," she said.

The Insider vs. The Outsider?

But with a difficult national political environment for the GOP, Corker isn't exactly embracing that party label. His campaign materials don't identify him as a Republican, and neither do his television ads.

Instead, Corker is focused on running as the anti-Washington, D.C., outsider while painting his opponent as a liberal, insider elitist.

Corker has touted his record as mayor and played up the fact that he started at the bottom before building a successful, and very lucrative, construction business.

His latest campaign commercial features him standing in front of a bridge and pledging to never forget where he came from.

"When I was 20, I poured concrete as a construction laborer building that bridge," Corker tells voters in the ad.

At the same time he talks about how Ford, the son of a Congressman, moved to Washington at age nine and graduated from the prestigious St. Albans School. Later, Ford graduated from the University of Pennsylvania and the University of Michigan law school. Corker graduated from the University of Tennessee in 1974.

"He really has kind of grown up in D.C." Corker said in an interview at his Chattanooga campaign headquarters last week. "I grew up in Tennessee."

Ford, meanwhile, has worked to portray himself as a fresh face, using the slogan "A New Generation of Leadership" in his ads and campaign materials. He argues that his voting record is much more moderate than Corker has portrayed it to be.

To refute Ford's message, Corker's commercials have made a point of identifying Ford as a Congressman — the one with the most liberal record in the state's delegation — who has been in Washington for 10 years.

Corker also argues that he is the candidate who better represents what Tennessee voters have come to expect in their Senators, making him the best choice to follow in the footsteps of GOP Sens. Howard Baker, Bill Brock, Fred Thompson, Lamar Alexander and Frist.

"By the time the race is over, obviously people are going to know both of us really, really well," Corker said. "I just really believe I'm going to win this race."

Some of that voter education was on display Saturday, at the tailgating before the 8 p.m. kickoff of the University of Florida vs. University of Tennessee Southeastern Conference showdown.

Both campaigns had a presence amid the orange-clad, GOP-friendly crowd that surrounded Neyland Stadium.

General Contractor Mark Price, a Morristown Democrat, was the most visible Ford supporter in crowded Lot 9, directly across from the stadium and where Republicans had their tailgate set up.

While Corker has been billed as having strong partisan crossover appeal, a frustrated Price said he didn't see any.

Price, who had a billboard-sized blue and white "Ford" sign attached to the top of a black sport utility vehicle, said he was fed up with the current direction of the country and he said it didn't matter what Corker's background was.

"As far as what our nation needs, he's going to be more of the same," Price said.

And he believes he isn't the only one who feels that way.

""I've got a lot of Republican friends who are fed up," he said. "They're going to flip to Ford."

Old Wounds

By 4:30 p.m. a Bluegrass band is rocking the GOP tailgate, located in a prime position on Peyton Manning Pass, where thousands of fans gather to see the Pride of the Southland Band lead the team march to the stadium to the apparently never tiresome strains of "Rocky Top."

Corker did not attend the tailgate or the game, but he had plenty of surrogates on hand.

State Sen. Tim Burchett (R), whose district includes the stadium and the 104,079 who fill it on Saturdays, said he is confident of Corker's chances.

Burchett is a longtime supporter of Corker, going back to his failed 1994 run for the GOP Senate nomination.

"I was for Corker when it wasn't cool to be for Corker," Burchett quipped.

Corker lost the 1994 contest to Frist, and that race has played a prominent role in Corker's 2006 primary as well.

In the 1994 race, Corker said he was in favor of abortion rights. But in this year's primary he said he had since changed his stance and no longer supports abortion rights.

DOJ_NMG_0066206

Corker's GOP opponents — former Reps. Van Hilleary and Ed Bryant — hammered him hard on the issue. But in the end, the split conservative vote helped Corker cruise to an easy win.

Still, he did not emerge without some visible wounds.

Tennessee Right to Life officials have refused to endorse Corker in the general election and don't plan to aid his campaign. Corker has been endorsed by the national Right to Life, a fact that is noted in the candidate comparison on the flip side of the depth chart GOP volunteers hand out at the game.

At the GOP tailgate, Tennessee Republican Party Chairman Bob Davis played down any divisions within the party and focused more on the math for a Ford victory.

East Tennessee has been traditionally Republican, west Tennessee has long been Democratic and the middle part of the state increasingly has become a key battleground.

The collar counties around Nashville will be an important factor in the Senate race, Davis said, noting that Ford has been spending a lot of time there.

"I'm not sure where he gets his votes," Davis said, predicting Ford would ultimately come up short.

Republicans also are counting on competing for votes in rural west Tennessee, where many culturally conservative voters have been lifelong Democrats.

"We will communicate with people who are middle of the roaders," said Corker, who already has spent more than $2 million of his personal fortune on the race. "The rural west Tennessee Democrats in this state are really a lot like east Tennessee Republicans. People who've worked hard and value the same kind of things that I do."

The Rockstar

It's just past 4:30 p.m. at Ford's tailgate, the band is still setting up and the food still cooking even though handmade posters invite passersby to "Wear a Sticker Get Free Food" or "Meet Harold Ford and Get Free Food."

A crowd of supporters has gathered in the semi-secluded Claxton Courtyard area, where the band eventually drowns out a student using a megaphone to announce that fans can get a free blanket or T-shirt if they sign up for a no-obligation credit card.

Ford arrives a little after 6 p.m. on his campaign bus. Along for the ride is Dylan Glenn, a Georgia Republican who has unsuccessfully run for Congress and a Ford friend since their days at St. Albans.

Ford, wearing an orange mesh polo shirt, grey dress slacks and black boots, is treated like a rockstar as he navigates his way through the throng of supporters, many of whom are whipping out camera phones and posing for pictures.

He speaks to individuals but does not address the crowd, which thins out quickly as fans head toward the stadium.

Before Ford arrives, John Townsend and a friend are chowing on a selection of the fried fish, chicken and gator tail that is being served at the Democrat's tailgate. Neither is wearing one of the orange "Jr." stickers that are being handed out.

Frustrated with the general direction of the country, Townsend said he is leaning toward Ford.

"I'd like to see a different change in government in general," he said, as the band's lead singer croons about sending "H-F-J-R" to Washington.

Townsend describes himself as middle of the road, having voted for Democrats in most local races but also for George Bush in 2000, choosing him over Tennessee native son Al Gore (D). In 2004, he voted for Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.).

"Bush cowboy policy has got to go," said the Rouse Construction Co. employee.

Ford's Hurdles

While the lagging popularity of the president, and the possibility of depressed GOP turnout, is no doubt a concern among Republicans, Ford has some unique hurdles of his own.

Friday evening, Jim and Nancy Robinson are having dinner on the patio of the Blue Plate restaurant on the revitalized Chattanooga waterfront that Corker claims as among his accomplishments as mayor.

The couple recently has celebrated their 50th wedding anniversary and characterize themselves politically as moderates with conservative leanings.

They are voting for Corker and also for Gov. Phil Bredesen (D), who is on course to win a relatively easy re-election in November.

"We're going to split our ticket and I think a lot of people will do the same," Jim Robinson said.

Robinson, a litigation attorney specializing in medical malpractice, decries the negative tone of the Senate race, and is especially disappointed in Corker.

"The negative campaign gives the appearance that you're behind," he said.

He thinks both Ford and Corker are good candidates.

Nancy Robinson, a former Miss University of Tennessee who is enjoying a martini and puffing on a Benson & Hedges, agreed.

But she was not as optimistic in her assessment of whether Tennessee voters are ready to embrace a black statewide candidate.

"This state just won't elect a black man," she said, as her husband quickly added that they personally have no problem with Ford's race.

Ford declined to be interviewed for this story. In a recent interview with the San Francisco Chronicle, he addressed the issue of race.

Ford jokingly told the newspaper that black candidates are undefeated in statewide contests in Tennessee.

DOJ_NMG_0066207

"We've never won one, but we're undefeated because nobody's ever ran," he said.

If he wins, Ford would be the first black Senator elected from the South since Reconstruction, but he told the newspaper that he thinks voters are smart enough to look beyond race.

"I have great faith in the people of Tennessee. They are going to pick the person who can do the job for them," Ford told the Chronicle.

That is exactly what Lois Wilder said she is looking for.

"I try to find the best man," Wilder explained, as she and her husband, Bobby, finish their lunch at the Chase Diner in Harriman — a cafeteria-style throwback to a bygone era, with a red and white checkered floor and corresponding table clothes.

The Wilders, who own the local NAPA Auto Parts store and don't consider themselves to be aligned with one party, are voting for Corker.

"We own a small business," said Lois Wilder. "It seems like he's come out with a lot more things on that."

Bobby Wilder said Ford's race wasn't an issue for him, but he said he did have concerns about the "things his Daddy's done."

Wilder's reference is to the south Memphis political dynasty from which Ford emerged.

While Ford's "Jr." stickers are the same as the campaign buttons used when he was elected to his father's House seat in 1996, they seem to have a different context in 2006.

Ford's uncle, former state Sen. John Ford, will go on trial early next year on charges of extortion, bribery and threatening a government witness — leading some observers to question whether the Ford name could be his biggest impediment to statewide office.

Ford repeatedly has said that his uncle's troubles will have no impact on his Senate race.

A Matter of Faith

Even before he appeared in the new church ad, it has been clear Ford's ability to appeal to voters of faith is an important part of his campaign strategy.

In another commercial, Ford tells viewers that one of the first things he tells children is to trust in God.

At Ford's tailgate Saturday, Rep. Lincoln Davis (D-Tenn.) applauded his colleague's efforts to talk more openly about religion.

"We Democrats have been guilty of hiding our faith under a bushel basket," Davis said. "Now some of us are taking the basket off and letting the light shine in."

And if Frank Copeland, the Soddy Bible and Church Supplies owner, is any indication, that strategy may be making an impact.

Copeland said he is resigned to not finding a candidate he agrees with 100 percent — "I'm not going to find a perfect candidate. They'd kill him if he'd run," he said — so he will settle for the better of the two.

And, on the issues he cares about, he likes what he sees coming from Ford.

"He's a Christian, apparently, and he's showing it, and I like that," Copeland said.

Bellwether Is Hard To Predict (RC)

By David M. Drucker

Roll Call, September 20, 2006

LAKE OZARK, Mo. — State Auditor Claire McCaskill (D) is articulate, charismatic, intelligent and an effective, hard-nosed politician. But some Missourians who compliment her in one breath will tell you with the next that her liberal stands on key issues could sink her Senate bid on Nov. 7.

That Sen. Jim Talent (R) reflects the majority of Show Me State voters who are culturally and socially conservative — and that he is well regarded and hasn't necessarily committed a fireable offense — are important elements in his favor in a race sure to finish close, no matter the outcome.

"Claire McCaskill has done a good job in the state of Missouri. She's very aggressive. ... Claire would be a good Senator," said Bill Miller, publisher of the Washington Missourian in Washington, a conservative, former farming community 50 miles west of downtown St. Louis that is slowly being suburbanized.

"But Talent's done a good job. Talent is very hard working. I think Claire's got a problem with the fact that she's aligned herself with the national Democratic Party. She's embraced some of their values and some of the things they promote and support, and I think that's going to hurt her in Missouri, frankly."

While the 300 or so mostly small-to-medium-size market newspaper publishers from throughout Missouri gathered on the banks of the Lake of the Ozarks for the Missouri Press Association's 140th annual convention, they also were there to host the first debate of four face-offs scheduled to occur before Election Day.

Many of the publishers heaped praise on McCaskill. But they were simultaneously skeptical of her ability to deliver the state for Democrats in the party's quest to pick up the six seats it needs to take back the Senate.

Yes, these publishers will tell you, the people of the communities they serve are concerned with national issues such as the Iraq War. It's one of the first things they mentioned when asked what their friends, neighbors and readers are talking about in regard to the midterm elections.

DOJ_NMG_0066208

Yes, religious and conservative towns in rural Missouri that have been quite supportive of Republicans are unhappy with how the GOP has governed in Washington, D.C., on myriad issues.

From federal spending, to the economy and their quality of life, to additional bread-and-butter issues such as health care and education, many of these Missourians are less than thrilled.

And yes, McCaskill is making a concerted effort to woo these voters, placing ads in small newspapers serving these areas and crisscrossing the region in an RV. She readily acknowledged in an interview on Friday that a weak presence in rural Missouri — "outstate Missouri" to many from those parts — contributed to her poor showing there during her narrow loss in the 2004 gubernatorial election.

"I made a mistake in '04, and didn't go out and listen to rural Missouri," McCaskill said. "I didn't show them who I was, and my values. As a result, I was on defense."

This year, in a race of several nuances, the discontent that exists in the Missouri heartland, including among staunch Republicans and like-minded independents, is likely to help McCaskill drive up her vote totals in rural Missouri, especially when compared to her performance in 2004.

But voter discontent, and McCaskill's rural push, are not guaranteed to matter enough, said Kate Martin, publisher of the Republic Monitor in Perryville.

"I think she will do better in Perry County. I think it's the standard of living for people in small communities. We have a great number of young, struggling families who aren't able to take that next step into a comfortable life," said Martin, whose paper serves a rural community of around 8,000 located 80 miles south of St. Louis.

"But we're a very religious community, so her stance on stem-cell research, and a woman's right to choose, will hurt her there."

This particularly could be the case because Talent, who began this race with, and continues to have, a significant financial advantage, doesn't appear to be taking the support of conservative voters for granted. The incumbent Senator scored a political "coup" last week, contended Daily Events publisher Jeff Schrag, when he hit the pavement to knock on doors in the Republican stronghold of Springfield in southwest Missouri.

Talent finished June with $7.1 million in his campaign account, compared to $2.8 million for McCaskill.

Between Iraq and a Hard Place

Held at the luxurious Lodge of the Four Seasons in central Missouri, the Talent-McCaskill appearance before the publishers was a decidedly polite affair that was more idea forum than pointed debate. Both scored some points — and took some hits — as they argued over the Iraq War, the war on terror, illegal immigration and the economy, among other topics (the Libertarian and Progressive party candidates were included in the event).

In response to a question on what U.S. policy on Iraq should be, McCaskill painted a picture of a mission gone awry.

"We were told, if we went in and helped build a Democracy in Iraq, we would have partners against terrorism," McCaskill said. "We clearly have not gotten what we were told we were going to get, and it's very important that we change course, that we begin redeployment and stabilize the entire region."

Talent tried to frame McCaskill's position as defeatist. He conceded that problems persist in Iraq, but he focused his comments on making the adjustments needed to see the mission through.

"I'm supportive of winning in Iraq. Not stalemate, not quitting," Talent said. "What we can't do ... is withdraw, either immediately or according to an artificial timetable that has nothing to do with winning. That's just another name for quitting. My opponent has policies of weakness."

Such bickering might be typical of a Democrat and Republican heading into the home stretch of a high-stakes campaign. But Show Me State voters aren't likely to fall for cheap rhetoric.

According to an analysis offered by some of the publishers attending the MPA convention, many of whom are longtime fixtures in their communities, the attitudes of Missouri voters aren't easy to pinpoint, especially given national public opinion polls that show the Republican Party in trouble.

The Iraq War is Exhibit A.

By and large, Missourians hew to the national polls in their disenchantment with the war and President Bush. But instead of clamoring for an immediate or future arbitrary exit, many are concerned that the United States could be embroiled in a losing conflict and are worried about what that would mean for the country's national security situation, the publishers said.

What these voters would like to see out of Congress and the White House is a plan to win, and then progress on the ground that provides evidence that the goal of building a democratic Iraq capable of defending itself is achievable and forthcoming.

"People on both sides of the aisle are disillusioned by the war — simply because we're not making any progress," said Jack Whitaker, publisher of Missouri's oldest daily newspaper, the Hannibal Courier-Post.

The cultural divide between the metropolitan regions of St. Louis and Kansas City, and rural Missouri, also is more complex than it appears from afar.

Republicans have been running well in outstate Missouri thanks to their positions on hot-button social issues such as same-sex marriage, abortion and stem-cell research (Talent opposes all three, McCaskill does not). In fact, many historically Democratic counties have elected their first Republican county commissioners and state legislators in the past few years, with the GOP controlling both houses of the state Legislature only recently.

But the Republican edge in rural Missouri can't be simply credited to the party's position on social issues. This also is about outstate voters perceiving that they've been slighted in regard to what they received for their tax dollars compared to the money spent by the state and federal governments in urban and suburban Missouri.

Much of this resentment built while Democrats held political control, and Republicans have been able to reap the benefits.

"There is a huge divide between the urban and rural residents of this state," said Whitaker, whose paper serves a community of about 20,000 located 115 miles due north of St. Louis. "The rural faction has finally gotten fed up to playing second fiddle, and said: 'It's our time.'"

The Battle for Black Voters

The Senate race is far from simply a contest for the hearts and minds of rural Missouri. Metropolitan St. Louis and Kansas City — and the Interstate 70 corridor that links the state's two most populated regions — loom large in this bellwether battle.

Kansas City is McCaskill's base — it's where she got her start in public life as a prosecutor. It is there, and in greater St. Louis, where Democrats traditionally run strong; where suburban swing voters are numerous; and where dissatisfaction over the Iraq War and Bush's unpopularity are palpable.

It is there where some voters are looking for a way to register their concern with the Bush administration and those politicians who they believe are supporting his policies.

It is there where McCaskill, the state auditor for nearly eight years with a gubernatorial run under her belt — she deposed a sitting Democratic governor in the 2004 primary — looks to benefit.

Jane McKie, a retired teacher who lives a few blocks from where Talent attended high school in suburban St. Louis (she was an elementary school classmate of his before he skipped a grade), describes herself as a registered independent who votes for politicians in both parties. When Talent stopped by to shake her hand Saturday while walking the parade route of the annual Greentree Festival Parade, McKie gladly extended her hand and was very cordial.

She's voting for McCaskill.

"Iraq definitely is a concern; Afghanistan is a concern; terrorism is a concern of mine. I can't speak for everybody, but that's sort of the things that are on the agenda at our house," McKie said.

No more is McCaskill's advantage pronounced, potentially, than among black voters.

Although officially a nonpartisan event, McCaskill received an enthusiastic welcome Friday evening at a black-tie event that focused on black education issues in St. Louis, and she got a round of applause when one of the keynote speakers, Atlanta Mayor Shirley Franklin, referred to her as the "new Senator to-be."

McCaskill was warmly embraced as she worked the room on the 20th floor of the Renaissance Grand hotel, accompanied by Sen. Tom Harkin (D-Iowa), who was in town for the evening to help her raise money. Missouri state Rep. Rodney R. Hubbard (D), whose district includes a portion of St. Louis, said he expects Missouri's blacks to vote Democratic in numbers similar to recent presidential contests.

St. Louis attorney Jerryl Christmas, a 43-year-old McCaskill supporter who attended the education event, agreed.

"The [black] community is solidly behind Claire McCaskill," Christmas said. "Sen. Talent has consistently voted with the president, whose interests have been outside the interests of the African-American community."

But Talent isn't conceding the black vote. His outreach into the community continues to be extensive, having run television and radio ads tailored to black voters beginning in July. Additionally, Talent has held several events geared toward winning black votes, including roundtables, meet-and-greets and church visits.

He began airing two new spots on black radio stations this week.

"I think that in some of the recent activity, [Talent] has made some inroads into the minority community. The record already indicates that that is in fact happening," said St. Louis businessman Ivan James, 62, a McCaskill supporter.

"It's just not a matter of [blacks] voting for Claire because it's Claire. She's going to have to demonstrate what she has to offer and what she can do better than what Talent has already done. She has a real tough road ahead of her."

Local Boy Makes Good

As a native of Des Peres and a graduate of Kirkwood High School, Talent's base is the St. Louis suburbs, about a 25-minute drive west from downtown. He previously represented the area in the state Legislature and the House, and he has run strong there in past races.

At the Greentree Festival parade on Saturday that snaked through the leafy residential neighborhoods of Kirkwood, Talent vigorously worked the crowd that lined the streets for the event, responding to calls of "Hi, Jim" and "Way to go, Jim." Almost no one called him Senator, with one self-described "values voter," 20-year-old youth ministry employee Ryan Pott, getting up out of his lawn chair to give Talent a big bear hug.

But in an interview before the parade got under way (it began in the parking lot of Kirkwood High School, where Talent graduated from in 1973) and with a C-SPAN camera crew filming, Talent acted as though his support in these parts was something to be earned, as opposed to assumed.

"I feel pretty good about the race generally," Talent said. "But it's still, in the minds of the average voter, early. ... So we'll have to see what happens."

Cantwell, McGavick Win Big In Washington (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, September 20, 2006

SEATTLE -- Sen. Maria Cantwell, Washington Democrat, last night easily defeated her anti-war challenger, setting up a November showdown against Republican businessman Mike McGavick in what the GOP sees as one of its best chances to pick up a Senate seat.

With about 55 percent of the expected vote counted, Miss Cantwell had 262,719 votes -- an overwhelming 92 percent of the Democratic vote. She easily won over Hong Tran, a lawyer with a nonprofit agency, who raised little money and relied on grass-roots volunteers to amplify her anti-war message throughout the campaign.

Mrs. Tran received 11,452 votes, or 4 percent of the total, leading three other little-known Democratic challengers.

"I feel very good about tonight's vote, but the ultimate vote is in November and I will work every day between now and then to be successful," said Miss Cantwell, who returned to Washington, D.C., for Senate votes on Monday. "We will work very hard to get around to every corner of the state and talk about the issues that affect the voters of Washington."

Mrs. Tran, 40, told supporters gathered at her Seattle home that Washington deserves a senator who stands up for working people.

"You know, I understood the challenges of running against a millionaire incumbent," Mrs. Tran told The Washington Times after early returns showed her losing. "But I ran to make sure people had an alternative choice if they really cared about ending the war."

She said she had no plans to calls Miss Cantwell, and said it is too bad her lack of fundraising prevented her from mounting a serious challenge. The refugee from Vietnam noted that many voters want to have an incumbent Democrat run in November, the better to keep the Senate seat in Democratic hands.

"People vote for Cantwell, but they do reluctantly," she said.

The Democratic contest initially seemed like it could harm the freshman senator, who was being criticized by several candidates for her October 2002 vote to authorize President Bush to use force in Iraq.

Ultimately, after the Cantwell campaign hired two of the senator's stronger critics, the primary served as a warmup for the general election against Mr. McGavick, who also easily won his primary.

Mr. McGavick, a former chief executive of Safeco Insurance, had 185,743 votes, or 85 percent of the total, easily outpolling five Republican challengers, led by Brad Klippert at 14,422 votes, or 6 percent.

"All I can say about the primary is one down, one to go. We are going to win this November," Mr. McGavick, 48, told cheering supporters from his Seattle campaign headquarters during a live Web cast.

Republicans consider the Washington seat one of their best opportunities in November, despite national trends showing voters irritated with Mr. Bush and his majority party. The state has a Democratic governor and legislature and Democrats hold six of its nine congressional seats.

"Mike McGavick's message of civility is resonating with Washington state voters, who are tired of a senator that puts party interests above the interests of the state," said Sen. Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, who leads the Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee.

Though Miss Cantwell, 47, was considered vulnerable a few months ago, she recently opened a double-digit lead over Mr. McGavick in several polls.

Mr. McGavick, a millionaire like Miss Cantwell, says he is running to "put an end to the mindless mean-spiritedness and partisanship" in Washington, D.C. He casts himself as an independent thinker and calls Miss Cantwell "part of the problem and not the cure." Mr. McGavick will be in Washington, D.C., tonight at a National Republican Senatorial Committee fundraiser in his honor.

Most of last night's results were tabulated from mail-in ballots. There are 3.3 million registered voters in Washington, and about 80 percent of them were expected to cast votes via mail.

Miss Cantwell and Mr. McGavick will probably debate twice before Oct. 16, when voters can begin mailing in their ballots. Both candidates have millions in the bank to run television ads in the fewer than 50 days remaining until votes are counted.

Meanwhile yesterday, on the other side of the country, Massachusetts voters set up a November gubernatorial race between Democrat Deval Patrick and Republican Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey.

Either candidate winning would be a first. Mr. Deval won 49 percent of the vote in his first bid for elective office after having been head of the Justice Department's civil rights division under President Clinton. He would be the state's first black governor. Mrs. Healey, who was unopposed in the GOP primary, is trying to become the first woman to be elected governor of the state.

Wash Senate: Now, The Main Event For Cantwell, McGavick (AP)

By David Ammons

DOJ_NMG_0066211

AP, September 20, 2006

Washington's suspense-free U.S. Senate primary predictably cranked out the long-expected outcome — Democratic Sen. Maria Cantwell and Republican Mike McGavick were nominated as finalists on Tuesday.

Now the unpredictable begins.

Cantwell and McGavick dispatched their intraparty rivals by wipeout margins — with about 49 percent of the expected vote counted, the senator had 92 percent of the Democratic vote and the challenger had 85 percent of the GOP field.

There was so little suspense that Cantwell didn't even stay in her homestate to await the returns. Rather, she returned to Washington, D.C., on Monday to attend to Senate chores.

McGavick had the stage to himself, but after a brief celebration at his Seattle campaign headquarters, he, too, was heading to Washington, D.C., to shake the money trees.

The race has drawn attention as one of the Top 10 Senate contests this year, given that Cantwell barely won six years ago and McGavick has been described as perhaps the best GOP challenger in the country.

Two degrees of separation: McGavick once was campaign manager and chief of staff for Sen. Slade Gorton, whom Cantwell eased from office in 2000.

Some polls had showed Cantwell and McGavick in a fairly tight race, in the 5-to-7 percent range, in recent months, but several late polls have the senator leading by double digits.

Cantwell also has a strong lead in finances so far, and has $5.1 million on hand, to McGavick's $2.8 million, after he loaned his campaign $2 million.

But though the race leans Democratic, both sides agree that the seat still remains in play and that unforeseen developments could really change the dynamics.

The outcome could have national implications, since the Democrats need to hold the seat if they're to have a shot at taking back control of the Senate.

Cantwell, a freshman who alienated the anti-war base of her party by backing the Iraq invasion, and McGavick, who made his mark in the business world, said the real campaign can begin now, leading to the Nov. 7 finale.

Both Cantwell, 47, and McGavick, 48, pledged a high-road general election campaign and said they've tentatively agreed to at least two debates. Among the issues to be discussed: the Iraq war, which both have supported, energy prices, proposed oil drilling in the Arctic wilds, Social Security private investments, health care and federal spending.

"I feel very good about tonight's vote, but the ultimate vote is in November and I will work every day between now and then to be successful," Cantwell said from Washington, D.C. "We will work very hard to get around to every corner of the state and talk about the issues that affect the voters of Washington."

She said the primary balloting showed a strong Democratic turnout, and chalked that up to voter unrest with President Bush and the national Republicans, including the "stay the course" policy on Iraq, efforts to privatize Social Security and high energy prices.

"I feel terrific!" McGavick said in an interview. "We're feeling very good about the race and now we go on to the main event. The way we have dominated our primary shows that the voters are seeking something new and fresh and we can offer it in this campaign.

"The contrast between our campaigns will be very clear."

McGavick said he'll continue to base his campaign on civility and hopes Democratic backers of the senator will stop trashing him. Cantwell dismissed the jab and said "I will talk about the issues."

Cantwell was far ahead of four intraparty challengers and McGavick swamped five GOP competitors.

Cantwell's closest Democratic competitor, anti-war activist and attorney Hong Tran, was far back at 4 percent. Michael Goodspaceguy Nelson, who promoted space exploration, and perennial candidates Mohammad Said and Mike The Mover trailed.

McGavick's closest challenger was Brad Klippert of the Tri-Cities at 7 percent. William Edward Chovil, Gordon Allen Pross, B. Barry Massoudi and Warren Hanson trailed.

Independent Robin Adair of Seattle, Green Party nominee Aaron Dixon of Seattle and the Libertarians' Bruce Guthrie of Bellingham were nominated at earlier conventions and will be on the November ballot.

The only two incumbent congressmen with primary challengers, Republican Doc Hastings in the 4th District and Democrat Jim McDermott in the 7th, easily won renomination.

Hastings, chairman of the much-criticized House Ethics Committee, defeated Benton County Commissioner Claude Oliver. Democrats nominated Tri-Cities businessman Richard Wright over challenger Lewis Picton.

McDermott, nicknamed "U.S. Rep. for Life" because of his safe urban Seattle district, had nearly 90 percent of the vote in a three-way Democratic race, dispatching newcomers Joshua Smith and Donovan Rivers.

Challengers had primaries in some of the other districts, but in the hottest race, in the 8th District, neither Republican Rep. Dave Reichert or Democratic foe Darcy Burner had intraparty competition.

Cantwell, McGavick Ready To Face Off (SEAPI)

By Neil Modie

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, September 20, 2006

Democratic Sen. Maria Cantwell and Mike McGavick, her Republican challenger, swatted away nine dark-horse opponents in Tuesday's primary, a mere breather in a general election campaign that has seven weeks to go.

The Senate primary held little suspense other than to show how many Democratic votes Hong Tran, a Seattle lawyer and peace candidate, would take from Cantwell.

The senator has angered some liberals for her vote authorizing the invasion of Iraq and her measured criticism of the conduct of the war.

As expected, Cantwell easily rolled over Tran, one of four Democrats and five Republicans who were eliminated from the race Tuesday. But the freshman senator and McGavick, the former chief executive of Safeco Corp., have been running general election campaigns all along, paying virtually no attention to their primary rivals.

McGavick, in an interview after addressing supporters at his Seattle headquarters Tuesday night, said voters "really want robust conversation" between the two candidates about three issues: the Iraq war as part of the fight against Islamic terrorism; the federal deficit, and saving Social Security.

Cantwell, in an interview, pointed to some of the same issues, saying the country has "gone from record surpluses to record deficits" under President Bush. As for Bush's plan to privatize Social Security, she said, "I just think that should be off the table."

McGavick, aware of the political volatility of privatization, said he, too, is opposed to Bush's plan but favors allowing younger workers the option of government-managed Social Security investment accounts.

Seeking to project a moderate image, McGavick has suggested there isn't much difference between his and Cantwell's views on the war. Cantwell, though, voted for a rejected Senate measure calling for a gradual withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq to begin this year. McGavick said he didn't like it.

The two have had plenty else to disagree about. Cantwell said she wants to pursue an energy independence strategy but led the successful Senate fight to block oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. McGavick supports drilling. She voted to block a bill to cut estate taxes for the wealthy. He wants to repeal the tax.

McGavick has been in the ticklish position of criticizing the failure of the GOP-controlled Senate to pass meaningful legislation addressing border security, immigration, Social Security reform and health care costs.

Typical of an incumbent who feels she's ahead in the polls and a challenger looking for more exposure, Cantwell has agreed to only two debates -- one on each side of the state -- while McGavick has proposed nine. The McGavick campaign says it has accepted 15 invitations to forums or debates with the senator.

While Tuesday's election eliminated the Republican and Democratic also-rans from the Senate race, three other long-shot candidates will appear on the ballot in November. If the race is close, they potentially could cause problems for Cantwell and possibly McGavick by peeling away votes from one candidate or the other.

Aaron Dixon, the Green Party nominee and long-ago Black Panther leader, and Bruce Guthrie, a Libertarian, are running as peace candidates to Cantwell's left. Robin Adair, an independent, will also be on the November ballot.Conventional wisdom is that Libertarians usually take more votes from Republicans than Democrats. When Cantwell beat Republican Sen. Slade Gorton -- McGavick's former boss -- by 2,229 votes in 2000, the GOP blamed it on the 64,734 votes won by Libertarian Jeff Jared.

This time, however, with Guthrie waging an anti-war campaign, he as well as Dixon might draw liberals disenchanted with Cantwell.

On the other hand, some political analysts believe most voters know little about generally obscure third-party candidates beyond what party they represent. So the Libertarian might attract more voters who favor that party's philosophy of limited government and limited taxes than voters angry about the war.

McGavick, 48, a Seattle native, managed Gorton's successful 1988 Senate campaign and then was his chief of staff. McGavick became a Washington, D.C., lobbyist for the insurance industry and worked for a Chicago insurance company before returning to his hometown to take over Seattle-based Safeco.

Republicans Call For Ney To Resign (AP-Y)

By David Hammer

AP, September 19, 2006

A top House Republican on Tuesday called for Rep. Bob Ney to resign, days after the six-term GOP lawmaker agreed to plead guilty to federal corruption charges.

"He betrayed his constituents, he betrayed the body and there's no place for him in the Congress," said Rep. Deborah Pryce, the fourth-ranking Republican in the House.

DOJ_NMG_0066213

Last week, Ney admitted improperly accepting tens of thousands of dollars worth of trips, meals, sports tickets and casino chips while trying to win favors for a disgraced Washington lobbyist and a foreign aviation company.

The Ohio congressman had defiantly denied any wrongdoing for months, but he reversed course and agreed to plead guilty in court papers filed Friday. Prosecutors will recommend he serve 27 months in prison.

Ney, who is under treatment for alcohol dependency, was expected to formally plead guilty in court Oct. 13.

Mary Jo Kilroy, Pryce's Democratic opponent, has called for Ney to step down and give up his federal pension.

Another Republican facing a close re-election race, Steve Chabot of Cincinnati, said through a spokesman that any lawmaker responsible for criminal wrongdoing should step down. Ohio Republican Party Chairman Bob Bennett and Ohio state Sen. Joy Padgett, the Republican running to replace Ney in Congress, have already called for Ney's resignation.

But House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, cautioned that Ney hasn't formally pleaded guilty and could change his mind before his scheduled court appearance. He has said repeatedly that resignation is a decision for Ney and his family to make.

"Until he has his day in court, I don't think it's up to me to comment what he should or shouldn't do."

Barry Bennett, chief of staff for Cincinnati-area Republican Rep. Jean Schmidt, took issue with Ney collecting a paycheck if he isn't actively representing his district.

"Short of expulsion, we can't make him leave, but meanwhile nobody is going to be voting for the constituents of the 18th district for the next two weeks and maybe not for two weeks in November and two weeks in December," Bennett said. "It's not right."

Ney's chief of staff, David Popp, and lawyer William Lawler could not be reached immediately for comment. Lawler said Friday that Ney was not ready to resign.

For Governors In G.O.P. Slots, A Liberal Turn (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Sept. 19 — Here are the things that Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger will be bragging about on the campaign trail: an initiative to lower greenhouse gases with the onus on big companies, a $1 increase in the state's minimum wage and a program to open up access to prescription drugs.

Mr. Schwarzenegger, who six months ago fashioned himself a Republican reformer bent on hobbling entrenched Democratic institutions, is not just tolerating positions generally associated with liberal candidates. Rather, he is using them as the centerpiece of his re-election campaign, marking the first time in a generation that a Republican governor here has clung to the left during a re-election fight.

The strategy is not unique to Mr. Schwarzenegger's campaign. Across the nation's 36 races for governor, Republican candidates in states heavy with moderate or Democratic voters are playing up their liberal positions on issues including stem cell research, abortion and the environment, while remaining true to their party's platform on taxes and streamlining government.

In Massachusetts, Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey, who is seeking to fill the seat that will be vacated by Gov. Mitt Romney, has openly split with Mr. Romney on abortion rights and stem cell research; her views are shared by the Republican candidate for governor in Illinois, Judy Baar Topinka, who also supports civil unions for same-sex couples.

In Maryland, the Republican incumbent, Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., is pushing for increasing state aid for programs for the disabled and imposing tighter restrictions on coal-fired plants; the Republican governor of Hawaii, Linda Lingle, opposes the death penalty. In Connecticut, Gov. M. Jodi Rell also parts ways with the Republican Party on civil unions and financing for stem cell research.

Governing Republican and campaigning Democratic is not a new technique; George E. Pataki, the New York governor, has made a career winning elections as a Republican in a mostly Democratic state. But political experts say that the strategy is particularly pervasive this year, as Republicans seek to distance themselves from an unpopular president and to respond to what is widely recognized as polarization fatigue among many voters.

"The conservative side of Republican party has been so dominant in recent years that we haven't seen a lot of this phenomenon at work until this year," said Bruce E. Cain, the director of the Institute of Governmental Studies at the University of California, Berkeley.

Now, Mr. Cain said, the easiest way for Republicans to "stay competitive is to take deviations from the standard G.O.P. lines."

In many ways, the strategy reflects the dynamics of local contests, in which voters are willing to overlook the party affiliation of a candidate if they believe he stands with them on one or two important issues, or pushes through policies that are inherently nonpartisan and that will improve their daily lives.

"The ideology that binds Republican governors is getting things done for their constituents," said Philip A. Musser, the executive director of the Republican Governors Association. "From the broadest perspective, voters in these races go into the booth caring less if governor is pro life or pro choice and more about whether he is going to reduce their property taxes or make their life easier at the D.M.V."

Unlike other campaign seasons, when a popular president has been an asset to local politicians, many candidates this year are trying to distance themselves from President Bush, either by staking out ground in contrast to him or, as is the case with Mr. Schwarzenegger, treating the president like a communicable disease.

Democratic candidates across the country have responded by constantly reminding voters of their opponents' conservative leanings, wherever they exist, and trying to tie them as much as possible to the White House.

DOJ_NMG_0066214

In recent months, Mr. Schwarzenegger has gone out of his way to point out where he differs with the president — stem cell research and the role of large companies in creating heat-trapping gases like carbon dioxide — and to openly criticize the White House order to police the Mexican border with National Guard troops.

When Mr. Bush visited California last spring, the governor made sure they were scarcely seen together.

On the legislative front, after a humiliating defeat last year of his ballot initiatives designed to take power from nurses and teachers, Mr. Schwarzenegger leapt in the opposite direction this summer.

With the Legislature, he signed off on laws imposing the country's most stringent controls on carbon-dioxide emissions, raising the minimum wage $1 — after vetoing a similar measure twice before — and helping low-income Medicare beneficiaries to pay for prescriptions.

His campaign tour bus is painted green, along with the vaguely preservationist phrase "Protecting the California Dream," as his slogan.

His campaign manager, Steve Schmidt, suggested that this was business as usual for Mr. Schwarzenegger, who, he said, "doesn't rule out ideas just because they came from someone from another party.''

"In every poll across the country what voters say they yearn for is politicians in both parties to stop fighting,'' Mr. Schmidt said, "The one person in the country who is doing that is Governor Schwarzenegger."

The Democrat who wants to unseat the governor, Phil Angelides, has spent the better part of the last few months trying to remind voters that Mr. Schwarzenegger is a Republican through and through, who supported the war in Iraq, the president who ordered it and many right-of-center policies.

"Two months of pretending to be a Democrat doesn't make him a Democrat," said Amanda Crumley, the communications director for the Angelides campaign, with a certain amount of fury in her voice. "Just like he has done for the last three years, if he is re-elected, which he won't be, he will continue to govern like the Bush Republican that he is."

While Mr. Schwarzenegger's behavior may seem like pure survival tactics in the deep woods of one of the nation's bluest states, other recent Republican governors in California have sought to accentuate their conservative leanings.

Pete Wilson, who was governor for most of the 1990's, supported a ban barring state services for illegal immigrants, capitalizing on anger over illegal immigration to win re-election, and his predecessor, George Deukmejian, won the ardor of suburban voters by presenting himself as tough as nails on crime.

Each state race has its own quirks and circumstances, but the song remains the same in many of them. In the Republican primary in Illinois, Ms. Baar Topinka, the state treasurer, was criticized by opponents for her support of same-sex unions. She nonetheless prevailed in that race.

In some states, however, it is a matter of survival.

Mr. Ehrlich of Maryland has not had much success with his legislature, and he talks openly about his more liberal positions.

"He is a centrist Republican running in a state with heavy Democratic majority," said James G. Gimpel, a professor at the University of Maryland. "So the reality of re-election suggests that he has to do that. There aren't enough Republicans to elect him in this state even if they all turned out."

Ex-Clinton Official Wins Mass. Governor Primary (USAT)

By From Wire Reports

USA Today, September 20, 2006

BOSTON — A former Clinton administration official won the Democratic nomination for governor Tuesday in a state where the Republicans have held the top seat for nearly 16 years.

Deval Patrick, 50, who headed the Justice Department's civil rights division under President Clinton, will face Republican nominee Lt. Gov. Kerry Healy in November. If he wins, he would become the state's first black governor.

Meanwhile, in Washington state, Democratic Sen. Maria Cantwell faced opponents who charged that her vote for the Iraq war should disqualify her from nomination.

Patrick defeated venture capitalist Chris Gabrieli, 46, who spent more than $8 million of his own fortune on the campaign, and state Attorney General Tom Reilly. The candidates had sparred over the state's economy, education, and how to implement the state's ambitious new health care law. The law requires those who do not have health insurance to buy it from the state.

With most precincts reporting, Patrick had 48%, Gabrieli had 28% and Reilly had 23%.

"It has been not just my campaign, but yours, and it won't be just my victory, God willing, it will be yours," Patrick told a rally.

Reilly portrayed Patrick and Gabrieli as out-of-touch millionaires. He told a working-class crowd in Dorchester: "We're not rich and we're not poor, but we get up every day and we work hard. … We are the heart and soul of this state."

One of the most divisive issues was whether to cut the state's income-tax rate from 5.3% to 5%. Patrick opposes a cut; Reilly and Gabrieli supported it.

The three have also sparred on allowing the children of illegal immigrants to pay the same lower tuition rate at state colleges as other residents. Patrick and Reilly supported the proposal; Gabrieli opposed it.

DOJ_NMG_0066215

If Patrick wins in November he would be the second black elected governor in the country, after Douglas Wilder of Virginia in 1989. No Democrat has been elected governor here since Michael Dukakis in 1986.

Healey faced no opposition for the Republican gubernatorial nomination. Republican Gov. Mitt Romney decided not to run and is considering a run for president.

In Washington, Cantwell, like Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman, faced a revolt from Democrats who oppose the Iraq war. One candidate, lawyer Hong Tran, advocated a withdrawal of troops and likened Cantwell's stance on the war to Lieberman's. Cantwell distanced herself from her vote for the war, saying she might vote differently today.

Cantwell faced accusations that she helped arrange more than $11 million in federal money for projects benefiting a lobbyist friend. She has denied any wrongdoing.

Gray World (WSJ)

By Jeremy J. Siegel

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

The United States and the rest of the developed world stand at a precipice. Over the next two decades, tens of millions of Americans, Europeans and Japanese -- members of the prosperous "baby boom" generation that was born following the Second World War -- will leave the labor force. Many are expecting a long and comfortable retirement by relying on government and private pension plans as well as tax-supported medical services.

But unless we can exploit the dramatic demographic and economic changes that are before us, our future will be much poorer. Instead of stepping into an easy retirement, many retirees will tumble into a future marked by bankrupt government social programs and declining asset values that will quickly deplete their cherished nest eggs.

This forecast is not based on an unpredictable future, but on events that have already transpired. Aside from immigration, we know almost exactly how many people over the next 20 years are going to reach the working age of 20 and the retirement age of 65. "Demography," as the great management sage Peter Drucker once remarked, "is the future that already happened."

Demography is Destiny: The latest data from the U.N. Demographic Commission, displayed in the accompanying chart, clearly show the aging of the developed world. In the U.S. in 1950 there were seven people of working age (20-65) for every retiree, and even today, there are almost five. But by 2030, when the last of the baby boom generation retires, that ratio will fall by nearly one-half, down below 3 to 1.

The aging of the population in Europe and Japan is even more extreme than in the U.S. In Japan by mid-century, the ratio of workers aged 20-65 to retirees will fall to just over one-for-one. At that time the most populated five-year age segment in Japan will be those aged 75-80. The same will be true in Italy, Spain, Greece and other European countries. The demands of the retirees from Europe and Japan will raise the prices of goods bought and sold in international markets, so there is no way the U.S., despite its younger population, can shield itself from the demands arising from the aging populations abroad.

The Bankruptcy of Government and Private Pension Systems: Although it is widely known that our Social Security and Medicare Programs are threatened by these demographic trends, there are many who believe that they have accumulated sufficient private wealth to fund their retirement.

But this may not be so. The same crisis that strikes the public pension programs can overwhelm private pensions as well. Since there will not be enough workers earning income, there will not be enough savings generated to purchase the assets the retirees must sell to finance their retirement.

The reasons why retirees cannot turn their savings into consumption is because wealth can only be transformed into goods and services if they are sold to those willing to defer their consumption. In a modern economy, wealth does not represent "stored consumption," such as a cache of acorns that squirrels bury to bide them through a long winter. You cannot consume your stock certificates, but must sell them to someone else who wants a chance to consume at a later date. If there is a shortage of these savers, this may cause a long and painful bear market in stocks, bonds and real estate that will leave retirees with insufficient assets to enjoy retirement.

There are some who maintain that so much wealth in stock is passed on through bequests that the lack of demand from future workers will not have much impact. But the heirs and foundations who are bequeathed these fortunes often spend their wealth far faster than did their wealthy benefactors, and this spending often requires the sale of substantial stock. Furthermore, the large volume of bank accounts, bonds and other fixed income securities that must be liquidated to finance the retirements of ordinary retirees could sharply raise interest rates and depress equity prices.

Reversal of a Century-long Trend: Depressed asset prices are just one reason why the long-standing trend to an earlier retirement will be halted dead in its tracks. When Social Security was passed in 1935, the average retirement age was 69. That age fell to 67 by 1950, and to 62 today. In 2003, for the first time, more Americans chose the reduced Social Security benefits at age 62 than the full benefit that starts at 65. Despite improving health, surveys indicate that the bulk of Americans and Europeans want to retire earlier, not later.

Because of our aging population, I calculate that the average retirement age will have to rise by 10 years or more for workers to produce enough goods and services to provide for a comfortable retirement. This increase will greatly exceed the expected increase in life expectancy and lead -- for the first time in history -- to an absolute reduction in the number of years in retirement.

The Global Solution: There is no easy way out of this crisis. To be sure, rising productivity brings higher income, but it also brings higher benefits, since benefits are based on income. Immigration of high-income workers would ease the situation, but the numbers would need to be prodigious to keep the retirement age from rising.

But there is a solution that can help aging economies. The developing world has a much younger age profile than the developed world. This difference in age establishes an opportunity to make a trade: Goods produced by the younger developing world can be exchanged for assets of the older developed world. This trade is not new. The transfer of goods for assets has taken place throughout history, first between family members (parents giving to children in exchange for old-age support), and then extending to clans, communities and, finally, whole nations. Soon it can be done on a worldwide basis. The developing world has the capability of simultaneously providing us with goods and acquiring our assets, filling the gap left by our aging workers.

I call this the "global solution to the age wave" and it relies on huge global capital flows to be effective. My studies show the inflow of goods and services produced abroad in exchange for capital can have dramatic effects, reducing the projected retirement age in the U.S. from the mid-70s to the upper 60s. * * *

Why would the developing world wish to acquire our capital when their countries are expanding so rapidly? One of the first lessons one learns from studying international capital markets is that the best returns are rarely found in countries that are growing the fastest. Witness China's dismal returns despite being the fastest growing country in the last 20 years. Investors can often find better returns in slow-growing countries and industries

To that end, U.S. capital markets have many attractive attributes. Our country is still viewed as the fountainhead of innovation, discovery, invention and entertainment, and our institutions of higher education are second to none. Our capital markets are deep, and easy to access, and willing to provide capital to those who wish to innovate. Equally important is that many U.S. brand names have great appeal world-wide so the growth of consumer markets abroad holds high promise for many U.S. firms.

For these capital movements to occur, we must be far more receptive to international capital. Although there has already been a large number of cross-country mergers, there has also been increasing opposition, witness Cnooc's bid for Unocal and the Dubai Ports fiasco. But if we rebuff goods or capital originating abroad, our growth will decline since we will be forced to rely only on our own dwindling supply of savings.

We cannot escape from our demographic realities. But we can take actions that will lead to a much brighter outcome. The integration of the world's economies and capital markets is the key to our future well-being. If we shun this path, our future will in no way be as bright as our past.

Presidents Spar Over Iran's Aims And U.S. Power (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg And Helene Cooper

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 19 — President Bush and President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran, separated by several hours and oceans of perspective, clashed at the United Nations on Tuesday over Iran's nuclear ambitions and each other's place in the world.

The two leaders bookended a long day of speeches at the opening of the General Assembly, but seemed to speak past each other as European and American diplomats continued the delicate work of setting terms for talks with Iran over its uranium enrichment program.

Speaking near the prime time of television viewing, Mr. Ahmadinejad, tieless in his trademark off-white sport jacket, accused the United States — while for the most part avoiding naming it directly — of hegemony and hypocrisy, and said it did not seem to have the political will or ability to halt violence in Iraq.

He said that his nation was pursuing only a peaceful nuclear program, and that it was the United States that was using its nuclear weapons to intimidate the world. He said repeatedly that the United Nations Security Council was too beholden to the United States to control it.

"Excellencies, the question needs to be asked, if the governments of the United States or the United Kingdom, who are permanent members of the Security Council, commit aggression, occupation and violation of international law, which of the organs of the U.N. can take them to account?" Mr. Ahmadinejad said.

Speaking in the morning, Mr. Bush made a direct appeal to the Iranian people from the United Nations, telling them their leaders were misleading them about the United States' intentions while using their national treasury to sponsor terrorists and build nuclear weapons.

"You deserve an opportunity to determine your own future," Mr. Bush said during a roughly 20-minute address during the opening session of the General Assembly. "The greatest obstacle to this future is that your rulers have chosen to deny you liberty and to use your nation's resources to fund terrorism and fuel extremism and pursue nuclear weapons."

DOJ_NMG_0066217

It was a rare moment of diplomatic theater between Mr. Bush and his leading Middle Eastern nemesis, a man whose nation is increasingly asserting itself in the region that lies at the heart of Mr. Bush's foreign policy, and whose nuclear program is a subject of deep concern to the American, European, Chinese and Russian officials trying to rein it in.

Mr. Ahmadinejad had kept a low profile throughout the day, lending a sense of anticipation and buildup to an address that placed him, at least for a night, on an equal platform with President Bush.

Mr. Ahmadinejad, who saw his speech last year as a defining moment on the world stage, has called the Holocaust a myth and regularly inveighs against Israel and Jews. His country is in violation of a United Nations deadline to halt its uranium enrichment program.

His repeated references to what he called a lack of "legitimacy" at the Security Council appeared to set the stage for Iran to argue that the Security Council has no authority to impose sanctions against Tehran.

He referred to the United States as "the occupiers" when speaking of Iraq, "the big powers" when referring to the Security Council and "masters and rulers of the entire world" when referring to what he said was an imbalance between world powers and other countries.

He criticized America for not calling for a cease-fire during the Israel-Hezbollah war in Lebanon this summer. "Apparently the Security Council can only be used to ensure the rights of the big powers," the Iranian president said. "When the oppressed" are targeted, he said, "the Security Council must remain aloof and not even call for a cease-fire."

Despite anticipation that Mr. Ahmadinejad and Mr. Bush would perhaps have a chance encounter inside the United Nations complex, Mr. Ahmadinejad was not in the building for Mr. Bush's address and did not attend a luncheon given by the secretary general, Kofi Annan.

Mr. Bush made his remarks hours before Mr. Ahmadinejad addressed the General Assembly himself, creating an expectation of a robust war of words by day's end.

In an address tailored for both international and domestic consumption, Mr. Bush reiterated his demand that Iran suspend its uranium enrichment but added, "Despite what the regime tells you, we have no objection to Iran's pursuit of a truly peaceful nuclear power program."

It was unclear how many of Mr. Ahmadinejad's constituents were in a position to hear Mr. Bush's message, given tight state controls on media in Iran. Many residents have satellite dishes, but the government recently began a campaign to confiscate them; many also have access to the Persian-language broadcasts of Voice of America.

Mr. Bush also defended his foreign policy, exhorting the world leaders in attendance to join with him in his goal of transforming the Middle East by pushing for democracy there.

"From Beirut to Baghdad, people are making the choice for freedom," Mr. Bush said. "And the nations gathered in this chamber must make a choice, as well: will we support the moderates and reformers who are working for change across the Middle East, or will we yield the future to the terrorists and extremists?

Aides said the speech was in essence a capstone to the series of addresses Mr. Bush has given over the last two weeks intended to refocus the nation's attention on the threats of terrorism and the administration's efforts to fight it.

Speaking to what he called "the broader Middle East," Mr. Bush said, "Extremists in your midst spread propaganda claiming that the West is engaged in a war against Islam. This propaganda is false, and its purpose is to confuse you and justify acts of terror."

Mr. Bush also met with President Jacques Chirac of France, and they pledged to continue working together on Iran. Mr. Chirac played down comments he made Monday that were interpreted as a sharp break with Mr. Bush, when he indicated that talks with Iran could begin at the same time as the suspension of uranium enrichment, something the United States demands as a precondition for talks.

Still, in a sign of the uphill battle that is facing the United States as it tries to hold together its coalition seeking to curtail Iran's nuclear ambitions, there was little talk of sanctions. Senior Bush officials had initially predicted a breakthrough on a sanctions resolution this week.

Mr. Chirac did not utter the word sanctions during his speech to the General Assembly, repeatedly emphasizing the need for continued talk as Iran continues to resist calls to suspend its program.

United States officials said they were willing to agree to a compromise in which a drive for sanctions at the Security Council would end at the same time the Iranians would end their enrichment program. But a senior Bush official cautioned Tuesday that it is far from certain whether Iran would agree.

"We believe there's a debate going on within Iran," the official said, requesting anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly.

Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, was supposed to arrive in New York for talks with the European Union's foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, on Sunday, and had still not arrived late Tuesday night.

In his remarks, Mr. Bush did not mention Mr. Ahmadinejad by name, directing his criticism at Iran's "leaders" in general. White House officials disputed any suggestion that Mr. Bush had avoided using the Iranian president's name so as not to inflame the situation.

At U.N., Iran President Defends Nuclear Activity (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0066218

UNITED NATIONS -- Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad defended his country's nuclear activities as "transparent, peaceful and under the watchful eye" of international inspectors, and blasted what he described as a U.S. stranglehold over the U.N. aimed at punishing Iran.

The Iranian leader's remarks before the U.N. General Assembly gave no sign that Tehran was ready to suspend its uranium-enrichment work or to join international talks on its nuclear program. Instead, in his second U.N. address since his election last year, he criticized an international system that he said gives all rights to "the great powers," who have turned the U.N. Security Council into a body "of threat and coercion."

His remarks came just hours after President Bush, in his address to the same body, sought to reach out to the Iranian people while demanding that Tehran "abandon its nuclear-weapons ambitions." Mr. Bush also backed off his long-held stance that Iran should be hit with sanctions over its nuclear program, expressing support for a European-led effort to engage Tehran in yet another round of talks.

Facing increased political attacks heading into midterm elections that could be a referendum on his war policies, Mr. Bush used his annual U.N. address to say that the U.S. would continue to champion democracy in the Muslim world instead of falling for the "mirage" of some perceived stability. His tone was far more muted and conciliatory than in previous U.N. addresses, though, including the 2002 speech in which he began to make the case for military action against Iraq.

Mr. Ahmadinejad's presence in New York this week illustrates how large he will loom over Mr. Bush's last years in office as the face-off with Iran becomes perhaps Washington's most vexing challenge.

After meeting in the morning with French President Jacques Chirac, Mr. Bush endorsed a European Union effort to coax the Iranians to the negotiating table, despite a July U.N. resolution that gave Tehran until Aug. 31 to suspend its uranium-enrichment work or face U.N. sanctions. If the Iranians continue to stall, Mr. Bush said that the major U.N. powers would "then discuss the consequences of their stalling. And one of those consequences, of course, would be some kind of sanction program."

The Bush administration now appears to be scrambling to salvage some form of pressure on Iran as Russia, China, France and other key countries back away from any strong threat of international economic sanctions.

With the opening of the annual U.N. General Assembly, the president and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice are wrestling with a number of other pressing concerns, including the rising violence in the Darfur region of Sudan and the need to bolster the international force in Lebanon. Mr. Bush's speech forms part of a dual strategy to muster international support for the diplomatic face-off with Iran and other challenges while trying to beat back critics at home who argue that the Iraq war has made the U.S. less secure.

Mr. Bush said he was speaking directly to the people of the Middle East when he cautioned that "extremists in your midst spread propaganda claiming that the West is engaged in a war against Islam." Instead, he insisted that the U.S. "desires peace," but will also "protect our people from those who pervert Islam to sow death and destruction."

Mr. Bush shot back at critics who claim that democratic changes in the Middle East are destabilizing the region. "This argument rests on a false assumption, that the Middle East was stable to begin with," he said. "The reality is that the stability we thought we saw in the Middle East was a mirage ... and a breeding ground for extremism."

With the elections seven weeks away, his remarks drew unusual fire from Democratic leaders. Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware, the senior Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said Mr. Bush had "no strategy for success in Iraq" and was on the verge there "of trading a dictator for chaos."

Iran Blames US For 'global Injustice' (FT)

By Guy Dinmore, Mark Turner And Najmeh Bozorgmehr

Financial Times, September 20, 2006

Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad, Iran's president, on Tuesday night took his diplomatic battle with the US right to the heart of the United Nations, challenging the legitimacy of the Security Council where some of its veto-wielding members – namely the US and UK – "commit aggression, occupation and violation of international law".

In a speech to the annual UN General Assembly, the Iranian president accused the West of exploiting the Council for its own ends, including the recent conflict in Lebanon and the invasion of Iraq.

He called on the General Assembly to "rescue" the Security Council, proposing that the Non-Aligned Movement, the Organisation of the Islamic Conference and Africa each appoint a veto-wielding member to the 15-nation group.

Addressing the chamber, that included the empty seats of the US and Israeli delegations, Mr Ahmadi-Nejad questioned the right of the UN to impose sanctions on Iran over its "transparent, peaceful" nuclear programme when the nuclear powers "proudly announce their production of second and third generation weapons".

"The abuse of the Security Council, as an instrument of threat and coercion, is indeed a source of grave concern," he said. However, he made no reference to the ongoing attempts to restart nuclear talks with the European powers and reiterated Iran's commitment to the Nuclear non-Proliferation Treaty, an indication that Iran is not about to follow the example of North Korea and abandon international co-operation.

Earlier, George W. Bush agreed in talks with France's Jacques Chirac to put on hold a push for UN sanctions against Iran in order to give the Europeans more time to persuade Iran to suspend uranium enrichment and resume negotiations over its nuclear programme.

Mr Bush set out a series of events that could lead to the US joining high level negotiations with Iran for the first time since the 1979 Islamic revolution. He said the EU3 of France, Germany and the UK would continue to talk to the Iranians so they would verifiably suspend their uranium enrichment programme and then the US "will come to the table".

The US had come to the General Assembly with the intention of pressing ahead with a sanctions resolution. Iran was to have been punished for defying a UN resolution demanding that it halt its controversial uranium enrichment programme by August 31.

Diplomats said the US made the limited concession out of recognition that there was a possibility Iran would agree to suspend its work while negotiations over its whole nuclear programme took place. China and Russia were also resisting US efforts to isolate Iran.

Mr Bush indicated he was not prepared to let Iran "stall" for much longer before the US went ahead with its proposals for graduated sanctions. "Time is of the essence," Mr Bush said.

In Washington, a senior US official indicated Iran had another week. Diplomats suggested the process might take longer.

In U.N. Speech, Bush Softens Tone On Iran (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, September 20, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 19 -- President Bush sought to assure the Iranian people that he wants a diplomatic solution to the impasse over their country's nuclear activities but warned that their leaders are obstructing progress by funding terrorism and pursuing nuclear weapons.

Striking a more conciliatory tone than in previous addresses on the subject, Bush said Tuesday that the United States has no objections to Iran achieving a "truly peaceful nuclear power program" and told the Iranians that he looks forward "to the day when you can live in freedom, and America and Iran can be good friends and close partners in the cause of peace."

The comments on Iran were only a small part of the president's 20-minute address to the U.N. General Assembly, which was devoted to urging the world to support the forces of moderation and reform in the greater Middle East. Bush said he wanted to speak directly to people in the region, assuring Iraqis, Lebanese and Afghans of continued U.S. support for their efforts to build new democracies while telling Syrians that their government's support of Hamas and Hezbollah is "turning your country into a tool of Iran."

Bush also urged the United Nations to act quickly to deploy a robust peacekeeping force to the war-ravaged Darfur region of Sudan, apparently over the objections of the Sudanese government. Speaking to the people of Darfur, he said, "Your lives and the credibility of the United Nations is at stake."

But the dispute over Iran's nuclear program assumed center stage at the opening of the annual General Assembly session, which drew dozens of heads of state and foreign ministers and once again snarled Midtown Manhattan in traffic jams and widespread security precautions. On the sidelines of the session, Bush and U.S. diplomats continued to try to shore up support for new sanctions on Iran for its refusal to abide by a Security Council resolution insisting it halt uranium enrichment, a possible step toward building nuclear weapons.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad addressed the General Assembly several hours after Bush, and he accused the United States of rigging the United Nations to advance its own military and economic dominance and to oppress its weaker adversaries.

In his second such address to the world body, the Iranian leader charged that U.S. policies throughout the Middle East, including its support for Israel and the occupation of Iraq, have furthered human suffering in the region. He said the U.S. nuclear program poses a greater threat to international peace and security than Iran's program does.

Ahmadinejad dismissed assertions by Bush that Iran is seeking nuclear weapons. "All our nuclear activities are transparent, peaceful and under the watchful eyes of IAEA inspectors," he said, referring to the International Atomic Energy Agency.

There had been considerable speculation at the United Nations about the possibility of a chance meeting between Bush and Ahmadinejad, but there were no encounters. The Iranian president did not appear in the General Assembly hall when Bush spoke, and he declined an invitation to appear at U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan's annual luncheon of world leaders, which Bush attended. Diplomats said the Iranian leader does not appear at events at which alcohol is served.

For Bush, Tuesday's remarks seemed a different kind of exercise than his recent speeches on terrorism and Islamic radicalism in the Middle East. While he has used previous speeches to paint an alarming portrait of Iran -- he called it a "grave threat" to the world just two weeks ago in Salt Lake City -- on Tuesday he emphasized painting a more benign picture of U.S. intentions. Whether the effort will succeed is uncertain, given the long history of bitter feelings in Iran over past American interference in Iranian affairs, including the overthrow of an elected prime minister in 1953.

To the people of Iran, Bush said in his speech, "the United States respects you; we respect your country. We admire your rich history, your vibrant culture and your many contributions to civilization. You deserve an opportunity to determine your own future."

He added: "The greatest obstacle to this future is that your rulers have chosen to deny you liberty and to use your nation's resources to fund terrorism and fuel extremism and pursue nuclear weapons."

Speaking generally to people across the Middle East, Bush sought to combat what he described as "propaganda" being spread by extremists "claiming that the West is engaged in a war against Islam. This propaganda is false, and its purpose is to confuse you and justify acts of terror. We respect Islam, but we will protect our people from those who pervert Islam to sow death and destruction."

Bush's address drew polite applause from the hundreds of officials gathered in the cavernous General Assembly hall, though there was clearly unease with U.S. policies. In Annan's address, his last before the opening of a General Assembly session, he took a swipe at the Bush administration's counterterrorism strategy, saying that the "necessary and legitimate struggle" against terrorism has been used as a "pretext to abridge and abrogate fundamental human rights, thereby ceding more moral ground to the terrorists and helping them find recruits."

Outside of the speech, a key focus of U.S. activity at the U.N. session is the continuing two-track effort to bring Iran into negotiations over its nuclear activities while securing sanctions if it does not suspend enrichment of uranium. Iran says it is pursuing nuclear activities only to develop new sources of energy, while Bush said flatly Tuesday that Tehran is seeking a nuclear weapon.

U.S. diplomatic efforts were thrown into some disarray Monday when French President Jacques Chirac said in a radio interview that he did not like the idea of sanctions and that talks might begin before Iran halts uranium enrichment -- an apparent reversal of the original U.S.-European position.

But on Tuesday, emerging from a meeting at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, Bush and Chirac insisted that there is no daylight between the two countries on how to proceed.

Bush told reporters after meeting with Chirac that European powers are continuing to try to bring Iran to the negotiating table, and that if Iran agrees to suspend uranium enrichment, the United States will join those talks. "Time is of the essence," Bush said. "Should they continue to stall, we will then discuss the consequences."

At his news conference with Bush, Chirac said he sees "eye to eye" with Bush on how to deal with Iran. But a few hours later, at his own press conference, the French president seemed to muddy the waters again by describing a different timetable. He said that the United States, European leaders, Russia and China should agree quickly on an agenda for talks, and that as a "goodwill gesture" the drive for sanctions would then be put on hold, and Iranians would suspend enrichment.

One senior administration official, who was not authorized to speak publicly about the discussions, said the discrepancies are "differences in emphasis, not differences in substance. That's a big difference and could [prove] useful in pursuing a diplomatic solution."

Bush Pushes Democracy In U.N. Speech (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, September 20, 2006

President Bush sought to blunt anti-Americanism across the Middle East on Tuesday, asserting that extremists are trying to justify their violence by falsely claiming the U.S. is waging war on Islam. He singled out Iran and Syria as sponsors of terrorism.

Bush, in an address to world leaders at the U.N. General Assembly, tried to advance his campaign for democracy in the Middle East against a backdrop of turmoil in Iraq, Afghanistan and other nations that have embraced the very changes he seeks for the region.

Solidly aligned with Israel, the United States is viewed with anger and suspicion by Muslims across the Middle East.

Addressing that hostility, Bush said, "My country desires peace. Extremists in your midst spread propaganda claiming that the West is engaged in a war against Islam. This propaganda is false and its purpose is to confuse you and justify acts of terror. We respect Islam."

Hours after Bush spoke, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad told the General Assembly that the U.S. and Britain were abusing the U.N. Security Council to achieve their own ends. He described Iran's disputed nuclear activities as "transparent, peaceful and under the watchful eye" of U.N. inspectors.

Ahmadinejad was also critical of the U.S.-led war in Iraq, declaring that "the occupiers are incapable of establishing security in Iraq" and that every day hundreds of people are killed "in cold blood."

Bush's address earlier in the day was the latest in a series of speeches on the war on terror, linked to last week's fifth anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks and aimed at setting the tone for the final weeks of U.S. elections that will determine control of Congress.

Bush said past stability in the Middle East has been achieved at the expense of freedom, and he disputed critics who claim his push for democracy has destabilized the region.

"The reality is that the stability we thought we saw in the Middle East was a mirage," Bush told the more than 80 prime ministers and presidents assembled in the cavernous hall of the U.N. headquarters.

"For decades, millions of men and women in the region have been trapped in oppression and hopelessness. And these conditions left a generation disillusioned and made this region a breeding ground for extremism."

While praising Bush's freedom refrain, Madeleine Albright, secretary of state under President Clinton, said in an interview that the U.S.-led war in Iraq, not democratic reform, has destabilized the Middle East.

Albright said the Bush administration has not carried out its democratic initiative with uniformity. It denounces autocratic nations that are unfriendly toward the United States, then casts a blind eye to autocratic nations that are allies, she said. She mentioned Kazakhstan, whose leader will be honored at the White House Sept. 29, and Egypt.

On the sidelines of the meeting, Bush firmly denounced Iran for defying U.N. Security Council demands to freeze its uranium enrichment work and engage in talks to resolve the standoff over its nuclear weapons ambitions.

"Should they continue to stall, we will then discuss the consequences of their stalling," Bush said in an apparent reference to possible U.N. sanctions.

DOJ_NMG_0066221

In his speech, Bush spoke directly to the people of Iran, not the government of Ahmadinejad, who did not attend the address. Bush said America respects Islam, the Iranian nation's rich history and culture and that he looks to a day when the two peoples "can be good friends and close partners in the cause of peace." That's very different from 2002 when Bush said Iran was part of an "axis of evil."

Bush made spreading democracy across the Middle East a cornerstone of his foreign policy after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. "When people have a voice in their future, they are less likely to blow themselves up in suicide attacks," he said Tuesday.

He recited a list of nations where he said the seeds of democracy are taking root:

_The United Arab Emirates recently announced that half the seats in its Federal National Council will be chosen through elections.

_For the first time, women have been allowed to vote and run for office in Kuwait.

_Citizens have voted in municipal elections in Saudi Arabia, in parliamentary elections in Jordan and Bahrain, and in multiparty presidential elections in Yemen and Egypt.

Bush praised Lebanon for driving out Syria — a nation the president said is a "crossroad for terrorism." Lebanon's fragile, democratic government, however, has proved too weak, so far, to check the Islamic militant group Hezbollah, which attacked neighboring Israel with rockets.

He championed the toppling of former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein and the new democratic government in Baghdad. Yet democracy there is being threatened by bloody sectarian violence in the four-year-old war that is becoming increasingly unpopular at the U.S. as well as abroad. About a dozen demonstrators outside the United Nations chanted "Bush is a criminal. No war on Iraq," but inside the world leaders gave Bush a polite reception.

Bush also trumpeted democratic change in Afghanistan. But five years after the U.S.-led invasion ousted the Taliban from political power, the militant Islamic group is proving a resilient enemy for NATO forces in the south, and Afghan President Hamid Karzai has little control outside Kabul.

In some cases, democratic change in the Middle East has not seemed to be in the U.S. interest.

In free elections in March, the Palestinian people voted the Islamic militant group Hamas into power. The United States lists Hamas as a terrorist group, and has been working to support Mahmoud Abbas, the moderate Palestinian president who meets with Bush on Wednesday.

At U.N., Bush Urges Reform In Middle East (LAT)

By Maggie Farley And Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2006

UNITED NATIONS — President Bush on Tuesday called for Muslims and other residents of the Middle East to reject extremism and empower "voices of moderation," offering the latest defense of his "freedom agenda" that has rankled allies abroad and drawn criticism from Democrats at home.

In a speech at the opening of the annual U.N. General Assembly debate, Bush singled out Iran, Syria and militant groups such as Hezbollah and Hamas as obstacles to reform and supporters of terrorism, stating again that Iran must not be allowed to pursue nuclear weapons.

Bush addressed a crowd left skeptical by the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, launched without U.N. endorsement, and Washington's hard line on Iran. Brazil's President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva told the assembled diplomats that "billions and billions" of dollars spent in Iraq could have been used to lessen hunger and poverty around the world.

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan criticized Bush's policies for fighting terrorism, particularly his administration's controversial practices of secret detention and transferring prisoners to other countries for interrogation, which the White House refers to as "extraordinary rendition."

Without naming the United States, Annan condemned the way the fight against terrorism was "used as a pretext to abridge or abrogate fundamental human rights, thereby ceding moral ground to the terrorists and helping them find new recruits."

Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, in a speech Tuesday evening, fiercely denounced the U.S. and Israel, accusing both nations of using the Security Council as an instrument of "oppression."

Neither Bush nor Ahmadinejad was present for the other's speech. Ahmadinejad condemned the U.S. for acting as "judge, jury and executioner" on Iran's nuclear program, which he defended as "transparent, peaceful and under the watchful eyes" of U.N. inspectors.

The General Assembly debate also touched on another troubled part of the world, the Darfur region of western Sudan.

Sudanese President Omar Hassan Ahmed Bashir confounded hopes for a breakthrough on Darfur, repeating his objections to allowing U.N. peacekeepers to protect civilians there.

In a rare international news conference, Bashir accused aid groups of hyping the crisis as a ruse to raise funds, and blamed "Zionist Jewish organizations" for orchestrating recent demonstrations in the United States that called for peacekeepers.

The U.N. and aid groups have estimated that nearly 200,000 people have been killed in Darfur. The Security Council will vote Thursday on whether to expand a U.N. peacekeeping operation to allow it to operate in Darfur.

Bashir rejected the idea, but said that he would accept more African Union forces to join the 7,000 overextended troops in the region.

Bush's speech focused heavily on the Middle East, and in contrast with some of his more hawkish appearances here, such as his promise to "disarm" then-Iraqi President Saddam Hussein with or without support from the U.N., Tuesday's address accentuated diplomacy.

He pledged to make a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian dispute "one of the great objectives of my presidency," and appealed to the people of Iran, Syria, Iraq and Lebanon to reject anti-U.S. "propaganda" that he said was designed to mislead them about his intentions.

"Freedom, by its nature, cannot be imposed; it must be chosen," Bush said. "From Beirut to Baghdad, people are making the choice for freedom. And the nations gathered in this chamber must make a choice, as well: Will we support the moderates and reformers who are working for change across the Middle East, or will we yield the future to the terrorists and extremists?

"America has made its choice. We will stand with the moderates and reformers."

Bush's 20-minute address came at a time of strain between the United States and its allies over several tenets of his foreign policy.

He told Iranians that, "despite what the regime tells you, we have no objection to Iran's pursuit of a truly peaceful nuclear power program."

Bush also singled out Syria, calling it a "crossroad for terrorism," and said that the Damascus government's alliances with Hamas and Hezbollah were turning it into a "tool of Iran."

The president's address was one of his broadest foreign policy speeches since his second inauguration last year. But unlike that address, when he spoke of spreading democracy, Bush's words and tone Tuesday reflected the trouble he had faced enacting his agenda.

Acknowledging that change can be slow, Bush held up the new Hamas-led government in the Palestinian territories as a test for whether democracy would prevail over extremism.

"The leaders of Hamas campaigned on a platform of ending corruption and improving the lives of the Palestinian people, and they prevailed," he said. "The world is waiting to see whether the Hamas government will follow through on its promises, or pursue an extremist agenda."

Annan also focused on the Middle East in his final address to the assembly, and said that solving the long-standing discord between Israelis and Palestinians is the key to stability in the region and to credibility for the U.N.

"As long as the Security Council is unable to end this conflict, so long will respect for the United Nations continue to decline," he said.

Annan's speech had a tone of melancholy, as he lamented that during his 10-year tenure, he had watched the world grow more globalized, yet more divided. He expressed concern that the spreading conflicts threatened the ability of U.N. member states to work collectively to solve disputes.

"The events of the last 10 years have sharpened, not resolved, the key conflicts dividing the world," he said. "The only answer to this divided world is a truly United Nations."

Throughout the day, presidents and prime ministers brought their grievances and hopes to the world stage, and held tightly timed private meetings in luxury hotel suites. Many criticized Security Council paralysis on Iran, Sudan and the Middle East, but also acknowledged that the U.N. was at times the only institution that could address such problems.

Jan Egeland, the U.N.'s humanitarian chief, lauded Bush's speech and said he hoped it would spur progress on "stalled" issues such as the Middle East peace process and the crisis in Darfur. "It shows the United States really wants the U.N. to succeed and understands how vital the U.N. is," he said.

The assembled world leaders also discussed Tuesday's military coup in Thailand, and the sudden absence of the Thai prime minister, Thaksin Shinawatra. Thaksin canceled his speech, declared a state of emergency in his country and retreated to his hotel to plan a swift departure.

Iran's Ahmadinejad, who skipped the General Assembly luncheon because alcohol was served, which conflicted with his religious beliefs, spent the afternoon giving a television interview to NBC.

At the lunch of beef tournedos and potatoes, worries about the world's problems and conflicts were temporarily suspended as Bush and Annan traded toasts.

Noting that Annan would soon retire, Bush offered a tribute to his compassion and hard work.

"We need to raise our glasses to 10 years of extraordinary service and be thankful that a man such as Kofi Annan was willing to stand up and serve the cause of justice and peace," Bush said.

At U.N., Bush Tells Iranians They Deserve Better (USAT)

By David Jackson And Barbara Slavin

USA Today, September 20, 2006

UNITED NATIONS — Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad delivered a defiant speech Tuesday night before the United Nations, saying his country's nuclear program is “transparent, peaceful and under the watchful eye” of international inspectors.

DOJ_NMG_0066223

His speech came hours after President Bush addressed the General Assembly, saying Iran's government has denied its people freedom.

Bush urged people across the Middle East to ignore “extremists in your midst” as he assured them the United States is not at war with Islam. “This propaganda is false, and its purpose is to confuse you and justify acts of terror,” Bush said.

The United States and Iran are locked in a diplomatic battle over Iran's nuclear program. Iran says the program is peaceful. The United States says Iran is pursuing a bomb.

The United States is pushing the U.N. Security Council to impose sanctions on Iran after Tehran refused to suspend its uranium enrichment program.

The two leaders avoided running into each other during U.N. meetings Tuesday and offered no conciliatory gestures in their speeches, sticking closely to their public positions.

Ahmadinejad lashed out at the United States and Israel, accusing the Bush administration of trying to dominate the world and calling the creation of Israel “a great tragedy with hardly a precedent in history.”

Ahmadinejad accused Britain and the United States of distorting the international system through their power to veto resolutions in the U.N. Security Council. He also accused the United States and Britain of acting as “prosecutor, judge and executioner” of nations with which they have differences and said the U.N. system should be changed to give greater influence to the developing world.

The General Assembly, packed for Bush's speech earlier in the day, was half empty when the Iranian addressed the chamber shortly after 7:30 p.m.

In his speech, the U.S. president told Iranians they deserved better than the theocratic government that has ruled them since a 1979 revolution overthrew the U.S.-backed shah.

“The greatest obstacle … is that your rulers have chosen to deny you liberty and to use your nation's resources to fund terrorism and fuel extremism and pursue nuclear weapons,” he said.

Bush spoke broadly of efforts to spread democracy in the Middle East. Speaking directly to citizens of individual countries, Bush outlined his hopes for peace and praised democratic efforts in places such as Iraq.

He criticized Syria as becoming “a crossroad for terrorism,” noting the country's alliances with Hamas and Hezbollah militants. The president warned the people of Syria that “your government is turning your country into a tool of Iran.”

Bush applauded new democracies in Afghanistan and Iraq. He also cited elections held or planned in Algeria, the United Arab Emirates, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Bahrain, Yemen and Egypt.

Bush also told the assembly that he is sending Andrew Natsios, a former director of the U.S. Agency for International Development, as his envoy to the war-torn Darfur region of Sudan.

Outside the United Nations, several hundred people demonstrated hours before Ahmadinejad spoke. Some held placards saying, “No to terrorist Ahmadinejad.”

Earlier Tuesday, thousands of Iraq war protesters marched to the United Nations, chanting and waving anti-Bush signs.

Bush, Iranian Leader Engage In War Of Words (MCT)

By William Douglas And Warren P. Strobel

McClatchy Newspapers, September 20, 2006

UNITED NATIONS - President Bush and Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad engaged in a unabashed war of words here Tuesday, each pointing to the other as the prime cause of instability in the Middle East and beyond.

Bush, addressing the opening session of the U.N. General Assembly, sought to assure the Muslim world that the United States isn't waging a war on Islam. But he singled out Iran and its proxies as standing in the way of the spread of democracy across the Middle East.

Bush restated his demand that Iran abandon its suspected drive for nuclear weapons. Striving to speak directly to the Iranian people, he said the Tehran government is stifling the country's "tremendous potential."

"The greatest obstacle to this future is that your rulers have chosen to deny you liberty and to use your nation's resources to fund terrorism and fuel extremism and pursue nuclear weapons," Bush said. "Despite what the regime tells you, we have no objection to Iran's pursuit of a truly peaceful nuclear power program."

Eight hours later, Ahmadinejad stood before the same podium in the General Assembly hall and denounced the United States - without naming it - for occupying Iraq, backing Israel and using democracy as a pretext for trying to dominate the globe.

The controversial Iranian leader, who has previously questioned the Holocaust and called for Israel's elimination, seemed to reject demands that Iran halt enrichment of uranium, which Tehran insists is for civil power generation.

"All our nuclear activities are transparent, peaceful and under the watchful eyes of the IAEA inspectors," he said, referring to the International Atomic Energy Agency. "Why then are there objections to our legally recognized rights?"

The tough talk underscored the growing tension between the United States and an increasingly confident Iran, which appears to be expanding its sway across the Persian Gulf.

DOJ_NMG_0066224

Bush's comments on Iran, while tough, were more restrained than in recent weeks. Last month he called Iran a "grave threat" in a speech to the American Legion. That helped fuel speculation that some sort of U.S. military action against Iran might be coming.

But while the president spoke publicly in softer tones, he and other administration officials continued to work behind the scenes to forge consensus among U.S. allies for eventual sanctions against Tehran.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met with counterparts from Europe, Russia and China over dinner Tuesday evening to chart strategy.

Earlier, Bush met with French President Jacques Chirac and the two leaders appeared in sync on how to handle Iran, one day after Chirac appeared to suggest that negotiations with Iran should begin even before Tehran suspends enriching uranium that could be used for nuclear weapons.

Bush said that three European Union nations - Britain, France and Germany - would continue talks with Iran aimed at getting Iran to verifiably suspend its uranium enrichment. Once Iran does that, Washington would join negotiations. If Iran fails to suspend, then the Western powers would "discuss the consequences ... and one of the consequences, of course, would be some kind of sanction program," Bush said.

A French diplomat, speaking on condition of anonymity to describe the leaders' private talk, said Chirac had reaffirmed that while preparatory talks with Iran can take place now, no real negotiations can start until Iran halts enrichment.

"Let me take this opportunity once again to say that the present views of the United States and I again see eye to eye on this one," Chirac said. "I totally agree with President Bush. We both are determined to push forward on this one, to move ahead in a constructive manner."

Ahmadinejad, who in his speech appeared to again question Israel's right to exist, has been the subject of ridicule and the butt of jokes this week in New York's tabloid press and on Capitol Hill. Sen. George Voinovich, R-Ohio, compared him on Tuesday to Adolf Hitler and poked fun at his name.

"Ahmadinejad - I call him Ahmad-in-a-head - I think he's a Hitler type of person," Voinovich said during a Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing. "He's made it clear that he wants to destroy Israel. He has made it clear that he doesn't believe in the Holocaust. He's a, he's a ... we all know what he is."

Bush didn't mention Ahmadinejad specifically in his speech. Instead, he denounced the Tehran government and leaders of other governments and terrorist groups that are hampering the White House's push to expand democracy in the region.

He blasted Hezbollah for launching "unprovoked attacks on Israel," lashed out at Hamas for "working to destabilize the region," and accused Syria's government of turning Syria "into a tool of Iran."

However, Bush went to great lengths to stress that his disagreements aren't with the people of the Middle East.

"My country desires peace," Bush said. "Extremists in your midst spread propaganda claiming that the West is engaged in a war against Islam. This propaganda is false and its purpose is to confuse you and justify acts or terror. We respect Islam."

Bush's speech was a rare attempt to reach out directly to foreign audiences, according to Jon Alterman, head of the Middle East programs at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a center-right think tank in Washington.

But Alterman said the speech might not be effective.

"What the world is waiting for is a sense of humility and an acknowledgement of lessons learned," he said, referring to the invasion of Iraq and other perceived U.S. missteps in the region.

Some experts on the region said Bush's speech was more for domestic consumption than a foreign audience.

"This speech is intended to raise the prospects for Republican candidates for the fall," said Stephen Schlesinger, director of World Policy Institute at the New School in New York. "It's an attempt to shape public opinion."

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean dismissed Bush's speech as election-year campaigning.

"Today we heard more of the same rhetoric from a desperate President Bush who is worried more about his party's political prospects this November than about how to protect and fight and win the real war on terror," Dean said in a written statement.

Iran Leader Says U.S. Abusing U.N. Power (AP)

By Scheherezade Faramarzi

AP, September 20, 2006

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad took aim at U.S. policies in Iraq and Lebanon on Tuesday, and accused Washington of abusing its power in the U.N. Security Council to punish others while protecting its own interests and allies.

He addressed the annual U.N. General Assembly hours after President Bush spoke to the same forum. But while Ahmadinejad harshly criticized the United States, Bush directed his remarks to the Iranian people in a clear insult to the hard-line government.

In his speech, Bush pointed to the Iranian government's rejection of a Security Council demand to stop enriching uranium by Aug. 31 or face sanctions.

"The greatest obstacle to this future is that your rulers have chosen to deny you liberty and to use your nation's resources to fund terrorism and fuel extremism and pursue nuclear weapons," the U.S. leader said.

DOJ_NMG_0066225

"Iran must abandon its nuclear weapons ambitions," he said. "Despite what the regime tells you, we have no objection to Iran's pursuit of a truly peaceful nuclear power program."

He also said he hoped to see "the day when you can live in freedom, and America and Iran can be good friends and close partners in the cause of peace."

Ahmadinejad insisted that his nation's nuclear activities are "transparent, peaceful and under the watchful eye" of inspectors from the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N. nuclear watchdog. He also reiterated his nation's commitment to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

Earlier this month, Ahmadinejad proposed a debate with Bush at the General Assembly's ministerial meeting after the White House dismissed a previous TV debate proposal as a "diversion" from serious concerns over Iran's nuclear program.

But even though the two leaders were addressing the same forum, they skipped each other's speeches and managed to avoid direct contact during the ministerial meeting.

Ahmadinejad also accused the United States and Britain of using their veto power on the Security Council to further their own interests and he said it had become an "instrument of threat and coercion."

"If they have differences with a nation or state, they drag it to the Security Council," and assign themselves the roles of "prosecutor, judge and executioner," Ahmadinejad said. "Is this a just order?"

The U.S. and Britain played central roles in helping craft a U.N. Security Council resolution passed in July that gave Iran until Aug. 31 to suspend uranium enrichment and asked the IAEA to report on Tehran's compliance, dangling the threat of sanctions if Iran refused. Tehran made clear even before the deadline expired that it had no intention of suspending uranium enrichment.

The IAEA last week rejected a recent American report on Iran's nuclear capability, saying the Islamic republic has produced material only in small quantities that is far below the level that can be used in nuclear arms.

Ahmadinejad also criticized the Security Council for failing to call for an immediate cease-fire after war broke out between Israel and the Islamic militant group Hezbollah in Lebanon. A truce was only reached on Aug. 14 to end the 34-day conflict.

"The Security Council sat idly by for so many days, witnessing the cruel scenes of atrocities against the Lebanese ... Why?" asked Ahmadinejad, whose government is one of Hezbollah's main backers.

He said the answer is self-evident: "When the power behind the hostilities is itself a permanent member of the Security Council, how then can this council fulfill its responsibilities."

The United States and Britain refused to call for a cease-fire during the monthlong war between Israel and Hezbollah, declaring it part of war on terror. Only after Israel's failure to defeat Hezbollah and the deaths of nearly 1,000 Lebanese civilians did Washington and London agree to push for a truce by the U.N. Security Council.

The Iranian leader had harsh words about U.S. efforts in Iraq, saying "the occupiers are incapable of establishing security in Iraq" and every day hundreds of people get killed "in cold blood."

Ahmadinejad claimed that numerous terrorists apprehended by the Iraqi government were "let loose under various pretexts by the occupiers."

Domestically, Ahmadinejad, who doesn't enjoy widespread popularity among his people, has been able to use America's uncompromising stand against Iran's nuclear program to his own benefit. Many Iranians, including those who are against the president's domestic policies, support him in his showdown with the United States on the nuclear issue.

In an interview with "NBC Nightly News," Ahmadinejad was asked about Bush's appeal to the Iranian people.

"We have the same desire ... to be together for the cause of world peace," he said through a translator.

"We think that the American people are like our people. They're good people, they support peace, equality and brotherhood," he said.

He said his issue was with the U.S. administration.

"I explicitly say that I am against the policies chosen by the U.S. government to run the world because these policies are moving the world toward war," he said.

Bush Says U.S. Will Keep Pressing Spread Of Democracy (Update7) (BLOOM)

By Brendan Murray And Roger Runningen

Bloomberg, September 20, 2006

By Brendan Murray and Roger Runningen

Sept. 19 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush told world leaders the U.S. won't leave Iraq until the country's transformation to a peaceful democracy is complete and pledged to give diplomacy a chance to resolve a dispute with Iran over its nuclear development program.

In an address to the United Nations General Assembly in New York today, Bush said the progress of democracy in the world, particularly the Middle East, is real and sometimes dramatic, even if it is gradual.

Bush used the UN stage to speak directly to the citizens of countries whose governments are at odds with the U.S. and he sought to end concerns of some Muslims that the American war against terrorism is an attack on Islam.

DOJ_NMG_0066226

``From Beirut to Baghdad, people are making the choice for freedom and the nations here in this chamber must make a choice as well," Bush said in the 20-minute speech. ``Will we support the moderates and the reformers who are working for change across the Middle East, or will we yield the future to the terrorists and the extremists?"

The U.S. ``has made its choice," Bush said.

Addressing the citizens of the Middle East, Bush said the U.S. doesn't have a dispute with Muslims, as some militant leaders contend. ``This propaganda is false and its purpose is to confuse you and justify acts of terror," he said.

Assisting Democracy

To Iraqis, Bush pledged to ``help your democracy succeed," and he said to Afghanistan's citizens that the U.S. will help them extend ``democratic gains." He pledged to assist the emerging democracy in Lebanon.

Identifying Iran and Syria as sponsors of terrorist movements, he told Iranians and Syrians that their governments were holding them back from prosperity and peace by using resources ``to fund terrorism and fuel extremists."

He said the Iranian government's pursuit of nuclear technology and support for terrorism are the ``greatest obstacle" to peace and prosperity for the country's 69 million citizens. Economic output per person in Iran was $8,300 last year, ranking it 94th among other countries and tied with Thailand, according to U.S. government estimates.

Bush's speech comes amid two days of talks with world leaders, as the fallout from the war in Iraq limits U.S. diplomatic leverage to block the nuclear ambitions of Iran and North Korea. The U.S. suspects Iran and North Korea, both part of what Bush in 2002 called an ``axis of evil," are developing atomic weapons and could supply them to terrorist groups.

Iran's Plans

``Iran must abandon its nuclear weapons ambitions," Bush said. Directing remarks to the Iranian people, he said, ``Despite what the regime tells you, we have no objection to Iran's pursuing of a truly peaceful nuclear power program. We are working toward a diplomatic solution to this crisis."

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, in an address to the General Assembly today, said the U.S., Israel and their allies are responsible for injustice and violence around the world.

Ahmadinejad, pronounced ah-ma-deen-ah-ZHAD, reaffirmed his country's determination to develop nuclear power, saying the program is for peaceful purposes. The U.S. is using the Security Council as an ``instrument of threat and coercion" over the issue, he said.

While Bush hasn't ruled out military action to block Iran and North Korea from developing nuclear weapons, the U.S., with more than 140,000 troops dealing with increasing unrest in Iraq, is constrained from a unilateral use of force. The invasion of Iraq began in March 2003 without UN authorization and the U.S. never unearthed the weapons of mass destruction program that Bush said justified going to war.

Agreement on Strategy

Bush and French President Jacques Chirac emerged from a meeting earlier today and said they agreed on an approach to Iran. Chirac said ``the American administration and the French government see eye-to-eye" on Iran. Bush said that while the U.S. wants a diplomatic solution, ``time is of the essence" for Iran to suspend uranium enrichment or face ``some kind of sanction program."

In his own speech to the General Assembly, Chirac proposed an international conference to advance efforts to reach peace between Israel and the Palestinians. Such a conference ought to ``pave the way for a new future in the Middle East," he said.

Bush's address showed the U.S. ``really wants the UN to succeed," UN emergency relief coordinator Jan Egeland said. ``It was a speech that really tried to bring the UN forward in many of the issues where we have been stalling, like Darfur and the Middle east," Egeland said.

Diplomatic Effort

Bush said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will lead a diplomatic effort to work with moderate leaders in the Middle East to reestablish a path toward peace.

``Some have argued that the democratic changes we are seeing in the Middle East are destabilizing the region," Bush said. ``The reality is that the stability we thought we saw in the Middle East was a mirage."

The president is facing difficulty getting world leaders to back a more aggressive stance because of the conflict in Iraq.

``The Iraq war, both in its initiation and its aftermath, has obviously soured the global response," said James M. McCormick, a professor of American foreign policy at Iowa State University in Ames. Iraq ``has become the shorthand summary of all American foreign policy," McCormick said.

While in New York, Bush also met with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani to discuss measures being taken by the Iraqi government on security and the economy.

`Tough Choices'

Bush said after the session that while he is optimistic about Iraq's eventual success, he ``made it very clear" that Talabani's government can't shrink from tough decisions.

``America stands with them, so long as the government continues to make the tough choices necessary," Bush said.

DOJ_NMG_0066227

Talabani praised the U.S. for delivering Iraq ``from the worst kind of dictatorship," and that he was working to include all factions in the government.

Bush planned a meeting tomorrow with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas to discuss the formation of a coalition government with the Islamic Hamas movement.

In his speech to the UN today, Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf said the U.S. should give up using the threat of force to get Iran to halt uranium enrichment and must adopt a new strategy to combat terrorism.

``The confrontation over Iran's nuclear program threatens further instability in this already inflamed region," said Musharraf, a key ally of the U.S. in the war against terrorism.

Turning to another trouble spot confronting the world body, Bush said he is appointing Andrew Natsios, director of the U.S. Agency for International Development during the president's first term, as a special envoy to deal with the crisis in the Darfur area of Sudan.

Using rhetoric similar to that he's employed in recent weeks while campaigning for fellow Republicans, Bush said the world was engaged in a ``great ideological struggle" and he said he looked forward to a future where ``the voices of moderation are in power and where the extremists are marginalized by the peaceful majority."

Bush Warns Iranians Of 'Liberty' Denied (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, September 20, 2006

NEW YORK -- President Bush yesterday told Iranians they deserve a better government than they are getting, and he told Muslims worldwide to ignore radical "propaganda and conspiracy theories" that incite them to killing and terrorism.

But just hours later, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad told the U.N. General Assembly that the world's conflicts are the result of aggression by the U.S., Israel and other wealthy nations, and said the set-up of the United Nations is fundamentally unfair.

The biggest security crisis in the world took center stage as the two leaders spoke in the diplomatic version of the Lincoln-Douglas debates. Mr. Ahmadinejad called out the U.S. and Britain by name, and taunted Mr. Bush, saying "the occupiers are incapable of establishing security in Iraq."

For his part Mr. Bush talked around the Iranian leader, using his 20-minute noontime address in the General Assembly's cavernous green chamber to "speak directly to the people across the broader Middle East."

"Extremists in your midst spread propaganda claiming that the West is engaged in a war against Islam," he said. "This propaganda is false, and its purpose is to confuse you and justify acts of terror."

The speech was the last of a series Mr. Bush has been delivering over the past three weeks on the war on terror. In the earlier speeches, he challenged Congress and U.S. voters to give him the tools he wants to fight Islamic terrorists, but in yesterday's speech he made clear he expects other countries to join the U.S. fight worldwide.

"Will we support the moderates and reformers who are working for change across the Middle East -- or will we yield the future to the terrorists and extremists? America has made its choice: We will stand with the moderates and reformers," he said.

He mentioned three U.N. resolutions -- on disarming Hezbollah in Lebanon, calling on Iran to end its nuclear-weapons program, and on expanding the peacekeeping force in the Darfur region of Sudan -- and said the world body must now meet its commitments.

Mr. Bush had specific words for the people of Afghanistan, Iraq, Lebanon and Darfur. He also warned Syrians their "rulers have allowed your country to become a crossroad for terrorism." But he saved his harshest words for Iran's leaders, telling Iranians that Americans respect them and their culture but "your rulers have chosen to deny you liberty and to use your nation's resources to fund terrorism, and fuel extremism, and pursue nuclear weapons."

He spoke to a full chamber, while the chamber was mostly empty for Mr. Ahmadinejad. The two leaders never crossed paths, as the Iranian missed yesterday's leaders' lunch, and Mr. Bush hosted a closed reception during the Iranian's speech.

Mr. Ahmadinejad questioned the fairness of the United Nations, saying the Security Council had failed the Palestinians for years, and failed Lebanon this year.

"The Security Council sat idly by for so many days," he said, adding that the reason is clear. "When the power behind the hostility is itself a permanent member of the Security Council, how then could this council fulfill its responsibilities?"

Iran has defied a U.N. Security Council resolution that imposed an Aug. 31 deadline for suspending its uranium-enrichment program. But the six nations leading the effort to block Iran's program have not been able to agree on what the next step should be.

In his speech, Mr. Ahmadinejad insisted Iran's nuclear activities were "transparent, peaceful and under the watchful eye" of U.N. inspectors and accused the U.S. of a double standard in criticizing his country's program while maintaining its own nuclear weapons arsenal.

At home, Mr. Bush is facing a slightly better political environment seven weeks before the congressional elections. A Gallup-USA Today poll released yesterday showed him with a 44 percent approval rating, and found that likely voters are now as likely to support a Republican as a Democrat for Congress in November. Both numbers are substantial improvements for Republicans.

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean yesterday said that Mr. Bush's speech sounded "worried more about his party's political prospects this November than about how to protect America and fight and win the real war on terror."

He said if other nations are wary of joining Mr. Bush's calls for action on Sudan and Iran it's the president's fault. And House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said Mr. Bush's speech spoke "in broad, general terms," but didn't show a commitment to the hard work of diplomacy in the Middle East.

In Washington, Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns, the U.S. point man in the Iran sanctions negotiations, told Congress yesterday he was convinced the international coalition was ready to impose sanctions if Tehran balks.

"We must pass the sanctions resolution, or else the credibility of the U.N. Security Council on the leading issue of our day -- and we consider it the leading security issue -- is going to be called into question," he told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Still, a senior White House official said sanctions will not happen unless European nations fail in their bid to get Tehran to the negotiating table in exchange for a suspension of moves toward U.N. sanctions. Judy Ansley, senior director for European affairs on the National Security Council, said European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana is trying "right now" to persuade Iran to engage in talks on that basis.

"You start the negotiations, the Iranians agree to suspend their enrichment activities, and in exchange, the United Nations will agree to suspend activities at the Security Council as negotiations go forward," she said, adding that "sanctions will be only if that fails."

Chirac Doesn't Want New Iran Deadline (AP)

By Angela Charlton

AP, September 19, 2006

French President Jacques Chirac said Tuesday that he does not want to set a new deadline for Iran to suspend nuclear activities, which could be used to develop atomic weapons, despite Tehran's defiance of U.N. Security Council demands.

Speaking at the United Nations, Chirac also appeared to soften an earlier proposal to drop talk of sanctions against Iran over its uranium enrichment, an issue high on the agenda at this year's U.N. General Assembly.

"We are committed to negotiations and therefore to dialogue. So we're not going to start by setting deadlines that are a few hours long," Chirac told reporters. "This is a process that is under way and I hope it will run its course."

This summer, world powers signed on to the principle that Iran would face at least mild initial sanctions if it blew an Aug. 31 deadline to suspend uranium enrichment. With the deadline elapsed and Iran offering no concessions, the nations have been holding talks on what the consequences should be.

Iran insists its nuclear program is intended for peaceful purposes only.

While the United States has consistently pushed to punish Iran for defying Security Council demands, Chirac spoke out Monday against sanctions.

The French president has sought out the spotlight on this trip to New York as part of a larger bid to carve out a lasting legacy on world affairs. It is likely his last such performance — while Chirac has been secretive about his career plans, most assume he will step down next year after 12 years in power.

On Monday, Chirac shook up diplomatic circles with a compromise proposal to kickstart talks between Iran and the international community by suspending the threat of U.N. sanctions if Tehran suspends uranium enrichment at the same time. Such a proposal is unlikely to win the support of Washington.

On Tuesday, President Bush, after sideline talks with Chirac at the United Nations, pressed Iran again to immediately begin negotiations, warning that any delay on the part of Tehran would bring consequences — including sanctions.

Chirac insisted that his compromise proposal was just a reiteration of France's position. He said he and Bush see "eye-to-eye" on Iran and insisted U.S.-French relations were close and friendly.

But then, in his speech to the General Assembly, he avoided mention of sanctions, saying only: "Our goal is not to call regimes into question."

"Dialogue must prevail," Chirac said. "The international community must stand firm and united."

U.S. Tries To Save Its Iran Plan (AP-Y)

By Anne Gearan

AP, September 20, 2006

The United States tried Tuesday to salvage its plan to punish Iran with sanctions if it won't back down in a nuclear standoff with the West, even as President Bush told Iranians he hopes that one day "America and Iran can be good friends."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice convened nations that have offered Iran a bargain to head off what the United States and others fear is a drive to build a bomb. The United States had hoped to use the gathering to move decisively toward political and economic sanctions on Iran now that it has missed a U.N. deadline to shelve disputed nuclear activities, but cold feet among allies this month made that impossible.

The dinner meeting produced little consensus about the next step, and no announced deadline for when world powers expect further word from Iran. Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns said the diplomatic effort to counter Iran was in "extra innings."

DOJ_NMG_0066229

Earlier, Rice warned that the world will have a credibility problem if it does not act. She also acknowledged that talks are already under way between the European Union and Tehran without conditions.

That is a concession for the United States, which has led a drive to force Iran to choose between looming U.N. sanctions or talks that could reward it for scaling back its nuclear program.

"Those talks are going on now," Rice said on the CBS "Early Show," referring to discussions between the European Union's foreign policy chief and Iran's nuclear negotiator. "But we are still pursuing the path of sanctions should Iran not follow the U.N. Security Council resolution" demanding a temporary end to its uranium enrichment program. The deadline had been set for Aug. 31.

Bush and Iran's unpredictable hard-line president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, addressed the United Nations on the same day, and the White House tried to make sure the two did not cross paths.

"Iran must abandon its nuclear weapons ambitions," Bush told the annual U.N. opening session. He added a direct appeal to the Iranian people, telling them to look past what their leaders say about the United States.

For his part, Ahmadinejad told the U.N. General Assembly that Iran's nuclear activities were "transparent, peaceful and under the watchful eye" of U.N. inspectors. He accused the U.S. and Britain of abusing the U.N. Security Council to achieve their own ends, and he also criticized the U.S.-led war in Iraq.

The Bush administration saw the diplomatic ground shift beneath it this month as Iran maneuvered to avoid sanctions that even close U.S. allies such as France were never keen to impose.

Two members of the coalition, France and Russia, cast doubt on the idea of sanctions over the past week, and Rice and her aides have been lowering expectations for action this week.

French President Jacques Chirac proposed a compromise on Monday. The world would suspend the threat of sanctions, he suggested, if Tehran agreed to halt uranium enrichment and return to negotiations.

After a meeting with Bush on Tuesday, however, Chirac said twice that the two leaders see "eye to eye" on Iran. Bush said he and Chirac "share the same objective and we're going to continue to strategize together."

Interviewed on morning news shows Tuesday, Rice stressed that the United States will not join any negotiations until Iran has at least temporarily stopped its accelerated uranium program.

"I would meet anywhere with my counterpart at any time," once Iran has met that precondition, Rice said on ABC's "Good Morning America."

Enriched uranium can be used to make nuclear energy, as Iran claims it wants to do. It can also fuel nuclear weapons, as the United States claims Iran intends.

Any face-to-face discussions between Iran and the United States would be the most significant warming of relations in nearly three decades of estrangement.

The United States has had extensive unilateral economic sanctions against Iran since shortly after the 1979 revolution and the storming of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran.

Although the U.S. remains Iran's main adversary because of America's military, political, cultural and economic dominance, Washington has little economic leverage against Tehran on its own. The U.S. needs Europe, at least, to impose any meaningful economic penalty on Iran, but tough sanctions on the oil exporter would hurt America's international partners as well as Iran.

The prospect of U.S.-Iran talks was meant to be a powerful lure for Iran, but Rice also dangled the offer of talks earlier this year as a means to shore up a shaky international coalition against Iran.

It worked, at least for awhile. This summer, world powers signed on to the principle that Iran would face at least mild initial sanctions if it blew the August deadline.

Iran responded by hinting that it might be willing to shelve uranium enrichment, without ever saying so directly. That was enough to sow new division in the U.S.-build coalition, with the likely result that sanctions are either a dead letter or a long way off.

U.S. Policy On Iran Evolves Toward Diplomacy (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, September 20, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 19 -- Before the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, U.S. officials confidently predicted that the toppling of Saddam Hussein would lead to renewed momentum on the Israeli-Palestinian peace track. "The road to Jerusalem leads through Baghdad" was a common refrain.

President Bush's speech Tuesday to the U.N. General Assembly showed how much that diplomatic calculation has changed in Bush's second term. With the United States ensnarled in an increasingly difficult campaign in Iraq, war is no longer a viable option. Instead, the administration is struggling with the difficult and messy business of diplomacy. That often means accommodating the interests and demands of other countries, even backtracking on what had been firm positions.

Slowly but surely, the White House has muddied what were once clear lines in pursuit of diplomacy. As recently as a month ago, the administration firmly demanded that Iran must first suspend its nuclear activities before the United States would join negotiations on the nuclear programs, but now U.S. officials have quietly acquiesced in a European-led effort to find a face-saving way for the talks to begin.

U.S. officials are still pursuing the possibility of sanctions, and in fact they have drafted a sanctions resolution to be offered at the U.N. Security Council. But with allies balking, negotiations appear more likely than punishment. Bush, in his speech, used notably mild language when he discussed Iran, suggesting that the two countries one day will "be good friends and close partners in the cause of peace."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice hosted a dinner last night at the Waldorf-Astoria hotel with her counterparts from Russia, China, France, Britain, Germany and Italy. Under the original schedule, the session was supposed to reach decisions on a sanctions resolution. Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns, in briefing reporters last night, said the foreign ministers expressed "very strong support" for the European Union negotiations with Iran. "We are seeking a diplomatic solution," he said, adding that the diplomacy was "in extra innings."

Bush, in his speech, also emphasized that U.S. officials "have no objection to Iran's pursuit of a truly peaceful nuclear power program." This is a reversal from the policy in the first term, when U.S. officials loudly proclaimed that a country with such vast oil and gas reserves had no need for a nuclear program. Under pressure from Europeans, the administration dropped that argument late last year.

On the Middle East, Bush pushed his notion that greater democracy will bring stability to the region. But many foreign officials instead argue that stability can only be achieved if there is peace between Israelis and Palestinians.

To that end, Bush appeared to announce a new initiative, saying he had "directed Secretary of State Rice to lead a diplomatic effort to engage moderate leaders across the region, to help the Palestinians reform their security services and support Israeli and Palestinian leaders in their efforts" to resolve differences.

But U.S. officials said Bush was not announcing something new, but rather highlighting an evolving effort to take advantage of the growing anger among Palestinians at the Hamas-led government. The militant group won legislative elections earlier this year, leading to a broad cutoff of international aid because Hamas refuses to renounce its stated goal of destroying Israel.

Rice might travel to the Middle East after the U.N. General Assembly meeting ends, though plans are not firm, officials said. To a large extent, the administration is reacting to pressure from Europeans and Arabs to do more on the Palestinian issue. British Prime Minister Tony Blair recently visited the Middle East and is trying to foster political reconciliation among various Palestinian factions, while French President Jacques Chirac on Tuesday called here for an international peace conference to "define in advance the guarantees we are prepared to provide to the parties as soon as they reach an agreement." Both Israeli and U.S. officials regard Chirac's idea as a nonstarter.

One of Rice's most senior aides, counselor Philip D. Zelikow, last Friday made a speech to a Washington think tank in which he appeared to link progress on Middle East peace to securing greater diplomatic cooperation in the struggle against Iran.

"For the Arab moderates and for the Europeans, some sense of progress and momentum on the Arab-Israeli dispute is just a sine qua non for their ability to cooperate actively with the United States on a lot of other things that we care about," Zelikow said. "We can rail against that belief; we can find it completely justifiable, but it's fact. That means an active policy on the Arab-Israeli dispute is an essential ingredient to forging a coalition that deals with the most dangerous problems."

Zelikow's comments alarmed Israelis, who fear becoming a pawn in American diplomatic calculations, and U.S. officials said they were misinterpreted. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack even posted a statement on Power Line, a right-wing blog, saying there is no change in policy.

But Zelikow may have been stating the obvious: The administration has learned that building coalitions for peace, not war, is hard work.

Embargo Politics Nations' Rich Trade With Iran Is Hurdle For Sanctions Plan (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr. And Marc Champion

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

One reason the U.S. is having a hard time winning global sanctions on Iran over its nuclear work is evident at a company in Tehran called Iran Khodro Co., a big vehicle manufacturer.

The company is cutting deals in China, France, Germany and Russia -- key players in the tussle over what to do about Iran's nuclear ambitions. In February the company, called IKCO, agreed to buy 10,000 trucks from a Chinese maker in a $350 million deal. This month, IKCO said it will start selling to Russia cars that it builds in Iran in cooperation with France's PSA Peugeot-Citroën.

This web of business ties helps explain why the U.S. is alone, among the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council, in being enthusiastic about imposing sweeping sanctions on Iran. The U.S. is the only one that has little to lose.

With world leaders in New York for the U.N. General Assembly, diplomats say it is possible the Security Council, plus Germany, could as early as this week begin to weigh some narrowly targeted sanctions on Iran. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad defended his country's right to conduct nuclear research in an emotional speech to the U.N. last evening. Such work, he contended, is strictly for peaceful purposes, not to build a nuclear bomb, and he called the activities "transparent, peaceful and under the watchful eye" of U.N. inspectors. The U.S. favors sanctions to pressure the Iranians to drop their enrichment plan, because it doesn't trust the peaceful assurances.

With other countries backing off the sanctions threat in favor of more diplomacy, the U.S., too, has had to soften its stance in recent days. President Bush yesterday threw his support behind yet another European-led effort to talk Iran into suspending its enrichment work as a precursor to wide-ranging negotiations. If Iran continues to stall, Mr. Bush told reporters, then the Security Council would proceed with "some kind of sanction program."(See related article1.)

America severed political and most commercial ties with Iran 26 years ago, after it let a mob hold U.S. diplomats hostage for more than a year. Through July of this year, the U.S. imported a minuscule $99 million of goods from Iran, mostly rugs, nuts and juice, while shipping to Iran $55 million of goods, nearly all of it cigarettes, pharmaceuticals and wood pulp. The other Security Council members have seen their business with Iran increase. Their total trade with Iran is on track to top $22 billion this year, up from $18 billion in 2005.

While part of the growth reflects the higher cost of Iran's oil, the trade is broader: Iran buys German steel, French cars, Russian armaments and Chinese air conditioners. The European Union accounts for more than a third of Iran's total trade with the world. China's exports to Iran have tripled in four years.

U.S. officials say Iran's commercial ties, especially its clout as holder of the second-largest oil reserves after Saudi Arabia, put a built-in limit on how far industrial powers will go. "Anything that really restricts trade will be hard, if not impossible, to get," says a senior U.S. official.

European, Russian and Chinese diplomats acknowledge that business ties matter when weighing how to proceed on the sanctions issue but deny that mercantile interests drive their diplomacy. "Of course our trade with Iran is important," said a French diplomat, "but it is also reflective of a larger familiarity with Iran that the U.S. now lacks. We are there, and the Americans are not."

Deep Misgivings

European diplomats cite deep misgivings about economic sanctions based on more than a decade of experience with Iraq, which was marked by black markets and oil-for-food-program cheating by the Saddam Hussein regime. The diplomats worry that sanctions wouldn't achieve their goal and might destabilize the region and drive oil higher. Some say they worry, too, that the U.S. might use the sanctions push as a step toward military action against Iran.

"People fear that once you are on the sanctions route there is no getting off it. They remember Iraq and think it's deja vu," said one European diplomat involved in the process.

This diplomat, however, also cited successful instances of U.N. sanctions, such as a 1992 embargo on air travel and sales of arms and oil equipment to Libya. That step was designed to push Libya to hand over suspects in the 1988 bombing of a Pan American airliner over Lockerbie, Scotland. In 2003, the U.N. lifted the sanctions after Libya gave up two suspects for trial, agreed to compensate families of the 270 victims and said it would dismantle its nuclear-weapons program.

Iran is unquestionably a promising market. It is the region's largest economy after Saudi Arabia, it is flush with oil wealth and many of its 68 million people yearn for consumer goods largely unavailable for decades. Germany exported more than $5 billion of goods to Iran last year. The Chinese get around 18% of their crude oil from Iran and have many other business relations with the country. The European Union is backing plans for a natural-gas pipeline through Turkey that could collect gas from Iran.

"This is a factor, a real factor," says Nicholas Burns, the State Department's undersecretary for political affairs and a top U.S. diplomat on the Iran issue. He maintains nonetheless that like the U.S., its allies "understand that sanctions may very well be necessary to counter Iran's drive for a nuclear weapons capability."

Investors recently appear to be playing down the chance of hard-hitting economic sanctions. Earlier this year, tensions over Iran's nuclear program hit trade and investment flows. Exports to Iran dipped, and tens of billions of dollars of capital was moved out of Iran. Iran's stock and real-estate markets suffered. Amir Cyrus Razzaghi, whose Tehran consultancy advises foreign investors, says he found many putting their expansion plans on hold because of concerns about where the nuclear standoff with the West was headed.

Investor confidence has rebounded slightly in recent weeks. "I have several multibillion-dollar clients from Europe who are coming back to Iran this week to re-look at the market," Mr. Razzaghi says, "because now they see no chance of any military attack on Iran and very little chance of serious sanctions."

A Longstanding Preference

Europe's preference for avoiding U.N. sanctions on the Iran nuclear issue is longstanding. Just months after U.S.-led forces invaded Iraq in March 2003, Britain, France and Germany combined to begin negotiations with Tehran over its recently revealed program to enrich uranium. The trio told Iran it could avoid a referral to the Security Council and obtain talks on a package of trade and investment benefits -- including in its civilian nuclear industry -- if it suspended its nuclear-fuel enrichment program.

The talks stumbled, and they effectively ended in January, when Iran said it had restarted its enrichment centrifuges. That led the Europeans to join the U.S. in threatening Iran with U.N. sanctions. By June, the U.S. had persuaded other major U.N. powers to back a resolution that would give Iran an ultimatum: Suspend enrichment or face sanctions under a resolution declaring Iran a threat to international peace and security.

The Security Council in July gave Iran until Aug. 31 to act. Iran dismissed it, while hinting it might suspend enrichment temporarily to open the way for international negotiations. As recently as last week, EU foreign-policy representative Javier Solana reported progress in continuing talks with his Iranian counterpart.

The Bush administration now wants to push ahead on the sanctions track, pressing first for a modest resolution that would ban sales of nuclear-related products and bar certain Iranian officials from international travel. The U.S. hope is that the Security Council will proceed with increasingly tough resolutions that bite deeper into Iran's economy and finally persuade its leaders to give up the uranium enrichment. President Bush has described Iran as "a grave threat" and said it must face "consequences" if it persists in enrichment.

While the U.S. would face little economic loss from sanctions on Iran, the cost would be far higher for other major powers. This year, China's exports to Iran are up 25%. Chinese companies shipped nearly $400 million of air conditioners, engines, washing machines and other such machinery to Iran in the first six months of 2006, as well as $300 million in tractors, trucks and other vehicles. Dozens of Chinese construction companies are engaged in Iran, on work ranging from Tehran's transit system and power plants to merchant ships.

Meanwhile, in the first half of this year, energy-hungry China imported $5.16 billion of oil from Iran, a 56% increase from the pace of imports in 2005. "This is just the start. China's energy dependence on Iran is going to deepen considerably," says Ilan Berman, a vice president at the American Foreign Policy Council who has studied China's ties to Iran.

German and French exports to Iran slipped slightly in the first half, but remain large. Germany is Iran's largest supplier of foreign goods, with exports last year of more than $5.4 billion. German engineering giant Siemens AG is providing huge generators for a power plant. Auto maker DaimlerChrysler AG is moving ahead on plans to build Mercedes-Benzes in Iran, in partnership with IKCO.

This month, Germany's chamber of commerce released an estimate that blanket sanctions on Iran could cost Germany 10,000 jobs. It was an effort at a "wake-up call" about what is at stake, said spokesman Felix Neugart, who added that chamber officials meet regularly with the government on the issue.

French exports to Iran totaled $2.33 billion last year. Auto makers Renault SA and Peugeot-Citroën are heavily involved through local partners. Auto imports to Iran now are falling sharply because Western companies build more cars in Iran, to feed a fast-growing market.

Besides the Peugeot 206, the jointly built car that IKCO plans to export to Russia, IKCO and other Iranian vehicle makers have agreed with Renault to build 250,000 cars a year for both domestic sale and export. Meanwhile, IKCO plans to build its Samand, which is based on a Peugeot model, in Venezuela and China. IKCO also is producing the Samand in Belarus, with Russian support.

Strategic Deals

Russia's trade with Iran is smaller than that of big European powers and China, but it is strategic. Russia is building Iran's first nuclear power plant, about a $1 billion project that is mostly paid for. In December, Moscow agreed to sell Iran 29 Tor-M1 air-defense missile systems, a $700 million transaction that the U.S. tried to nix.

"It is clear that Moscow will not support any meaningful resolution that would interfere with Russia's trade with Iran," says Dimitri Simes, president of the Nixon Center think tank in Washington. "Restrictions on travel and equipment for nuclear technology, yes, but only if narrowly defined to assure that it wouldn't interfere with Russia's existing nuclear contracts." Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov said Friday that sanctions should be imposed only "when international peace and security are really under threat."

U.S. officials acknowledge the sanctions push at the U.N. could peter out and are revving up a campaign to get European and other companies to pull away from Iran on their own. Treasury and State Department officials have been working quietly for nearly a year to persuade banks to crimp commercial lending to Iran.

The Justice Department has stepped up enforcement of longstanding U.S. sanction laws on Iran. The laws generally bar U.S. banks from lending to Iran and U.S. companies from trading with that nation, though some companies maintain a presence in Iran trade through foreign-registered subsidiaries. A slight opening in the law in 1999 permitted Iran to send to the U.S. carpets and food items while U.S. exporters could send certain items such as food and drugs.

Several large U.S. energy firms, including Baker Hughes Inc. and ConocoPhillips, both of Houston, have pulled out of Iranian work. So has Britain's BP PLC. This year, ABN Amro Holding NV of the Netherlands and UBS AG of Switzerland said they were breaking off work with Iran.

American, Iranian Presidents Skip Each Other's Talks (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin And David Jackson

USA Today, September 20, 2006

UNITED NATIONS — The presidents of Iran and the United States managed to avoid each other Tuesday when the two gave speeches hours apart at the United Nations.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad skipped President Bush's speech to the annual General Assembly meeting. He also avoided a heads-of-state lunch, where wine was served. Iranian leaders generally boycott such events because observant Muslims don't drink alcohol.

Bush and his top advisers in turn shunned Ahmadinejad's address. The White House held a reception for heads of state at about the same time the Iranian leader spoke Tuesday evening.

Frederick Jones, a spokesman for the National Security Council, said there was nothing suspect about the timing. The president hosts the reception every year on the first night of the General Assembly.

“No one is concerned about when the president of Iran speaks,” Jones said.

DOJ_NMG_0066233

Rick Grennell, spokesman for the U.S. delegation to the United Nations, said one U.S. note taker would be present for Ahmadinejad's address.

Six Iranians listened to the speech Bush gave, including Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki.

Before coming to New York, Ahmadinejad challenged Bush to a debate. The White House dismissed the suggestion as a publicity stunt.

Paul Kennedy, professor of international history at Yale University, said Bush has nothing to gain by meeting Ahmadinejad. "The president of the United States would lose a lot of his dignity," Kennedy said. "The president's staff must be saying, 'We're not going down into the mud bath with this guy.' "

Michael Kozak, a National Security Council official, said the president "doesn't sit around and obsess about" Ahmadinejad.

"It's the other way around," Kozak said.

Gail Bindley-Taylor Sainte, a spokeswoman for the General Assembly, said that by tradition, the president of Brazil is the first head of state to speak (because a Brazilian was the first speaker at the first special session of the assembly in 1947), followed by the U.S. president. Otherwise, world leaders get to address the General Assembly on a "first come, first served basis," she said, depending on how early they put in requests.

The United States and Tehran are locked in a disagreement over Iran's nuclear program. The Bush administration claims Iran is trying to build nuclear arms. Tehran says its program is designed for peaceful purposes.

Bush, who is known to size up a foreign leader's character with a handshake and meeting, has a personal dislike of Ahmadinejad, according to Stanley Renshon, a political psychologist at the City University of New York.

Bush has never met the Iranian president. Ahmadinejad has called for Israel to be "wiped off the map" and denied that 6 million Jews died in the Holocaust. "There is a chemistry between them, and the correct term is 'revulsion,' " Renshon said. "Ahmadinejad stands for everything Bush is worried about."

Clinton Sees Hope Of Fresh Mideast Initiative (FT)

By Chrystia Freeland And Edward Luce

Financial Times, September 20, 2006

The situation in the Middle East has become so bad that a fresh peace initiative is a strong likelihood within the next two months, Bill Clinton, the former US president, said in an interview with the Financial Times.

President Clinton, whose annual conference, the Clinton Global Initiative, begins in New York on Wednesday, said the deteriorating situation in Iraq and Afghanistan and the aftermath of the war in Lebanon had created the conditions for "some kind of positive movement to take place."

While emphasising that he had no "insider knowledge", President Clinton said: "All these bad news stories have created a sense that if we don't want further disintegration to occur then we had better come up with a strategy that goes forward in creating a new sense of order that enables everybody to live together. I'm not sure you won't see some positive things come out of the Middle East in the next 60 days."

"It is time to think about what we can do to break out of this, otherwise we have three choices. We can say: "We know who our adversaries are and we can accelerate the confrontation, or we can kick the can down the road and hope the underlying realities change, or we can try to rearrange the pieces and players and try to put a puzzle together". It seems to me the latter course is the best…It wouldn't surprise me to see some fairly interesting things come out."

In a wide-ranging interview, President Clinton offered a subtle but cogently-presented rebuttal of the Bush administration's approach to foreign policy saying that rising global resentment towards the US could mostly be overcome by a change in the US administration's attitude towards those feeling the resentment. President Clinton said that people around the world could disagree with particular policies the US pursued but still feel goodwill towards America if they felt it held their ultimate interests at heart.

"If you run a big country that has to make controversial decisions - people can't possibly agree with your decisions all the time, then you must bend over backwards to make sure they feel that at least you care about them, you know about their concerns and that you're pulling for them. Policy is important. But attitude is also important."

The former president, who would be a key electoral asset and advisor to his wife, Hillary Clinton, the New York senator, if she decided to seek the Democratic Party's nomination to run for the presidency in 2008, also said that much of the global hatred of the US could be neutralised by a change of policies – either before or after the next US presidential election.

Among the policy changes President Clinton recommended were a new peace initiative in the Middle East, proper funding of global millennium development goals that were proclaimed in 2000 (towards the end of his second presidential term), and greater US involvement in relief and development initiatives in countries such as Indonesia and Pakistan.

"There are a few people who hate Americans and our way of life but most people just disagree with what we are doing now and think we don't care very much about them," he said. "So this [anti-American sentiment] is not the end of the world – it is real but it could be changed quickly either before or after the next election….. Since you cannot defeat or occupy all your enemies in an interdependent world you have to keep working for more friends and fewer enemies. I don't think it is as complicated as sometimes it's made out to be."

Most of the former president's focus nowadays is on the global human development goals that he is pursuing through the Clinton foundation and through the second annual Clinton Global Initiative conference that one participant recently dubbed "Davos with a conscience". Many of President Clinton's objectives - for which he raised pledges of $2bn last year from companies such as Coca Cola, Deutsche Bank, Goldman Sachs and Starbucks - also coincide with his diagnosis of where US foreign policy should be focusing its resources.

He cited the example of parents in Pakistan who say they send their children to non-fee paying madrasas because they cannot afford mainstream schools. "We have given huge sums to Pakistan for military aid – particularly during the cold war, but also since then," he said. "But it seems to me we haven't helped to develop a good state education system in Pakistan. That is one example of many…It [funding the millennium development goals] would be far less expensive then our Iraq war costs and the return on investment would be enormous, truly enormous."

He continued: "One of the reasons I do this work is that if you look at the anti-poverty stuff, the global health stuff and the orientation we have on global climate change, in every case a modest – compared to the size of the tax cuts and the defence build-ups – a very modest increase from the haves to the have-nots, in the right way, that is empowering and not patronising, almost certainly has significant political benefits."

When asked how he would sell such an approach to a sceptical American electorate in the upcoming US mid-term elections, which take place on 7 November, President Clinton discarded his carefully modulated criticisms of the Bush administration for more strident language.

He said the Republicans, whom polls indicate are on course to lose control of one or possibly both houses of Congress in November, were running the 2006 election "in same way as in 2002 and 2004" by focusing principally on the Democratic Party's alleged weakness on national security.

President Clinton said that the objections of three prominent Republican senators - John McCain, Lindsey Graham and John Warner – to Mr Bush's proposals for setting out in law the permissible interrogation techniques for alleged terrorists under the Geneva Conventions had "confused" the Republican strategy. "Their strategy has been complicated by the fact that [these senators] believe in the rule of law, you know, it's kind of confusing, it's made life a bit tough," he said laughing.

President Clinton offered clear advice for Democratic candidates seeking to counter Republican arguments on national security. He said it did not matter if Democratic candidates recommended differing strategies for how to change course in Iraq - whether it was setting a deadline for withdrawal of US troops, as some, such as John Kerry, the losing 2004 presidential candidate had proposed, or altering the military and civil reconstruction strategy in Iraq without setting a deadline for pulling out, as President Clinton has argued.

"The point is that Americans will tolerate Democratic differences on Iraq because the current situation has not worked," he said."The Democrats can have differences on this but they won't win the election just by criticising Iraq."

President Clinton said the Democrats should push for four things that taken together would present a credible alternative to the Republican national security agenda. These included winning the war in Afghanistan: "We cannot lose what is a moderate Muslim democracy that is a bulwark not only against the Taliban but also against the return of Osama bin Laden," he said.

Second, it meant fully implementing the recommendations of the 9/11 commission to strengthen homeland security. "I think it is wrong to give wealthy people like Bill Clinton continuing tax cuts which is much more expensive than implementing the homeland security provisions," he said.

Third, the Democrats should commit to pursuing energy independence for the US. "We can enhance our national security by committing to energy independence with a clean energy policy that will create jobs, fight global warming and make our country more secure," he said.

Finally, the US should win over the developing world by committing between $25bn to $30bn a year to achieving the development goals agreed by the group of eight leading global economies in 2000. "We have to recognise – as we have learned in Iraq – that even a country as big and powerful as America cannot handle these problems alone. We need allies, we need friends, we need more partners and fewer enemies.

"Since we have spent so much money in Iraq – more than $300bn - we need to spend more money to get kids into schools, to keep healthy people fighting HIV, tuberculosis and malaria and to provide sensible economic strategies to help people lift themselves out of poverty. These would cost a fraction of the war in Iraq and dramatically enhance our security as well as fulfil our moral responsibility to help other people fulfil their dreams."

The U.S. Vs. Iran (WSJ)

By Michael Rubin

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

The Iranian government continues to enrich uranium despite Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's generous package of incentives -- and in defiance of the U.N.'s Aug. 31 deadline. Still, European officials hold out hope for the success of diplomacy. On Sept. 15, Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, said, "We are really making progress. Never before have we had a level of engagement . . . as we have now." Diplomats will look for any hopeful sign from Iranian President's Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's forthcoming

U.N. speech. But can talk work? Successful diplomacy requires that both sides negotiate in good faith and honor commitments. That Tehran's track record undercuts confidence should not surprise. From its very inception, the Islamic Republic has eschewed diplomatic norms.

On Nov. 4, 1979, Iranian students seized the U.S. embassy in Tehran, holding 52 hostages for 444 days. Warren Christopher, deputy secretary of state during the crisis, called the Iranian move a "flagrant violation" of the 1961 Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations and the 1963 Vienna Convention on Consular Relations. But Iranian officials endorsed the seizure. Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini praised the students. His successor as supreme leader, Ali Khamenei, showed support with a visit to the embassy soon after its seizure. Ironically, while the Iranian leadership often demands apologies for transgressions both real and imagined, it continues to uphold the righteousness of hostage seizure, underscoring official contempt for diplomatic convention.

Still, the embassy seizure might be long forgotten had Tehran's disdain for diplomatic norms been the exception rather than the rule. In 1986, former U.S. national security advisor Robert McFarlane's traveled to Tehran. While the Iran-Contra Affair is remembered today for the Reagan administration's attempts to circumvent Congressional prohibition of funding of the Nicaraguan resistance, it also illustrates the inadvisability of trusting Tehran. President Reagan sought to win the release of American hostages in Lebanon but, as soon as Washington compensated Tehran for its bad behavior, its militias accelerated hostage seizure. Diplomatic enticement -- bribery by another name -- backfired. But diplomacy is not just about incentives; it is also about trust. What could have been just a failed initiative turned to scandal when, on the seventh anniversary of the embassy seizure, Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, today the chairman of the Expediency Council, broke a pledge of secrecy and revealed the meetings to the international press.

Iranian authorities showed diplomatic duplicity once again after Khomeini issued a declaration calling for author Salman Rushdie's death. Four months before Khomeini's death, then-president Khamenei demanded that Mr. Rushdie apologize in exchange for cancellation of a religious edict ordering his murder. Mr. Rushdie apologized, but the Iranian government nevertheless kept the bounty in place. President Khamenei was insincere, his diplomacy was a tactic. By winning an apology, he confirmed Mr. Rushdie's guilt.

Iranian lying should not surprise; what should is how often Western governments fall prey to it. The British government demanded that Tehran lift the bounty on Mr. Rushdie's head as a precondition to re-establish relations. On Sept. 24, 1998, the Iranian government said it would do nothing to harm Mr. Rushdie. No sooner had London and Tehran exchanged ambassadors, than Iranian authorities once again reversed themselves.

For U.S. forces in Afghanistan and Iraq, the cost of Iranian lying is high. While Iranian diplomats pledged not to destabilize Afghanistan and, indeed, cooperate in its reconstruction, the Islamic Revolutionary Guards Corps sent in operatives disguised as school teachers to further instability. As Afghan President Hamid Karzai struggled to wrest control away from warlords, Afghan commanders intercepted a dozen Iranian agents and proxies organizing armed resistance.

In Iraq, too, Iranian diplomacy has been duplicitous. Prior to the Iraq war, Iranian Foreign Minister Kamal Kharrazi and U.N. Ambassador Mohammad Javad Zarif, pledged Iranian noninterference to British Foreign Secretary Robin Cook and Zalmay Khalilzad, then President George W. Bush's envoy to the free Iraqis. But, Iranian journalists now describe how, days after Saddam's fall, the Iranian leadership dispatched 2,000 Revolutionary Guards replete with radio transmitters, money, and supplies. On Nov. 18, 2003, Mr. Kharrazi again pledged good behavior. He lied outright; his promise coincided with a new deployment of Iranian intelligence across Iraq. The Revolutionary Guard stepped up its training of Muqtada al-Sadr's militia. Hasan Kazemi Qomi, previously Iran's liaison to Hezbollah in southern Lebanon, became Tehran's top diplomat in Baghdad. Mr. Qomi assured diplomats that "Iran will not accept anything that destabilizes Iraq." Four months later, Iraqi forces captured 30 Iranians fighting alongside Sadr's militia. * * *

Earlier this month, I traveled to the Middle East to meet Shiite tribal leaders and urban notables from southern Iraq. They described how Iran has transformed its consulates in Karbala and Basra into distribution points for everything from money to shaped charges. That Tehran uses diplomatic pouches and protocols to safeguard its network reflects their insincerity. While the West approaches diplomacy with sincerity, the Islamic Republic mocks diplomatic convention to shield subversion.

Iran's nuclear program raises the stakes of its deceit to U.S. national security. There is little doubt that Tehran's nuclear program is not peaceful. On Feb. 14, 2005, Ayatollah Mohammad Baqer Kharrazi, secretary-general of Iranian Hezbollah, promised, "We are able to produce atomic bombs and we will do that." In February 2006, Mohsen Gharavian, a Qom theologian well-connected to the Islamic Republic's staunchest ideologues, called Iran's possession of nuclear weapons "natural."

Iran's nuclear program has advanced through the trust of diplomats and their willingness to provide hard currency in the name of dialogue and engagement. Between 2000 and 2005, European Union trade with Iran almost tripled. Tehran invested much of this money in arms and nuclear infrastructure. For more than a decade, through both the Rafsanjani and Khatami administrations, Iranian authorities hid the existence of a uranium enrichment plant at Natanz and a heavy water plant at Khondab. That Western diplomats label Mr. Rafsanjani a pragmatist and Mr. Khatami a reformer underscores the danger of judging Iranian officials by style rather than action.

In February 2003, the Iranian authorities opened the secret plants to International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) inspectors. Their subsequent report was damning: Not only had the Iranian government designed the Natanz facility to house at least 50,000 centrifuges, but Tehran had the import of almost a ton of uranium from China, and could not account for missing processed uranium. During subsequent inspections, Iranian authorities repeatedly changed their stories when asked about the origin of weapons-grade uranium traces. Subsequent inspections exposed other lies. Finally, on Sept. 24, 2004, the IAEA Board of Governors, after recalling a litany of Iranian mistruths, found Iran in breach of its Non-Proliferation Treaty Safeguards Agreement. While Iranian officials have made many subsequent pledges to cooperate, their actions belie their words. They have yet to abide by the Additional Protocol's inspection standards and, earlier this year, turned away IAEA inspectors from Natanz in violation of the NPT.

While diplomacy necessarily involves talking to adversaries, Washington should not assume that the ayatollahs operate from the same set of ground rules. During his long exile in Najaf, Khomeini endorsed taqiya, religiously sanctioned dissembling. From his perspective and that of his followers, the ends justify the means. Hence, Khomeini saw nothing wrong when he told the Guardian newspaper, just months before his return to Iran, "I don't want to have the power of government in my hand; I am not interested in personal power." Tehran may still conduct diplomacy to fish for incentive and reward but, at its core, Iranian diplomacy is insincere. The Iranian leadership will say anything and do anything to buy the time necessary to acquire nuclear capability. That Foggy Bottom still advises against any strategy that might undercut the possibility of some illusionary breakthrough signals triumph not of realism but of negligence. Diplomacy cannot succeed if one side is playing for real and the other only for time.

Hostage To Iran Again? (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

It was galling to be lectured on ethics, truth, justice, virtue and respect for human rights by a Holocaust-denying, Iraq-meddling, American-hating pipsqueak. A guy who showed up to address the United Nations without bothering to wear a tie, so casual in a disco-looking cream suit and open-necked pink shirt he looked like he would kick back later in Chelsea.

If President Bush was bland, oblique and condescending in his U.N. remarks, bypassing President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to speak directly to the people of Iran, the Iranian leader was more blunt — referring to America and Britain disdainfully as "the occupiers." "Not a day goes by without hundreds of people getting killed in cold blood," he said.

Iranian leaders love nothing more than taunting American presidents, as we learned when Jimmy Carter was emasculated during the hostage crisis. And so it was with Mr. Ahmadinejad, who took W. and Dick Cheney's refrain about how Republicans are needed to stiffen America's will and threw it back at them.

"There is no indication,'' he needled, "that the occupiers have the necessary political will to eliminate the sources of instability."

All day the White House team went through gyrations not to run into the Iranian leader, fearful to be caught in the same frame, perhaps haunted by memories of that picture of a smiling Rummy shaking Saddam's hand in 1983. It seemed a little silly, given what a tough guy W. acts like. If he ran into the punk, he could have just told him to quit processing uranium, and moved on. Bush aides assured reporters with asperity that they were not studying the Iranian president's route or bathroom schedule, that such a fixation would only build up a foe they were trying to cut down to size.

But it's a little late for that, with Mr. Ahmadinejad staring from the cover of Time with a story on "What War With Iran Would Look Like," and with Senator George Voinovich calling him "Ah-mad-in-a-head'' and "a Hitler type of person'' at a Senate committee hearing yesterday. (Can't pols just have little Post-its on their microphones reminding them not to compare anything to the Nazis?)

Mr. Bush played down Osama for five years, while he focused on Iraq. But his ill-fated detour into Baghdad just ended up magnifying another enemy and giving Mr. Ahmadinejad a huge strategic opportunity to stoke the growing fundamentalist and radical Shiite surge unleashed by the bungled occupation. Because W. blew off diplomacy with Iraq, he is now hostage to diplomacy with Iran.

The Iranian president sounded more scornful of the U.N. than Mr. Cheney does. "If the governments of the United States or the United Kingdom, who are permanent members of the Security Council, commit aggression, occupation and violation of international law, which of the organs of the U.N. can take them to account?'' he said, complaining that they "arrogate to themselves simultaneously the roles of prosecutor, judge and executioner."

With their usual cultural tone-deafness, W. and Vice failed to appreciate the shrewdness of the nemesis they won't talk to, and continued to arrogantly act as though everything were going along great in their clash of civilizations.

W. went through a gauzy litany of progress on democratizing the Middle East, and speaking to auto dealers yesterday morning, Vice applied a Harry Truman phrase about the cold war, calling the war against terrorists a "war of nerves."

Vice said this is "a test of our character,'' and then went on to defend all the administration's attempts to put itself above the law on the wiretapping, torture and detention programs that have undermined America's moral repute in the world.

John McCain seems untroubled with those who say that his stand on torture might hurt him with the Republican base in 2008. After making nice with his former rival, W., for so long, the war hero probably enjoys getting in National Guard boy's face a little on an issue of principle.

W. has now put so many bad actors in the terror stew — some of whom hate each other — and has justified so many sketchy programs under the war-on-terror rubric, that the word "terror" is losing all meaning and just becoming a marketing slogan. Even the Republican columnist Peggy Noonan says that W. can be "a historical drama queen."

If our pursuit of terrorists who harmed us and want to hurt us again gets too diffuse, it's pointless, counterproductive and endless. The president's refusal to understand what's at stake in the torture debate is itself a kind of torture for Americans who don't want our moral power — and our pursuit of Al Qaeda — diluted.

First Lady Is Playing A Major Role On The World Stage (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 20, 2006

New York Events on Literacy, Burma Reflect Laura Bush's More Public Persona

NEW YORK -- On Monday, Laura Bush convened an international conference on literacy. Tuesday, she hosted a roundtable aimed at prodding the United Nations into action on the humanitarian crisis in Burma. Wednesday, she will address the Clinton Global Initiative. And Thursday, she is to receive a major international award.

By any measure, it is a busy week. It is particularly so for a first lady praised by some admirers as the "anti-Hillary" for her seeming preference for eschewing controversy and for embracing a more traditional role as first lady.

"Any one of those events on their own for a first lady is significant," said Anita McBride, Laura Bush's chief of staff. "Together, they are profound."

Laura Bush has proved to be a popular and comforting presence during the nearly six years that her husband has served as president. But she has mostly steered clear of a sustained public policy role, even as she has quietly championed issues close to her heart, including literacy, education, combating HIV and the rights of women.

Her portfolio is no different -- or more controversial -- this week. But her sustained presence at the center of the world stage is unprecedented, which White House aides are promoting in the belief that her emerging profile can only help bolster President Bush's sagging popularity.

Meanwhile, the first lady, once a reluctant campaigner, has established herself as a fundraising force for the GOP. In the current election cycle, she has appeared at 33 political events, raising nearly $12.4 million -- a substantial increase over 2002, according to the Republican National Committee.

The president has been a polarizing political presence both at home and abroad, but his wife remains popular. A Gallup-USA Today poll in June found that 69 percent of Americans had a favorable view of the first lady, much higher than the president's approval rating of 40 percent.

"I think she is the most popular Republican in the country right now," said Myra G. Gutin, a first-lady historian at Rider University in Lawrenceville, N.J. "I think the public relations value is tremendous. It's not out of the ordinary for the first lady to be called upon when her popularity exceeds that of her husband."

Along with her expanding political role, Laura Bush is becoming a high-profile ambassador for the social and humanitarian portions of the president's agenda. In the nearly two years since the start of his second term, she has embarked on seven solo international trips -- three more than she took during the entire first term. Many of them have given her an up-close view of the AIDS crisis, human rights abuses and the repression that women encounter in many corners of the globe.

"She's been the face of, as far as the public face of, the U.S. government commitment on AIDS, on human rights, on democracy," McBride said. "So I think he's seen what all of you have seen -- she's been a voice for the commitments that the U.S. government is making on these issues."

This all represents a long journey for a former teacher and librarian who asked her future husband to promise never to ask her to give a political speech. Her relative silence on policy issues is far different from that of her predecessor, Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Hillary Clinton maintained an office in the West Wing of the White House, which is populated by top presidential policymakers, and she was the chief architect of the Clinton administration's failed effort to restructure the nation's health-care system.

Laura Bush works out of an office in the East Wing, where some shelves are reserved for children's books. Still, she is hardly lacking in opinions, even if she is careful to ensure that they rarely eclipse those of her husband.

A casually elegant woman with a penetrating gaze, Bush often wears a Cheshire-cat smile that admirers say both conceals and protects her independence. She proved to be a steadying hand for the nation after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, by going on national television with advice for parents on how to help their children cope with the disaster. Aides say she has strong views on women's and educational issues but makes them known selectively within the administration.

Peter Smith, assistant director general for UNESCO, met with her twice in planning for a literacy conference and was impressed. "She is a person of enormous passion on literacy," he said. "It is not that she jumps up or shouts about things. Her passion has an enduring, no-nonsense quality to it."

Some admirers have been quick to contrast her with her predecessor, but Laura Bush dismisses such comparisons.

"I don't bake cookies," she said during a 2004 White House interview with the Chicago Tribune in 2004. Protesting that the press is often eager to put the first lady in a box, she added: "The people who have lived here are more complicated than that."

During a visit to Africa last year, she surprised the president by telling reporters he should consider a woman to replace retiring Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Later, when the president nominated little-known White House counsel Harriet E. Miers for the post, provoking a revolt among some in the right wing of the GOP that eventually forced Miers's withdrawal, Bush speculated that some of the opposition to Miers may have been motivated by sexism. She has publicly lamented that some politicians have made a campaign issue of same-sex marriage -- even as her husband reaffirmed his support of a constitutional amendment to ban such unions.

The first lady delivered a presidential radio address in November 2001 on the plight of women in Afghanistan under the repressive Taliban regime. And she also pressed to visit that country, a wish that was fulfilled last year.

"Those are the things that she says she has always had an interest in -- it's just now she's expanding that interest," said Susan Whitson, her press secretary.

Her work has taken center stage this week in New York. During the global literacy conference, whose participants included first ladies from 32 nations, she was clear in her conviction that literacy is a cornerstone of liberty and self-sufficiency. Two-thirds of the world's 771 million illiterate adults are women, Bush said.

"By investing in literacy and education, governments build their economies," she said in the meeting's opening remarks.

During a meeting at the United Nations Tuesday, Bush sat at the head of a semicircular table as half a dozen health experts and officials from relief organizations briefed her on the drug trade and sex trafficking and on the horrific health and human rights problems in Burma, which is also known as Myanmar.

In remarks before the meeting, Bush said she has taken an interest in Aung San Suu Kyi, the democracy activist and Nobel laureate who remains under house arrest in Burma.

"Her example of her life actually calls attention to the situation in her country," Bush said. "And because of the attention that she gets from people around the world, we also now look at Burma and we want to see what we can do -- is there anything we can do to make sure she, as well as all the other political prisoners, are released, and that her country can reconcile."

First Lady Urges Swift Action On Myanmar (AP)

By Foster Klug

AP, September 19, 2006

First lady Laura Bush on Tuesday called for Myanmar's military rulers to release imprisoned pro-democracy leader Aung San Suu Kyi and urged the U.N. Security Council to issue a swift resolution condemning the junta.

"The United States will work very hard with other members of the Security Council to get a good resolution about Burma," Mrs. Bush told a panel of diplomats and Myanmar experts on the sidelines of the U.N. General Assembly meeting of world leaders. "The sooner the better."

The Security Council recently placed Myanmar, also known as Burma, on its agenda — something the United States has been pushing for, despite opposition from some of Myanmar's neighbors.

"It's really important for Burma's neighbors to speak with one voice," the first lady said. While the United States believes strong sanctions are the best way to force change in the country, others favor discussions with the generals.

U.S. officials also want the United Nations to call on Myanmar to release Suu Kyi, who has been in detention for much of the last 17 years. She is among some 1,100 political prisoners.

"We want to see what we can do — is there anything we can do to make sure she as well as all the other political prisoners are released," Bush said of Suu Kyi.

The U.N. Security Council held a rare briefing last year on political and social deterioration in Myanmar, but U.S. lawmakers want more done. They argue that isolating the junta should not be solely an American effort and have urged pressure be ramped up from China, Thailand and India, which they criticize for their economic ties with Myanmar's generals.

In August, President Bush approved a renewal of sanctions against Myanmar, extending for a year import restrictions.

Zaid Ibrahim, a member of Malaysia's parliament and the head of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations' Inter-Parliamentary Myanmar Caucus, said governments in the region are fed up with junta.

"The only way we can hope for real change is when this regime cracks," Ibrahim said. "Pressure works, although some people question that."

U.N. Undersecretary-General for Political Affairs Ibrahim Gambari, who was allowed to visit Myanmar earlier this year and meet with Suu Kyi, said he hoped to return and see if any progress has been made since his last visit.

Clinton, Gingrich Both Defend The Pope (AP)

By Devlin Barrett

AP, September 19, 2006

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, longtime foes in American politics, forcefully defended Pope Benedict XVI on Tuesday against a wave of Muslim criticism over a speech last week.

When asked about the controversy prior to her speech at an American Cancer Society event, Clinton, D-N.Y., said the pope's follow-up statement should have been enough to settle the matter.

DOJ_NMG_0066239

"It's just outrageous and offensive that people would be threatening violence against him based on what he said, especially when there is so much they should be working on together," Clinton said.

The former first lady has a huge lead in her Senate re-election bid this year. Her opponent, Republican John Spencer, had criticized her Tuesday for not speaking out in the pope's defense.

After appearing onstage with Clinton at the cancer event, Gingrich was even more outspoken about the religious tension.

"I think what he said in his entire speech ... is that Islam has to come to grips with having a genuine dialogue of mutual respect," said Gingrich, a Georgia Republican when he was in the House. "Everything you've seen of the viciousness and the evil that has been said since then by fanatics reinforces the pope's speech."

Both Clinton and Gingrich, who as House speaker sparred for years with President Clinton, are considered potential presidential candidates in 2008.

Benedict angered much of the Muslim world with a speech that cited a Medieval text that characterized some of the teachings of the Prophet Muhammad as "evil and inhuman," particularly "his command to spread by the sword the faith." He later said he was "deeply sorry" if Muslims were offended, but some Muslims demanded a more forceful apology.

The comments led to mass protests in several Muslim countries. In Somalia, a Catholic nun was slain, a shooting that may have been motivated by anger at the pope's remarks.

"I think it's amazing that a 65-year-old nun who's serving as a nurse in Somalia can be killed over words, and people aren't outraged by the vicious barbarians that killed her," Gingrich said.

Tough-Talking Pope Has History With Muslims, Refuses To Give In (WT)

By Julia Duin

The Washington Times, September 20, 2006

Known for his toughness on matters of Catholic doctrine, Pope Benedict XVI gives no quarter when it comes to questions about Islam.

Unlike his predecessor, Pope John Paul II, Benedict has never drawn flak for saying that Muslims and Christians pray to the same God or been accused of waffling on whether Christianity is superior to the religion of prophet Muhammad.

Still, he has dialogued with Muslims for years and, just after his installation as pope 17 months ago, specifically mentioned them in an address to members of other religions.

But, during a lecture Sept. 12 in Regensburg, Germany, he quoted a 14th-century Byzantine emperor, Manuel II Paleologos, as saying, "Show me just what Muhammad brought that was new, and there you will find things only evil and inhuman, such as his command to spread by the sword the faith he preached."

Even though the pope described the quote as "marginal" and "brusque," Muslims around the world have called for the pontiff's death, churches in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip were firebombed over the weekend, and a nun was killed Sunday in Somalia, in an apparently related attack.

Still, "challenging Islam is not Benedict's priority," says David Gibson, author of the just-released book "The Rule of Benedict." "He doesn't want to see this as a debate between equals. There's no theological parity between the two. He's not there to compromise on that.

"One of the reasons he was elected last year was the cardinals felt he'd be much more confrontational with Islam. Benedict has voiced real doubts about Islam's ability to reform itself."

Benedict has studied Islam extensively and, in a 1997 interview with German journalist Peter Seewald, dealt generously with the religion.

"There is a noble Islam, embodied, for example, by the King of Morocco, and there is also the extremist, terrorist Islam, which, again, one must not identify with Islam as a whole, which would do it an injustice," the then-Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger said.

Still, he added, Islam does not fit in with Western civilization.

"Islam has a total organization of life that is completely different from ours; it embraces simply everything," he said. "There is a very marked subordination of woman to man; there is a very tightly knit criminal law, indeed, a law regulating all areas of life, that is opposed to our modern ideas about society. One has to have a clear understanding that it is not simply a denomination that can be included in the free realm of a pluralistic society."

He has refused to alter his conviction that Islam's propensity to live by the power of the sword must be moderated.

"Certainly, it has elements that favor peace, as it has other elements," he told Italian journalists in July 2005. "We always have to seek to find the best elements that help."

Unlike John Paul, who visited a mosque in Damascus, Syria, in 2001, Benedict is loath to mix religions. Last year, while in Cologne, Germany, for World Youth Day, he turned down a request by Muslim leaders to visit a mosque there, in a city known as a European base for the radical Muslim Brotherhood.

But he did meet with Muslim leaders, who he said are viewed "with respect" by Catholics.

"We must seek paths of reconciliation and learn to live with respect for each other's identity," he added. "The defense of religious freedom, in this sense, is a permanent imperative, and respect for minorities is a clear sign of true civilization."

In March, the pope summoned 179 cardinals to Rome to discuss Islam, said John L. Allen Jr., author of "The Rise of Benedict XVI." At issue was increasing persecution of Christians in Islamic countries, he said in an interview

"He feels that if we have dialogue, we need to talk about things," Mr. Allen said of the pope, "and not just be nice to each other. When he said on Sunday that he wants a 'frank and sincere dialogue,' he meant that we have to put actual issues on the table.

"The great challenge is if he can find the vocabulary to raise these issues. And can he find a conversation partner? Are there credible forces within Islam who can engage in a discussion based on reason?"

Muslim Anger At Pope Shows Signs Of Easing (NYT)

By Ian Fisher And Peter Kiefer

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

ROME, Sept. 19 — President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran suggested today that Pope Benedict XVI had satisfactorily "modified" his remarks on Islam, one sign of an apparent easing of anger since the pope issued an apology on Sunday for the reaction to his words.

"We respect the pope and all those interested in peace and justice," Mr. Ahmadinejad, a devout Muslim and hardliner against the West, told reporters before leaving Venezuela. "I understand that he has modified the remarks he made."

On Sunday, Pope Benedict said he was "very sorry" for the anger and protests that erupted around the Muslim world since he gave a speech a week ago, citing a medieval text describing Islam as "evil and inhuman." Several churches were attacked the West Bank and Gaza, and a Catholic nun was killed in Somalia, although it is not certain the slaying came in reaction to the pope's remarks.

Since the pope issued his apology on Sunday, some Muslims have said he did not go far enough: While he did say that he did not agree with the description of Islam, he did not apologize for having using the quotes. Today, some Muslims continued to demand a fuller apology.

"Either apologize or don't come," read banners at a protest today in Turkey, where the pope's scheduled trip in November has come under criticism since he made the speech. Officials from both the Turkish government and the Vatican said they expected the trip still to go forward.

In Libya on Monday, a son of the nation's leader, Col. Muammar el-Qaddafi, said he did not accept the apology and suggested instead that that pope convert to Islam.

"If this person were really someone reasonable, he would not agree to remain at his post one minute but would convert to Islam immediately," the son, Mohammed Qaddafi, said at an awards ceremony, according to news agencies.

But today, many more Muslims echoed the sentiments of the top imam in Rome, who said the pope had "stepped back" from his original comments.

"We are always ready for dialogue, always ready for co habitation, anywhere, even in those moments when we are wounded," the imam, Sami Salem, said after an inter-religious meeting here which also Jews and Catholics.

But he said: "Dialogue is not an empty word, it should be a fact. The word is not enough."

Also at the meeting, which had been planned before the pope's speech, was the Vatican's top official on inter-religious dialogue, Cardinal Paul Poupard. He echoed the imam's call for greater dialogue among religions, although Benedict has been more skeptical about talk for its own sake and has not yet sketched out practical vision for dialogue.

"The alternative road other than terrorism and violence is dialogue and this road passes through the recognition of differences in this difficult moment our presence here means an invitation to an authentic dialogue between those who believe in one God," he said.

Today, the pope issued condolences to the nun, Sister Leonella Sgorbati, shot to death in Somalia with her bodyguard. He did so through his new secretary of state, Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, who said the nun was killed "barbarically."

"In repeating a firm condemnation of all forms of violence, his holiness the pope hopes that the blood shed by such a faithful follower of the Gospel will become a seed of hope to build an authentic brotherhood between peoples, in a spirit of mutual respect for each other's religious convictions," a Vatican statement said.

The Pope's Act Of Contrition (NYT)

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

Now that Pope Benedict XVI has expressed regret for offending Muslims in remarks he made last week, we hope Catholics and Muslims alike will put aside the pontiff's ill-considered comments and move forward in a conciliatory spirit.

Muslim leaders need to condemn the specific acts of violence that followed the pope's speech. Even more important, they must work against the nurturing of grievance that magnifies and politicizes insults, giving them a destructive dynamic.

There are hopeful examples of such leadership. Muhammad Habash, head of the center for Islamic studies in Damascus, acknowledged Muslims' shock at the pope's remarks but said that now "it is our turn to call for calming the situation." The top Islamic cleric in Turkey, Ali Bardakoglu, who had sharply criticized the pope, accepted the apology. He said Benedict's "expression of sadness is a sign that he would work for world peace."

The pope and the Vatican can also do more. For the past two years, Benedict has been a no-show at interfaith gatherings in Assisi, begun 20 years ago by his predecessor, John Paul II. Last year, he issued an edict revoking the autonomy of Assisi's Franciscan monks, a move that was seen as a reaction against the monks' interfaith activism. On the occasion of this year's gathering, he issued a statement about religion and peace that was read by an envoy, but his absence spoke louder than his words.

The pope also recently reassigned the Vatican's former head of interreligious dialogue, Archbishop Michael Fitzgerald, an expert on Arab affairs, to a diplomatic post in Egypt. According to a report in The Times by Ian Fisher, the move was interpreted by some church experts as reflecting Benedict's skepticism of dialogue with Muslims. As his unfortunate comments show, the pope needs high-level experts on Islam to help guide him.

In offering his regrets, the pope said that in its totality, his speech was intended as "an invitation to frank and sincere dialogue, with great mutual respect." In living up to that, he and other top Vatican officials will have to accept that genuine communication cannot occur on their terms only.

Israel To Pull Last Lebanon Troops By Weekend (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

JERUSALEM, Sept. 19 — Israel hopes to pull its last troops out of Lebanon by sundown on Friday, which marks the beginning of the Jewish new year, the chief of the Israeli military, Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, said today.

"If all goes without a hitch, to the satisfaction of all sides, the working assumption is that the I.D.F. will leave all the areas it controls by the Jewish New Year holiday," General Halutz told a parliamentary committee, according to a parliamentary spokesman.

If not, General Halutz said, the Israeli withdrawal "would be delayed another week." But he said that Hezbollah had respected the cease-fire ending the 34-day war that began on July 12.

The United Nations said today that the number of foreign peacekeepers in Lebanon had reached 4,950, which Secretary General Kofi Annan has said is sufficient to allow Israel to leave. The number is considerably short of the maximum number of 15,000 foreseen in the Security Council resolution that ended the hostilities.

But however thin on the ground the United Nations forces may be, Israel is clearly reluctant to stay much longer in southern Lebanon, where an unknown number of Israeli troops are vulnerable to attack. Earlier, Israel said it had already withdrawn from some 80 percent of the Lebanese territory it occupied, ceding its positions to the Lebanese Army and United Nations troops.

General Halutz also said, however, that the Hezbollah militia has fully abided by the United Nations cease-fire. He said that Hezbollah fighters were not wearing uniforms or carrying weapons, and that Israel had detected no significant resupply of weapons and missiles to Hezbollah from sponsors Syria and Iran.

The Hezbollah leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, has said that his militia would obey the cease-fire, and that if he had foreseen the harsh Israeli response to the Hezbollah raid into Israel in July 12 that captured two soldiers, he would not have ordered the attack.

Israel is hoping that the two soldiers — and a third, captured near Gaza by Palestinian militants in late June — will be released by the Jewish holiday.

In Beirut today, the United Nations humanitarian coordinator, David Shearer, said that Israel had scattered at least 350,000 unexploded cluster bomblets over south Lebanon toward the end of the war. "The outrageous fact is that nearly all of these munitions were fired in the last three to four days of the war," Mr. Shearer said.

He said that the number was based on Israeli estimates and excluded cluster bombs dropped by aircraft, and noted that three Lebanese a day had been killed or wounded by the munitions since the war ended. Israeli officials have said that cluster munitions are legal and were not fired indiscriminately.

In Gaza today, Palestinian gunmen broke into the office of WAFA, a prominent Palestinian news agency under the control of President Mahmoud Abbas. The gunmen beat up a reporter, who was taken to the hospital, and vandalized equipment, the news agency said. The gunmen accused WAFA of favoring Fatah in its news coverage.

Mr. Abbas is in New York at the United Nations General Assembly, where he met on Monday with Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni of Israel. Ms. Livni said that Israel wants to reopen a dialogue with Mr. Abbas, who said that the two "talked about everything" in what he called "a very, very positive meeting."

Mr. Abbas is trying to convince Israel and the United States that a proposed national-unity government with Hamas will satisfy Western demands that Hamas recognize the right of Israel to exist, forswear violence and accept prior Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

But a draft political program for a new government, published by the Palestinian Media Network in Gaza, does not mention Israel at all. It does speak of Palestinians achieving the goal of a sovereign state on all territories occupied by Israel in 1967 "using all legitimate means and methods," recognizes the Palestine Liberation Organization as the "sole and legitimate representative of the Palestinian people" and says that the government "shall respect the agreements signed by the P.L.O." but "in a manner that protects and safeguards the higher interests and the rights of the Palestinian people."

The program notes that the government should promote its goals based on an Arab initiative that called for peace with Israel on 1967 lines but it adds, "without affecting any rights of the Palestinian people."

DOJ_NMG_0066242

Such phrases, and another emphasizing "the right of return" of Palestinian refugees, are seen by Israeli as only a conditional acceptance of a two-state solution and thus falling short of international demands.

In Gaza, The Rule By The Gun Draws Many Competitors (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, September 19, 2006

GAZA, Sept. 12 — Nabil Shaath, one of the most prominent Palestinian officials and a close adviser to the president, Mahmoud Abbas, had his own taste of Gazan chaos the other day. At sunset, on a crowded city street, his green BMW was carjacked at gunpoint.

Mr. Shaath was not in the car, only his driver, who had to be treated at a hospital. But the boldness of the gang that carried out the theft was the talk of Gaza.

As Mr. Abbas tries to assemble a national unity government that might enable Israeli and Western funds to flow back to the Palestinian Authority, the battling between gunmen affiliated with his Fatah faction and those of Hamas, the radical Islamist party which came to power after January's legislative elections, continues apace.

The fighting is part of a struggle for power in the one part of the Palestinian territories that Israel has largely abandoned. The rivalry has been visible in the murders of prominent officials, in clashes on street corners and in the creation, against the express orders of Mr. Abbas, of a Hamas-run "Executive Force," a separate police force dressed in camouflage pants, black shirts and, invariably, beards.

Even in the strikes by civil servants against the Hamas government led by Prime Minister Ismail Haniya — strikes orchestrated by Fatah, but rooted in genuine anger over nonpayment of salaries — there is an element of armed menace.

On a recent day, Fatah-affiliated policemen of the preventive security forces, loyal to Muhammad Dahlan, their former commander and a local Fatah leader, marched boldly in the streets over their pay. Those close to Hamas have at different times tried to kill Mr. Dahlan, who as the preventive security director, on the orders of the late Yasir Arafat, carried out a crackdown on Hamas in Gaza in 1995, jailing as many as 2,000 of its members. Hamas prisoners had their beards cut and some — including the current foreign minister, Mahmoud Zahar — were reportedly tortured.

As the policemen marched recently, they chanted in rhyming Arabic: "You Zahar, tell Haniya, we're going to go back to era of the bottle," a reference to one means of torture, when prisoners were sodomized with a soda bottle.

[On Monday, Mr. Haniya had to cancel a parliamentary briefing on the prospects for a new government when hundreds of protesters, most striking over unpaid wages, blocked his motorcade. Some jumped on his car and scuffled with his bodyguards, who fired shots into the air. On Monday night, there was a large Hamas counterdemonstration.]

Such clashes are compounded by the criminal activities of various gangs and clans, or hamullas, that engage in racketeering, carjacking and kidnapping. And those clans and gangs, with relatively defined territories, are represented in the security forces and armed groups of all factions.

One Gaza kidnapping that received significant attention was of two Fox News journalists, Steve Centanni and his cameraman, Olaf Wiig. For nearly two weeks last month, they were held by a mysterious group which first demanded that all Muslim prisoners in American jails be released. In the end, the group insisted that the two men pay a ransom, convert to Islam or be murdered.

Here, the kidnapping is viewed as the work of the Dagmush clan of northern Gaza City. It is regarded as highly professional, with links to criminal enterprises and various militant factions, including Hamas and the Popular Resistance Committees. The head of the latter, Jamal Abu Samahdana, himself part of a big Palestinian clan, had been appointed by Hamas as leader of the Executive Force and was killed by Israel; some Gazan analysts saw the Fox kidnapping as a way for the clan leader Mumtaz Dagmush to press to be appointed his successor.

If true, the kidnapping was another indication of the close connections among crime, militants and the rival official security forces — the kind of connections that make political leadership in Gaza seem so weak and, at times, irrelevant.

"Hamas and Fatah are shooting each other and we, the Palestinian people, are in the middle," said Ghazi Abu Shaban, 59, a math teacher at the Bashir El Rayes High School for girls. In the disorder of Gaza, the school is immaculate, refurbished with the help of German aid. Mr. Shaban has taught here for 34 years, and has seen the students go from loose hair and tight clothing to the long black cloaks and white head scarves in favor today.

Mr. Shaban and the school's headmistress, Nadra Bseisso, joined a brief teachers' strike called by their union over the failure to pay salaries, and then resented it when so-called volunteers were sent by the Hamas government to teach in their place. "We feel abused and manipulated by the president and the government competing against one another," Mr. Shaban said.

Still, he and Ms. Bseisso have worked hard to keep politics out of the school and have nothing but praise for the Executive Force, which guards the street by the school and shoos away flocks of young men who used to come to harass and flirt with the students. "They also help prevent theft," Ms. Bseisso said. "The problem is that some gunmen from Fatah will come and taunt them, and we worry about clashes."

Hamdi Shaqqura, a director at the Palestinian Center for Human Rights, said: "The main issue in Gaza is the security chaos — the attacks on people, on internationals, on journalists. Crime is everywhere, and 90 percent of the attacks come from those in the security forces, with no punishment. So as an ordinary citizen, I see this and take the law into my own hands."

Not far away, on a street near parliament, is a store that has been sold by its owners, two sisters, to raise cash. But a young nephew is angry because he wanted the store for himself. To put pressure on his aunts, he recently brought over four men from the Hassanain clan, dressed in black, with long beards and M-16's. They came in two glinting silver Mercedes-Benzes, with no license plates.

Later, neighbors said, the aunts called Hamas, which sent some men with their own guns and beards. They whispered to the gunmen, who drove away. But the Hassanain gunmen returned the next day — not only with their guns and cars, but with a lion they stole from the zoo.

Not far away from the store is a house on a plot of land. The owner died recently, and his son lives abroad. An armed member of another clan came by, neighbors said, to claim the house. He is a member of Mr. Abbas's presidential guard, and the neighbors expect him to move in any day now.

Israel And The Quartet Must Seize The Moment (FT)

By Gareth Evans

Financial Times, September 20, 2006

If there is to be any chance of forging new momentum for a comprehensive Arab-Israeli peace settlement out of the ashes of the past several months, it will have to begin with acceptance of the leadership chosen by the Palestinians as a legitimate partner by Israel and the Quartet (America, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations).

That was not possible so long as Hamas made up the whole of the Palestinian government and refused to accept the Quartet's three conditions: that it renounce violence, recognise Israel and abide by past Israeli-Palestinian accords. But things are about to change. An understanding has been reached between Mahmoud Abbas, Fatah's Palestinian president, and Ismail Haniya, the prime minister from Hamas, on establishing a government of national unity. Its political programme will, on current indications, go a significant way towards meeting international concerns, accepting two of the three criteria in practice and one in principle.

The new government is expected to commit itself to honouring international accords the Palestine Liberation Organisation signed with Israel, and to achieving a mutual ceasefire. There will be an implicit recognition of Israel, both through acceptance of past agreements and the endorsement of the 2002 Arab peace initiative, which ties normal relations with Israel to a full withdrawal from occupied territory and resolution of the refugee question. Moreover, negotiations will be conducted by Mr Abbas, who accepts all three criteria without reservation, significantly enhancing his authority and guaranteeing both Israel and the international community an interlocutor they claim to respect.

The Quartet members, when they meet in New York, should acknowledge all this as a significant turning point. But there is a serious risk they will not. While there have been encouraging signs from the other Quartet members, the door of the US has remained shut.

That is a mistake. Hamas cannot be eliminated by denial and has earned the democratic right to a place in government. As the Quartet announced in its first post-election statement, all parties should respect the results.

Moreover, since then Hamas leaders have displayed some ideological flexibility, making clear that they are ready to share power with Fatah and to yield the negotiating mandate to the leader of the PLO. These developments are all the more remarkable when judged against the background of a raging conflict in Gaza and a fiscal crisis artificially stimulated through a financial and trade embargo. Amid this maelstrom there will still be a Palestinian government committed to a negotiated settlement, led by the two prime factions whose rivalry hitherto undermined peace efforts.

There are undeniably problems. The understanding is peppered with caveats. But cooler heads should regard these as opt-in rather than opt-out provisions, designed to ensure the broadest possible Palestinian buy-in. If the bar is raised any higher, the numbers of dissenting factions baying at the gates of the waning Palestinian Authority could grow to dangerous proportions. Hardest to accept will be no explicit recognition of Israel. But Israel engages warmly with many governments in the region that do not formally recognise it. The two Arab states which did so – Egypt and Jordan – acted only after their conflict over borders was resolved.

The Quartet should welcome the formation of a national unity government and then focus on what really matters: whether it is prepared to transform its words into action by enforcing a real ceasefire on all Palestinian factions. To give the government vital breathing space, the Quartet should lift its financial boycott and support the lifting of the Israeli siege by returning its monitors to the Rafah passenger crossing and stationing fresh ones at the Karni goods crossing. And it should help the PA rebuild its institutional capacity.

One further step is required. Without Israeli reciprocity, no agreement can hold. The Quartet must now ask Israel to honour agreements such as the roadmap; to transfer outstanding tax revenues; agree to a mutual cessation of violence by ending assassinations, incursions and bombardment; and resume bilateral negotiations in good faith. The Quartet should also establish an effective monitoring presence on the ground to verify both sides' implementation of these steps. After six years without a political process, it is time for the casuistry to stop and serious negotiations to begin.

Bush Buries The Lead (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0066244

WHEN A REPORTER DOESN'T get to the most newsworthy information until the middle of his story, an editor will complain that he's "burying the lead." That's what President Bush may have done Tuesday in his address to the United Nations General Assembly — but nobody should complain. The buried lead in Bush's U.N. remarks about the democratization of the Middle East was his announcement of a potentially significant U.S. initiative for peace between Israel and the Palestinians.

Bush addressed what he called "peace in the Holy Land" only after taking the delegates through a tour of developments in the region — including in Afghanistan and Iraq — and throwing U.S. support behind a peacekeeping force in Sudan. But when Bush did get to the Israeli-Palestinian issue, what he said was consistent with — and different from — his earlier remarks about the spread of democracy in the region.

Surprisingly, Bush linked elections in the Palestinian territories to the expansion of the franchise elsewhere in the Arab world. Referring to Hamas, the rejectionist Islamic party with which Israel rightly refuses to negotiate, Bush said: "The leaders of Hamas campaigned on a platform of ending corruption and improving the lives of the Palestinian people, and they prevailed. The world is waiting to see whether the Hamas government will follow through on its promises or pursue an extremist agenda."

The implication is that Palestinians who voted for Hamas did so despite, not because of, the movement's antipathy toward Israel. The truth, as Bush surely knows, is more complicated. Bush also spoke with a new urgency about the need for negotiations to achieve a two-state solution for Israelis and Palestinians. He reaffirmed U.S. support for the "road map" for Israeli-Palestinian negotiations agreed on in 2002 by the U.S., the U.N., Russia and the European Union. And he said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice would lead a renewed diplomatic effort in the region.

Again, while this might sound like diplomatic boilerplate, it amounts to a subtle change in direction. In May, Bush seemed receptive to Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's proposals for unilateral Israeli withdrawal from parts of the West Bank, a plan predicated on the idea that the road map had become irrelevant. Now the president has unfolded the map again and invited Palestinians to take advantage of it. Hamas should "serve the interests of the Palestinian people," Bush said. "Abandon terror, recognize Israel's right to exist, honor agreements and work for peace." That may sound like a stern injunction, but it also offers Hamas a route to respectability.

Buried as they were in his speech, Bush's comments about the Arab-Israeli conflict were notable because they fit awkwardly into his main theme of democracy as the solution to tensions in the region. Democracy is important, but so are security for Israel and independence for the Palestinians.

Yemen moves along volatile path to democracy (CSM)

By Ginny Hill

The Christian Science Monitor, September 20, 2006

Nine million voters are set to go to the polls here Wednesday in combined presidential and local elections, concluding a heated and sometimes deadly month-long campaign.

Some 90,000 police and troops will deploy in an attempt to minimize the violence that has claimed at least seven lives in clashes between supporters of rival candidates in this country where small arms are freely available and gun ownership is the norm.

President Ali Abdullah Saleh, who in June reversed his earlier decision to step down after nearly three decades in power, is seeking a mandate for another seven-year term. His reelection is almost certain, observers say, raising questions about the pace of progress toward democracy, 15 years after Yemen became the first country to introduce to universal suffrage to the Arabian Peninsula.

"The prospect of replacing [President] Saleh probably scares a lot of people, because it would bring uncertainty and changes to the settled order," says Paul Harris, director of IFES, a prodemocracy organization based in Washington that will take part in monitoring the election. "But the constitution now limits the president to serving two elected terms in office, which - if he wins this year - would set Saleh's retirement date for his 70s."

Yemen has been an ally to the US in the global fight against terror. But critics maintain that corruption is rife here and the government is largely forced to rule through tribal proxies outside the capital Sanaa. And Yemen has long had a reputation for cultivating and exporting terrorism. The main challenger for the presidency, Faisal bin Shamlan, has been embroiled in election-eve allegations that his bodyguard was a senior Al Qaeda militant planning attacks against US interests in Sanaa.

Saleh, president of North Yemen and commander-in-chief of the armed forces prior to unification in 1990, emerged as Yemen's leader when the end of the cold war led to the collapse of the Socialist government in South Yemen and concluded more than a decade of conflict. During 28 years at the top, he has had to manage a complex network of tribal loyalties and military interests that run parallel to and often override party politics and parliamentary structures.

In 1999, in the first direct presidential elections, Saleh stood against a candidate from his own party - the General People's Congress (GPC) - and won 96 percent of the vote. Now, he is fighting his second election campaign and faces his most serious challenger in Mr. Shamlan, a former oil minister who resigned from his post in 1995 during a coalition government in protest over corruption, representing an alliance of the five main opposition parties.

Hamoud Munasser, a Yemeni journalist, says this is an important election for the development of democracy "because, for the first time, there is real competition between the ruling party and the opposition coalition.

"We used to get only one choice, but we have many choices now - both for president and at the local level," he says.

DOJ_NMG_0066245

Yemen's month-long election campaign has shown all the signs of popular participation, with extensive media coverage and mass rallies in every major city.

Half-a-million people turned out on Monday to hear Saleh's final speech in Sanaa. He was dressed in a Western-style suit and surrounded by traditional Yemeni displays of horse-riding and dancing to create a spectacular piece of political theater.

By contrast, Shamlan's finale attracted fewer than 80,000 people. Supporters complained that police were preventing them from reaching the stadium. But people in the crowd were adamant that their man would bring the about changes that Yemen needs.

"I'm voting for bin Shamlan because he's an honest man. I believe he'll eradicate the corruption that dominates our government and institutions," says Sheikh Faisal bin Ali al-Gabri.

Away from the throng, others are more cynical about the prospects for the future. "Nothing will change as a result of this election," says one retired clerk, who has no intention of voting Wednesday. "There is no such thing as an Arab democracy. It's just an illusion."

Hafez al-Bukari, director of the Yemen Polling Center, says the opposition coalition is not competing on a level playing field.

"The GPC is the dominant party, both in terms of resources and control of media coverage," he says. "After decades of the status quo, people don't distinguish between the GPC and the state. They think that all benefits arising from the state are actually coming from the president's party."

During parliamentary elections in 2003, the National Democratic Institute (NDI) expressed concerns that the vote had been undermined by political intimidation, vote-buying, underage voting, and inappropriate behavior by the security forces.

On Wednesday, a 100-strong team of observers from the European Union will assess procedures in every governorate in the country in Yemen's largest monitoring operation to date.

Whatever the outcome of the vote, Yemen must eventually move toward its first peaceful transfer of power, observers say, even if turns out to be in-house affair. The front-runner for succession is currently Saleh's son, Ahmed, who is head of the Republican Guard and Special Forces.

With widespread poverty, rapid population growth, and a weak economy reliant on modest oil reserves that are less than a decade from running out, the challenges facing the country at the next elections in 2013 will only worsen unless substantial and effective reforms are introduced in the new presidential term.

Somalia Leader Survives Attack (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 19, 2006

A car bombing, a rarity in the nation, kills eight outside parliament. Some fingers point to Islamist council, which denies involvement.

MOGADISHU, Somalia — The transitional president of Somalia narrowly escaped assassination Monday when a car bomb exploded as he left a converted grain silo that serves as the nation's makeshift parliament.

President Abdullahi Yusuf was unharmed. However, eight other people, including his brother and several security guards, were killed by the blast in Baidoa, the nation's provisional capital.

The attack marked the second consecutive day of bloodshed in the Horn of Africa nation, which has been without a functioning government since 1991. On Sunday, gunmen in Mogadishu shot to death an Italian nun and her bodyguard outside a children's hospital.

Despite years of instability and violence, car bombs have been rare in Somalia, and local officials quickly blamed foreign militants. One government minister described the bombing as an "Al Qaeda-type" attack. No one immediately claimed responsibility.

"We hear about this type of thing in Iraq, but not Somalia," said Abdul Fatah Ibrahim Rasheed, a member of parliament. "This is something that is very new for us."

The blast came at a particularly sensitive time for the government. Yusuf's administration is attempting to negotiate a power-sharing agreement with the Conservative Council of Islamic Courts, which seized control of Mogadishu earlier this year. Some officials in Baidoa accused the group of participating in the attack.

"It will jeopardize the peace process if it becomes very obvious that the Islamists are behind this terrorist act," Foreign Minister Ismail Hurre Buba Hurre said during a visit to Nairobi, the Kenyan capital.

Islamist officials denied any knowledge of the attack.

"We know nothing about it, but we are very sorry for anything that hurts the security of Somalia," said Sheik Mukhtar Robow, deputy security chief for the courts council, an alliance of religious leaders formed in an attempt to bring order to Mogadishu.

Both sides are to meet again in Khartoum, the Sudanese capital, next month to continue negotiations.

Witnesses said the bomb, apparently hidden in a small car outside the parliament compound, detonated as the president's motorcade was leaving the facility. Yusuf had just addressed lawmakers, urging them to put aside their differences and endorse his newly reshuffled Cabinet.

There were conflicting reports about whether the car was parked or was driven by a suicide bomber. In a radio address Monday night, Yusuf said authorities had recovered the remains of a person they believed might have been the suicide driver.

The blast ignited at least seven other cars and flung wreckage more than 100 yards to the doorstep of the parliament building, witnesses said. Inside, panicked lawmakers screamed and fled the building. Security guards fired into the air, adding to the sense of chaos, witnesses said.

"We thought we were under attack," said Ahmed Omar Gagale, a member of parliament. "It sounded like mortars, especially when some of the other cars began to explode from the fire."

After its formation at an internationally sponsored conference in 2004, the transitional government opted to reside in Baidoa rather than Mogadishu because of violence in the nation's traditional capital.

Since Islamists drove out the warlords who had carved up control of the city, security in Mogadishu has improved dramatically, while bloodshed in Baidoa has been rising. In July, gunmen shot a government minister as he left a mosque in Baidoa.

"It's getting very scary there," said Asha Ahmed Abdalla, a member of parliament.

Prime Minister Ali Mohammed Gedi escaped two assassination attempts in 2005.

Author Could Face Prison If Convicted Of 'Insulting Turkishness' (USAT)

By Michael Kuser

USA Today, September 20, 2006

ISTANBUL — Turkish novelist Elif Shafak faces trial here Thursday on charges of "insulting Turkishness" through comments made by a fictional character in her latest novel, The Bastard of Istanbul.

Shafak, 34, who teaches Middle Eastern studies at the University of Arizona, splits her time between Tucson and Istanbul, where she is helping set up a master's program in American culture and literature at Bahcesehir University.

The charges against Shafak — the latest of at least 60 cases involving authors and journalists here — raise questions about Turkey's readiness to become a full member of the European Union, a move the United States supports as a way to bolster a secular, democratic Muslim state in a pivotal geographic and political position.

She could face up to three years in jail on charges she violated Article 301 of the Turkish Penal Code by having an Armenian character in the book say that "Turkish butchers" killed her family and that the deaths were "genocide."

Shafak — who delivered her first child, a girl, on Saturday — wants to appear in court when the trial starts, her husband, Eyup Can, said Tuesday.

Can, who is editor of a Turkish business daily, said, "Most probably she won't be able to go, due to her condition." He said Shafak's lawyer will ask for a one-month postponement.

Turkey has been making efforts to change its criminal and justice systems to meet European standards to qualify for full EU membership. That's the goal of negotiations that started last October and could take a decade.

The failure to remove restraints on freedom of speech has led to charges against writers including Shafak. Under the 2005 law, anyone who criticizes the state or denigrates Turkish identity in any form can be prosecuted.

Several writers have been convicted, though none has gone to jail. Instead, the courts have handed down fines. The maximum amount levied: $4,000.

The charges against Shafak are based on events that, although they took place nearly a century ago, remain a sore spot for Turks and Armenians.

Official Turkish history says the mainly Orthodox Christian Armenians sided with Russia in an attempt to carve out a chunk of territory from the crumbling Ottoman Empire. History books here say many Muslims were killed in the fighting and the Armenians paid the price for their losing bid.

It is a criminal act in Turkey to back the view that forced marches to the Syrian border that killed up to 1 million Armenians should be considered genocide.

Other taboo topics include the rights of Turkey's Kurdish minority and Turkey's justification for invading the now-divided island nation of Cyprus in 1974.

Many Turks support Article 301 because they fear dredging up the past will hurt Turkey's aspirations to join the EU. "Talking about Turks killing people will give people in Europe and America the wrong idea, for it started with the Armenian attacks," says Banu Aktac, 43, a tour guide in Istanbul.

International PEN, a London-based group that promotes free speech, says Article 301 fails to meet international standards that protect freedom of expression such as the European Convention on Human Rights, which Turkey has signed.

"The trial against Elif Shafak is another sign that the situation in Turkey has become stricter," says Eugene Schoulgin, a PEN board member who is in Istanbul to attend the trial. "It's basically a crackdown on writers and journalists and is a result of the country's paranoiac attitude toward honor."

The Bastard of Istanbul tells the story of two women connected by a family secret. In the novel, a woman whose Armenian grandmother was raised by a Turkish Muslim family after being orphaned says, "I am the grandchild of genocide survivors who lost all their relatives in the hands of Turkish butchers in 1915."

The themes of The Bastard of Istanbul — how memories differ from person to person — evolved from the author's previous work exploring mysticism, religion and nostalgia, among other subjects.

Born in Strasbourg and raised in France, Spain, Jordan and Turkey by a single mother who was a Turkish diplomat, Shafak began as a child to question her nationality and what it means to be a woman. “Only through my novels can I continue to explore the boundaries of identity,” she says.

Shafak wrote The Bastard of Istanbul in English. She then wrote a translated version for the Turkish market. The novel was published here in March and has sold more than 60,000 copies. The English-language version will be out early next year.

University of Arizona officials sent letters to Turkey's foreign minister and to the Turkish ambassador in Washington to protest Shafak's prosecution, says Anne Betteridge, director of the school's Center for Middle Eastern Studies. Betteridge was not aware of any response.

The U.S. Embassy in Ankara has been closely following Shafak's case and others that involve free speech. “We have raised concerns about freedom of expression issues with Turkish authorities,” embassy spokeswoman Kathryn Schalow says.

Among other writers who have been prosecuted under Article 301 is Hrant Dink. His six-month suspended sentence for “insulting Turkishness” in his newspaper, Agos, was upheld last month.

Shafak's case, dismissed by a lower court, was reinstated by another court in early July after Kemal Kerincsiz filed a complaint. The ultranationalist lawyer initiated many of the cases against writers who brought up the Armenian deportations through the 800-member Jurists Union, an independent, non-governmental organization he founded in 2002.

Kerincsiz says his campaign is a way to derail Turkey's negotiations to join the EU. He has called membership in the 25-nation bloc a form of slavery. He also dismisses writers' concerns about being put on trial. “What's the big deal with a trial? Orhan Pamuk became a prince,” he says, referring to Turkey's leading writer, who also is on trial. “And now Elif will be a princess.”

Shafak says hostility to EU membership is a troubling sign for relations with the West. “Anti-Turkish sentiment in Europe buttresses Turkish nationalism,” she says, referring to European concerns about admitting the predominantly Muslim nation of 70 million to the EU. “I only fear a backlash because it gives foreigners the impression that Kemal Kerincsiz represents the majority, which I don't believe he does.”

Senate approves Oman trade agreement (AP)

AP, September 20, 2006

WASHINGTON - Congress gave final approval Tuesday to a free trade agreement with Oman, ending months of debate over a deal that will have few economic effects but came to stand for growing differences over U.S. trade policy.

The 63-31 Senate vote gives the go-ahead to a trade pact that would immediately end all duties on industrial and consumer products sold between the United States and the Arabian Gulf state. Oman would remove duties on 87 percent of U.S. agricultural imports and eliminate all tariffs within 10 years.

Trade between the two countries totals less than $1.2 billion annually, but the administration pushed hard for the deal, stressing both Oman's long history as a strategic ally and the administration's goal of establishing a Middle East free trade area by 2013.

President Bush praised the congressional action, saying it would deliver economic benefits to both countries and protect U.S. national security interests "by strengthening our relations with a strategic friend and ally in the Middle East."

Oman, said Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, has been "a consistent ally where we need one very much, in an unstable part of the world."

U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab said the Oman agreement "builds on free trade agreements concluded with Israel, Jordan, Morocco and Bahrain" and that the proposed Middle East free trade area would spur economic growth and reform in an area of almost 350 million people.

But the agreement drew fire, mainly from Democrats who said it did too little to ensure that trade with Oman wouldn't come at the expense of worker rights and the environment. They also charged that the administration has negotiated trade deals without addressing their concerns, and that free trade deals too often result in growing trade deficits and the loss of American jobs.

"Every single incompetent trade agreement this country signs ends up dramatically increasing our federal deficits," said Sen. Byron Dorgan (news, bio, voting record), D-N.D. "We are choking on them."

Sen. Max Baucus (news, bio, voting record) of Montana, a pro-trade Democrat, said "the controversy over Oman reflects more general frustration with trade agreements."

The Senate originally passed the bill implementing the agreement last June on a 60-34 vote. The House, where opposition to free trade agreements is generally stronger, narrowly approved it in July on a 221-205 vote; the measure returned to the Senate for Tuesday's procedural confirmation of its previous vote.

The office of the U.S. Trade Representative, which negotiates trade agreements, is moving ahead with numerous other bilateral deals. Talks are under way with Panama, South Africa and Thailand, and discussions have begun with South Korea and Malaysia.

Japan Imposes Financial Sanctions On North Korea (MCT)

By Tim Johnson

McClatchy Newspapers, September 20, 2006

TOKYO - Japan on Tuesday froze some bank activity of a North Korean hospital that treats top officials and a state-run software company with extensive commercial contracts in Japan, joining Australia in tightening a financial noose around the Kim Jong Il regime.

In step with the United States, Japan and Australia imposed a series of financial sanctions on North Korea over its nuclear weapons development.

"This shows the resolve of the international community and Japan," said Chief Cabinet Secretary Shinzo Abe, who's likely to win the job as Japan's new prime minister in a party vote Wednesday.

Japan's actions restricted overseas remittances and bank withdrawals of 15 North Korean commercial entities and one Swiss individual, expanding existing U.S. sanctions to include three new companies. Australia targeted 11 companies and the Swiss man.

Abe said the actions were aimed at North Korea's weapons programs and were designed to force the nation to return to six-nation talks on dismantling its nuclear programs, which deadlocked last year.

"North Korea has to come back to the negotiating table as soon as possible," Foreign Ministry spokesman Tomohiko Taniguchi said.

The sanctions also appeared intended to hurt the health care of North Korea's senior officials and to pinch hard-currency earnings from at least one successful company.

Among the enterprises hit by Japan and as yet unaffected by U.S. sanctions were the Korea Tonghae Shipping Co. and Pyongyang Informatics Centre. Japan also froze accounts of the Ponghwa Hospital, Pyongyang's best-equipped clinic. Ponghwa treats Kim's immediate family and senior officials and appears to have overseas financial activity.

By targeting the Pyongyang Informatics Centre, Japan sought to cut off the foreign earnings of one of North Korea's few viable enterprises with operations abroad.

"It's a fairly high-quality software firm. They've done quite a few contracts in Japan," said Peter Hayes, a North Korea expert and the executive director of the Nautilus Institute, a research center that focuses partly on the dangers of nuclear war.

The company was set up in the mid-1980s with help from the U.N. Development Program and ethnic Koreans living in Japan. Thought to have around 200 staff members, it's designed management software for the publishing, shipping, insurance and hotel industries. Among its past clients reportedly is Nissan, the Japanese automaker.

Hayes said he thought the overseas contracts earned the company only "a few million dollars a year." He asserted that targeting the company will have "zero" impact on getting North Korea back to nuclear talks.

"It will just force them (the company executives) into informal networks and illegitimate forms of commerce," Hayes said, possibly including online gambling and pornography.

The new sanctions follow North Korea's tests of seven ballistic missiles July 5. Shortly after the tests, Japan banned a North Korean ferry from entering its ports for six months and barred North Korean officials from entering the country.

Australia, which maintains diplomatic relations with North Korea, unlike Japan, said in a Foreign Ministry statement that its measure complements "previous actions taken by the United States and sends a strong message to North Korea."

One Japanese expert on the Korea Peninsula, Hajime Izumi, cast doubt on whether the sanctions will have much impact on Pyongyang without broader support.

"If we want to stop (nuclear activity) by North Korea, all countries in the world have to take similar measures, especially South Korea and China, to halt the flow of money," Izumi told Japanese television.

Australia And Japan Impose New Sanctions On North Korea (NYT)

By Choe Sang-hun, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

SEOUL, South Korea, Sept. 19 — Australia and Japan imposed new financial sanctions on North Korea today, as the United States dismissed appeals from China and South Korea for a softer approach and rallied more international pressure on the North over its nuclear program.

Australia and Japan have little trade with North Korea, so the practical impact of the sanctions will be small, experts said. But they are a sign that Washington and its allies are intent on tightening a financial noose around the Communist North Korean regime and starving it of hard currency from abroad.

Though that strategy is already hurting the North, officials and experts in Beijing and Seoul expressed concern that mounting pressure might prompt the North's mercurial leaders to lash out defiantly by testing a nuclear weapon — and thereby touch off an arms race in Northeast Asia.

"The Chinese government has always held the position that the issue should be resolved through dialogue, and we are opposed to sanctions," Qin Gang, the spokesman for the Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman, said today.

In Seoul, Song Min Soon, the chief national security adviser to President Roh Moo Hyun, said that South Korea did not support imposing more sanctions on North Korea. President Roh and President George W. Bush discussed sanctions when they met in Washington five days ago, but they failed to reach any agreement; negotiators for the two countries are due to meet on the issue again on Wednesday.

"Our government position has been consistent," Mr. Song said. "The matter of sanctions must be considered in a way that helps resolve the nuclear problem."

In Japan, the new sanctions took the form of an order to Japanese financial institutions to block all transactions by 15 companies and one individual who are suspected of having links to North Korea's weapons programs. The steps were announced today by Shinzo Abe, the chief cabinet secretary, who is expected to win a party vote on Wednesday that will make him the next Japanese prime minister. Mr. Abe has advocated a hard line against North Korea.

Among the companies subject to the new freeze on transactions are Korean mining, shipping and trading companies and a Swiss manufacturer, Kohas, that has long been suspected of assisting North Korea's nuclear efforts. The individual named in the freeze order is Jakob Steiger, 65, the president of Kohas.

"By taking these measures, we have demonstrated the resolve of the international community," Mr. Abe said.

In Australia, the foreign minister, Alexander Downer, took similar steps against a list of companies and individuals that it said were involved in financing North Korea's reported attempts to build weapons of mass destruction.

"North Korea misguidedly believes that development of a W.M.D. capacity will enhance its security," Mr. Downer said in a statement. "This is patently untrue. We call on North Korea to recognize this, and to give up its W.M.D. ambitions." Australia established diplomatic relations with North Korea in 2000.

Today's sanctions come exactly a year after the United States, Japan, China, Russia and the two Koreas signed an agreement in Beijing, setting out a broad outline of how to phase out the North's nuclear weapons facilities in return for economic and diplomatic rewards.

That accord quickly disintegrated after the United States Treasury Department persuaded Banco Delta Asia, a bank based in Macao, to freeze the accounts that North Korean trading companies were suspected of using to channel profits from illicit trade. Since then, North Korea has refused to take part in further six-nation talks until the sanctions are lifted.

Far from lifting the freezes, Washington has worked to expand them, persuading banks in other Asian nations to shut down North Korean accounts as well. Experts say that the regime now relies on weapons sales and counterfeiting to finance weapons programs and a comfortable lifestyle for the elite inner circle in a country otherwise racked with poverty.

"The impact was far bigger than the U.S. officials had expected," Koh Yu Hwan, a North Korea expert at Dongguk University in Seoul, said of the efforts to isolate North Korea financially. "It was a tremendous blow to the regime."

The North tried in December to open accounts at South Korea's Woori Bank, which has a branch at a joint inter-Korean industrial park in a North Korean city, the bank said today. The request was rejected by the bank.

In an apparent attempt to force Washington to lift its sanctions, North Korea test-fired seven missiles on July 5. But the United States and Japan pushed a resolution through the United Nations Security Council that urged U.N. members to stop transactions that could aid the North's weapons programs.

"Now, word is that Iran is the only remaining client for North Korean missiles," said Cheong Seong Chang, a North Korea expert at Sejong Institute in Seoul. "The sanctions are hurting not only illegal but also legitimate financial transactions for the North."

Mr. Cheong said he would not rule out the possibility of a North Korean nuclear test now.

"When pressure continues, North Korea won't be left with room for a wise judgment," he said. "As was the case with the missile tests, it thinks it should react to a tough action with a tougher counteraction."

Sanctions By Japan Harden Stance On North Korea (WSJ)

By Sebastian Moffett And Evan Ramstad

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

With one week left before Junichiro Koizumi steps down as prime minister, Japan imposed sanctions on 15 groups and one individual with links to North Korea's weapons programs, a sign of the more assertive foreign policy Tokyo has crafted during Mr. Koizumi's five years in power.

The penalties -- which target North Korean companies as well as a Swiss company and its president -- are meant to increase pressure on the communist nation in the wake of its July missile tests. The penalties will also include tighter identification checks on people making suspicious financial transactions.

Until Mr. Koizumi took office, Japanese governments hoped that the way to avoid conflict with Pyongyang was to avoid offending the regime. When North Korea fired a test missile over Japan in 1998, Tokyo did little in response.

But Mr. Koizumi decided to engage, visiting Pyongyang in 2002 and again in 2004. While there, he obtained a written agreement, the Pyongyang Declaration, in which the North promised not to launch missiles. In addition, Japan has during the past few years passed laws enabling its government to respond more briskly to North Korea. These are mostly aimed at choking off the flow of money and goods from ethnic Koreans who live in Japan but are loyal to Pyongyang.

After North Korea test-fired seven missiles into the Sea of Japan on July 5, Japan immediately banned from its ports for six months a ferry that provides the only direct passenger link between the two countries. It also barred the entry of North Korean government officials and led calls for a United Nations Security Council resolution condemning the missile tests.

Tokyo's hard line complements that of the U.S., which would like to see North Korean leader Kim Jong Il's regime collapse, removing a threat to regional stability. In the past year, the U.S. has clamped down on banks in other countries that Washington believes assist North Korea in money laundering, counterfeiting and other illegal activities. Australia has joined the hawks, too, and yesterday it announced sanctions similar to Japan's. These restrict transactions involving, among others, North Korean chemical and machinery firms.

Despite its tougher line, Japan has been losing some leverage over North Korea, making any punishment it tries to mete out potentially less effective. Five years ago, Japan was North Korea's second-biggest trading partner after China, with $475 million in annual two-way volume. By 2005, that had declined to slightly below $200 million, and Japan trailed China, South Korea, Thailand and Russia in trade with the North. In addition, China and South Korea exert far more influence on Pyongyang via food and energy assistance.

The North is increasingly getting support from its old enemy, South Korea. Fearing that tight restrictions will lead to a collapse of the North and a massive rebuilding Seoul will have to pay for, South Korea advocates economic incentives to Pyongyang it believes will lead to a change that is manageable. Seoul cut some aid to the North after July's missile tests but is reluctant to go further.

Shortly after the missile tests, Japanese Chief Cabinet Secretary Shinzo Abe, who is almost certain to succeed Mr. Koizumi as prime minister, raised the question of whether Japan could consider a first strike against North Korea. Though Mr. Abe later said Japan would consider striking at North Korea's missile bases only if attacked, the comments drew a fierce response from South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun. "Japan's attitude may lead to a critical situation in the peace over Northeast Asia," he said.

China also opposes actions that might destabilize North Korea. Yesterday, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Qin Gang called for more dialogue. Without referring to Japan or Australia by name, he said, "We are opposed to sanctions."

US-Russia Effort To Contain Nuclear Experts Fades (CSM)

By Fred Weir And Mark Clayton

The Christian Science Monitor, September 20, 2006

MOSCOW AND BOSTON

At a Moscow conference in 2000 on stopping the global migration of nuclear-weapons know-how, a Russian security official revealed that Taliban envoys had tried to recruit a Russian nuclear expert.

That expert didn't go to work for the Afghan regime. But three of his colleagues did leave their institute for other nations - and Russian officials had no idea which ones, US experts say.

With the threat of nuclear terrorism looming large in a post-9/11 world, the brain drain of Russian nuclear expertise is an even more critical concern than it was six years ago, many say. Yet a unique 1998 US-Russian partnership to offer new opportunities and skills to destitute Russian nuclear specialists living in remote former-Soviet "science cities" is set to expire Friday unless last-minute diplomacy saves it.

A stronger Russian economy and growing wariness of US access to sensitive nuclear programs has dampened Moscow's enthusiasm for the Nuclear Cities Initiative (NCI) program, as has a three-year wrangle with Washington over legal liability issues, observers say.

"It will be a great pity if this program dies, because it really had an impact around here," says Yuri Yudin, a former atomic scientist who heads the Analytical Center for Nonproliferation in the closed city of Sarov, one of several NCI-funded projects. "The objective was to create nonmilitary businesses and new jobs that could become self-sustaining, and it had considerable success. But the task is far from finished."

Others say losing the program would be another "unsettling sign" of erosion in US-Russia nuclear security cooperation.

"If we eliminate this program we will be losing a major nonproliferation agreement," says Kenneth Luongo, executive director of the Russian-American Nuclear Security Advisory Council, a nuclear nonproliferation group in Washington.

Ten Russian cities - mainly linked to nuclear weapons and missile research - remain "closed" today, even to Russians who lack special permission. The closed nature of the cities became traps for some of the estimated 35,000 Russian scientists who needed work after the Soviet Union's collapse. For these scientists, who live under security surveillance, jobs needed to be created in the closed cities.

The tiny NCI program, which has helped 1,600 scientists in its existence, has been folded into a much larger DOE effort that employs more than 13,000 Russian scientists with grant funding. But NCI is unique in its focus on job creation in closed cities by converting existing nuclear complexes into other businesses, such as computer centers, US officials say.

"If you put the money through different channels, it's not the same," Mr. Luongo says. "The program's underpinnings and momentum ... are lost."

The head of Russia's nuclear agency RosAtom, Sergei Kiriyenko, is slated to meet US Department of Energy chief Samuel Bodman in Vienna this week in an eleventh-hour chance to save the program.

"It [NCI] has been definitely a useful tool, a unique way to work with Russian WMD scientists and engineers," says Bryan Wilkes, a spokesman for the National Nuclear Security Administration that administers NCI.

DOJ_NMG_0066251

Not everyone agrees the program is still needed. Valentin Ivanov, a member of the Russian parliament's energy committee, says that while there's still plenty of room for US-Russian cooperation on nuclear disarmament, the problems of the closed cities are a "domestic matter" that Moscow now has the means to address.

"We thank the US for its help, which was greatly needed in the 1990s," he says. "But this is a new time, Russia has a budget surplus now, and [US help] is not necessary anymore."

Negotiators for RosAtom and DOE failed to renew the deal in 2003 after the US side demanded a blanket liability exemption for Americans working on NCI projects, and the Russians balked. Earlier this year, the US acquiesced to the Russians. But whether it will be enough to interest Moscow in extending the deal remains highly uncertain, US officials and other observers say.

Even before the legal dispute, Moscow complained that NCI budgets in the $20 million range were too low, that much of the money was being spent in the US, and that highly qualified scientists were being re-trained to do low-level jobs like computer programmer and paramedic.

But Russian security concerns may also have played a role.

"Access to closed cities was the biggest stumbling block. Russian secrecy paranoia still exists," says Gennady Pshakhin, an expert at the Institute for Physics and Power Engineering in the formerly closed city of Obninsk. He says if his institute - which specializes in civilian nuclear energy - invites a foreigner to visit, it must obtain clearance from President Vladimir Putin or Prime Minister Mikhail Fradkov.

Supporters say the NCI made a big difference in some places, and could have done much more if more time and resources had been devoted. In Sarov - Russia's Los Alamos - NCI helped to close down one of the ex-USSR's biggest nuclear warhead factories, and turn it into a computer center that's now used by firms like Intel and Motorola. About 1,000 new jobs were created, Mr. Yudin says.

"The program really helped to diversify Sarov's economy; it changed peoples' mentality and helped to prepare them for the market," says Alexei Golubov, a former nuclear researcher who now works as an information analyst. "It was like a small window that opened onto the world for us."

Impelling NCI and other such programs is evidence over the years that Russian scientists might be willing to shop their skills to rogue regimes. In one reported 1992 incident, a planeload of Russian scientists was stopped by police "on the tarmac" as they embarked for North Korea. In 1998, an arms expert in Sarov was arrested by the FSB security service for allegedly spying for Iraq.

A study last year by the Center for Strategic and International Studies and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology surveyed the attitudes of 602 Russian nuclear, biological, and chemical WMD scientists. The study found that the mean income for such scientists was about $110 a month, and that 21 percent were willing to move to a "rogue nation" to work. As for the impact of assistance programs like NCI, the survey found 12 percent of those with grant funding would consider work in a rogue state, versus 28 percent without funding.

However, it's doubtful that any atomic experts could illegally leave Russia now, Pshakhin says.

"A lot of nuclear scientists are still underemployed, but things are a bit better," he says. "Nuclear scientists are under very strong monitoring. We are not allowed to move freely. Any attempt by a foreign power to recruit Russian scientists would immediately come to the attention of the FSB."

RosAtom chief Mr. Kiriyenko has announced plans for a sweeping revival of Russia's civilian atomic power industry. Military leaders also talk of putting weapons experts back to work.

Vladimir Fortov, head of the department of energy for the Russian Academy of Sciences, says that while Russia is returning some scientists to their old jobs, the NCI training programs remain valuable.

"They aided Russian-American mutual understanding, and it will be very unfortunate if they are discontinued," he says.

$50 Million Offer Aims At Curbing Efforts To Make Nuclear Fuel (NYT)

By William J. Broad

New York Times, September 20, 2006

VIENNA, Sept. 19 — Warren E. Buffett, the billionaire investor and philanthropist, pledged $50 million on Tuesday to help set up an international nuclear fuel bank that aspiring powers could turn to for reactor fuel instead of making it on their own.

Mr. Buffett's aim is to curb the risks of nuclear proliferation by providing an alternative to the kind of indigenous production of nuclear fuel that Iran is embarking upon, and that countries like Argentina, Australia and South Africa have recently announced plans to pursue.

Nuclear experts say indigenous production carries with it the risk of military diversion for nuclear arms, and that the risk is rising as a growing number of countries around the world embrace atomic power or plan to expand their nuclear programs.

"This pledge is an investment in a safer world," Mr. Buffett said in a statement.

"The concept of a backup fuel reserve has been discussed for many years," he said. "Its creation is inherently a governmental responsibility, but I hope that this pledge of funds will support governments in taking action to get this concept off the ground."

His pledge came at an international conference here in Vienna where nations are exploring how to create multinational fuel banks as a way to aid nuclear development while avoiding new risks.

Multinational banks and plants are seen as having a security advantage because member states can watch one another to prevent weapon diversions.

Mr. Buffett's pledge is meant to jump-start the creation of a reserve fuel bank run by the International Atomic Energy Agency, the global nuclear watchdog based in Vienna. He made it through the Nuclear Threat Initiative, a private group in Washington that he advises.

Sam Nunn, a former Democratic senator from Georgia and the group's chief executive, announced the $50 million pledge here, calling it a crucial step toward a new order that enhances peaceful aspects of atomic energy. "We are in a race between cooperation and catastrophe," he said, "and, at this moment, the outcome is unclear."

Mr. Nunn said a country's decision to import fuel, rather than make it indigenously, could pivot on whether the country can be guaranteed an assured supply.

"We believe that such a mechanism can be achieved," he said, "and that we must take urgent, practical steps to do so."

Mr. Buffett's pledge is contingent on two years of developments in which the nuclear agency moves to establish the fuel bank and one or more countries contribute an added $100 million or an equivalent amount in reactor fuel.

Mohamed ElBaradei, the director general of the international atomic agency, said Mr. Buffett's pledge "will provide urgent impetus to our efforts to establish mechanisms for nondiscriminatory, nonpolitical assurances of supply of fuel for nuclear power plants."

Laura Holgate, a vice president of the Nuclear Threat Initiative, said $150 million in fuel would represent less than 1 percent of that used globally each year, and would be enough to fuel a typical power reactor.

Buffett Offers $50 Million For Nuclear-Fuel Stockpile (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Billionaire investor Warren Buffett has offered to donate $50 million to help start a "last resort" international stockpile of nuclear-power-plant fuel for nations worried about sources of supply.

Mr. Buffett called it "an investment in a safer world" because it could encourage Iran and other nations to find alternatives to establishing their own expensive and risky uranium-enrichment programs. Enriching uranium to high levels produces an explosive metal that can be used to make nuclear weapons.

The proposal was welcomed by the head of the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna, the United Nations agency that would control the fuel stockpile. U.S. officials also supported the idea, which has been discussed since the U.S. launched its "Atoms for Peace" program in the early 1950s.

Former U.S. Sen. Sam Nunn, who announced the proposal and Mr. Buffett's financial backing in Vienna, said "we're at a stage now where a number of nations may be getting close to starting their own [nuclear] fuel cycles." The case of Iran is in the headlines, he noted, but other nations are worried about soaring costs of importing nuclear fuel for electricity generation and the possibility that political problems with supplier countries might shut down their nuclear-power plants.

Mr. Nunn said the terms of Mr. Buffett's donation require IAEA nations to contribute $100 million to help build the stockpile. The IAEA would set up and maintain the fuel reserve.

Uranium-enrichment programs are politically and strategically touchy. The process of enrichment, which concentrates the unstable uranium isotope U-235, can be used to make power-plant fuel, which is enriched to a level of about 4%. The same process, however, can also produce nuclear weapons materials if the enrichment goes above 90%.

Mohamed ElBaradei, director general of the IAEA, said he welcomed the "generosity" of Mr. Buffett. The reserve, he said, is "intended to be a mechanism of last resort" to assure nations that if they abide by their treaty obligations not to start nuclear-weapons programs, that they will always have access to nuclear fuel.

Currently, companies in the U.S. and five other nations supply the world's nuclear fuel. The international agency is also working with the companies on agreements that would provide buyer nations with an uninterrupted supply -- if they refrain from making nuclear weapons.

Group Pledges $50M For Nuclear Fuel (AP-Y)

By Ben Evans

AP, September 20, 2006

Billionaire investor Warren Buffett, CNN creator Ted Turner and former Sen. Sam Nunn pledged $50 million to the U.N.'s nuclear watchdog agency Tuesday to create a uranium stockpile.

The aim is to discourage countries from developing their own nuclear programs. The reserve would ensure supplies of low-grade fuel for nuclear power plants around the world. One example of a program they hope to discourage is in Iran, which critics fear is ultimately aimed at developing weapons.

The Washington-based Nuclear Threat Initiative is hoping its financial pledge to the International Atomic Energy Agency will prod governments into action on creating the stockpile. Buffett would provide the money, which is contingent on a $100 million match from IAEA member states.

"Under international law and under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, countries have the right to enrich nuclear fuel," Nunn, a Georgia Democratic senator from 1972 to 1996, said in a telephone interview from Vienna, where he announced the proposal at a 140-country IAEA annual conference. "If we have a lot more countries that do that — and we're on the threshold of that now — then it's going to be an extremely dangerous world."

"It's going to be very difficult to keep that weapons-grade material out of the hands of someone who might use it as a weapon, like a terrorist group," Nunn said.

Western leaders are currently locked in a standoff with Iran over its uranium enrichment, which the country says is for civilian power but that the United States and others warn is intended to make weapons.

Nunn said an international reserve might not have deterred Iran. But it would give the international community more leverage in addressing the situation, he said.

"It would certainly be a powerful tool in the hands of the international community, saying, 'You don't need your own nuclear fuel supply. You have this available,'" Nunn said.

Nunn, who founded the anti-proliferation group with Turner, said the State Department expressed support for the plan but that "there's a difference between welcoming it and putting up money." He acknowledged that rallying the international community around the proposal would be difficult.

A State Department spokeswoman said she could not immediately comment on the proposal.

With Premier At U.N., Thai Military Stages Coup (NYT)

By Seth Mydans And Thomas Fuller

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

BANGKOK, Wednesday, Sept. 20 — In Thailand's first coup in 15 years, military leaders seized control of Bangkok on Tuesday night, suspended the Constitution and declared martial law in the capital, effective immediately.

There were no reports of violence.

The moves came while Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra was in New York preparing to address the United Nations. He declared a state of emergency on Thai television, but was cut off in mid-speech. Later, he canceled his address to the General Assembly.

The coup, led by the army chief, Gen. Sondhi Boonyaratkalin, also "terminated" both houses of Parliament, the cabinet and the Constitutional Court.

The events on Tuesday returned Thailand to a time that most experts here thought was finally past, raising questions about the future of Thai democracy and the stability of a country that is a prime tourist destination with strong economic links to the West.

The coup came at the height of a drawn-out political crisis. In April, Mr. Thaksin was forced by huge street protests to step aside despite an overwhelming electoral mandate. In fact, though, he continued to lead the government and to wage political battles against his opponents.

After a long break, demonstrations against the prime minister had been due to resume this week, bringing with them the danger of violent clashes between his supporters and opponents.

Late Tuesday night, General Sondhi was shown on television in an audience with King Bhumibol Adulyadej, a clear indication that the highly revered constitutional monarch endorsed the move.

On a military-controlled television station, a general in civilian clothes said a "council of administrative reform" had seized power in the name of the king.

Speaking for General Sondhi, who has publicly feuded with the prime minister, Gen. Prapas Sakultanak said that the military did not intend to rule the country and that it would "hand power back to the people." He gave no timetable.

The military has a long history of political involvement, staging 18 coups since Thailand became a constitutional monarchy in 1932. The last one, in 1991, installed a military leader who was pushed from power by a popular uprising the next year.

Under heavy rain, tanks and armored personnel carriers took up positions blocking the entrance to the prime minister's office on Tuesday night. Other tanks arrived at government offices and major intersections. Witnesses reported that roadblocks had been set up on roads leading into the city. The streets were quiet, and even at the prime minister's office there was little tension. Some bystanders photographed one another standing near the tanks.

Kitichai Songkeattisi, 40, a commercial photographer, said: "The last time was much more intense. People were more afraid."

Mr. Thaksin is one of the most popular — and unpopular — prime ministers in recent Thai history. Thais' different viewpoints demonstrate a sharp social divide that he has played on during the crisis.

Mr. Thaksin's party, Thai Rak Thai, or Thais Love Thais, has won three elections by landslides, in 2001, 2005 and again in April. Because of his broad support among rural voters, he was widely expected to win any new election.

But as he has tightened his grip over much of the political scene, opposition to him has swelled among the elite, mostly in Bangkok. Public indignation rose after his family's tax-free sale of its $1.9 billion stake in a giant telecommunications company to a Singapore company.

On television, the military spokesman, General Prapas, accused Mr. Thaksin of corruption and constant interference with the legislature and the courts. He apologized to the public for any inconvenience caused by the coup.

DOJ_NMG_0066254

In an effort to end the demonstrations and reassert control, Mr. Thaksin called an early election in April, which he won in a landslide. But the opposition boycotted the vote and a court annulled the result, in a severe setback for the prime minister.

An election commission loyal to Mr. Thaksin set a new vote for Oct. 15, but its members were removed and jailed by a court for malfeasance. A new commission has said that election would be delayed.

The televised announcement on Tuesday was made after reports of large-scale military movements around the capital. The military has been sharply divided between officers loyal to the prime minister — some of them his relatives — and others who oppose him.

There has been tension over an impending military shuffle that would determine which faction would dominate.

Interviewed in New York by CNN soon after early reports of a coup, Deputy Prime Minister Surakiart Sathirathai said, "We hope that the situation should return to normal soon because the prime minister is constitutionally and legally elected prime minister and this is an elected government, so we have to do everything we can to uphold the principle of democracy."

General Prapas, speaking in Thailand, laid out the rationale for the military's move.

"The government's performance destroyed harmony in society," he said. "Everyone tried to win over each other, and the situation continued to worsen. Most people don't trust the government because there are many signs of corruption."

He said the prime minister had hobbled independent bodies created by the 1997 Constitution to provide checks and balances. A leading demand of the prime minister's opponents is the writing of a new constitution that would temper executive power.

General Prapas said many attempts had been made at compromise but had failed. "That is why we, the Party for the Reform of Governance under the Constitutional Democracy, which consists of the army commanders and national police commander, have to seize power."

He added: "We would like to insist that we have no intention of governing the country. We will return the power of constitutional monarchy back to Thai people as soon as possible to maintain peace and stability."

Thai Army Vows To Return Power To The People (FT)

By Amy Kazmin

Financial Times, September 20, 2006

Thai army chief General Sondhi Boonyaratkalin promised on Wednesday to return power to the people after the armed forces ousted Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra in a coup.

"The council has no intention to run the country by ourselves and will return power under the constitutional monarchy to the people as soon as possible," said General Sondhi, who spoke on national television flanked by four other leaders of the Political Reform Council that seized power Tuesday night.

General Sondhi said the ousted government was tainted with corruption and cronyism.

"The reform council that consists of the Armed Forces Supreme Commander, the chiefs of the armed forces, and the chief of police jointly took the view that rule by the caretaker government created extreme divisions in the Thai society as never seen before," he said.

"The government's rule was widely tainted with corruption and to benefit cronies. Letting that situation continue could have hurt the nation's security and economy.''

General Sondhi sat beside military leaders including Supreme Commander Ruangroj Mahasaranon, Royal Thai Navy Chief Sathiraphan Keyanont, and Royal Thai Air Force Chief Chalit Pukbhasuk, as well as the country's police chief.

"We have seized power. The constitution, the Senate, the House of Representatives, the Cabinet and the Constitutional Court have all been terminated," the army chief said.

"We agreed that the caretaker prime minister has caused an unprecedented rift in society, widespread corruption, nepotism, and interfered in independent agencies, crippling them so they cannot function," he said. "If the caretaker government is allowed to govern it will hurt the country.

"They have also repeatedly insulted the king. Thus the council needed to seize power to control the situation, to restore normalcy and to create unity as soon as possible."

A military spokesman said earlier that General Sondhi, who is said to be close to the country's revered King Bhumibol Adulyadej, would serve as acting prime minister.

The dramatic developments marked the culmination of a year of political turmoil reflecting deep divisions in Thai society over the leadership of Mr Thaksin, a billionaire telecommunications tycoon who is revered by the rural poor but disliked by urban residents.

With Mr Thaksin in New York for the UN General Assembly, tanks surrounded Government House, took control of television stations and announced martial law – the latest in a long series of military intervention in Thai political life, but the first in 15 years. A military spokesman said troops had met no resistance, and the coup appeared to be bloodless.

From New York Mr Thaksin, who won a landslide re-election victory in 2005, had declared a state of emergency in Bangkok, after rumours of an imminent coup swept the city. He ordered troops "not to move illegally".

After the announcement that the military had taken power, a spokesman for Mr Thaksin's administration said they were "still in control". However, analysts said the coup-makers appeared to have their grip firmly on the reins of power.

DOJ_NMG_0066255

The Thai ambassador to Washington, Virasakdi Futrakul, said Mr Thaksin was preparing to leave the United States following the coup, after cancelling plans to give a speech at the UN General Assembly. He did not say where the prime minister would go.

Tom Kruesopon, a member of ruling party and an advisor to Mr Thaksin, said "the prime minister has not given up his power. He is not seeking asylum."

Mr Kruesopon said he believed Mr Thaksin could make a stopover in London, where he has family and a home. He still has an official plane at his disposal in New York.

Government offices, banks and the stock market were closed in Thailand on Wednesday. In offshore trade, the baht weakened on the political uncertainty. The currency dropped 1.2 per cent to 37.72 to the dollar at around 9:00 am in Bangkok from 37.26 in late Asia trade Tuesday. Fitch Ratings and Standard & Poor's put Thailand's credit ratings on review for possible downgrade.

Some businesses were shuttered in Bangkok, and foreign car manufacturers such as Japan's Nissan Motor Co, one of hundreds of investors in Thailand's export-driven economy, said they had halted operations for a day. However, the city remained calm and quiet, with Bangkok's notorious traffic jams alleviated by the holiday announcement.

Thailand's military has a history of coups, but many Thais had though such interventions to be largely a thing of the past. However, the Thai army has been bitterly divided over Mr Thaksin's leadership.

Long-simmering public resentment in Bangkok over his authoritarian style boiled over into mass demonstrations in January. In a bid to defuse tensions, Mr Thaksin called an election. However, the opposition parties boycotted the April polls, which were subsequently annulled.

Fresh elections, in which the opposition had already agreed to participate, were expected take place in the second half of November.

Thai Coup Sparks Condemnation, Unease (AP)

By Rod Mcguirk, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 20, 2006

The military overthrow of Thai Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra and the declaration of martial law in the Southeast Asian nation triggered condemnation, unease and uncertainty in Asian nations.

Governments across the Asia-Pacific region issued warnings to their citizens to rethink traveling to Thailand, a major tourist center, where tanks and troops now lined the streets of the capital, Bangkok.

Japan, Australia and New Zealand demanded a quick restoration of civilian rule.

"To see democracy destroyed in that way is a matter for grave concern to us," Australia's Foreign Minister Alexander Downer said. "It's unacceptable for the military just to overthrow a government in this way."

New Zealand also decried the military overthrow, with Prime Minister Helen Clark saying: "New Zealand condemns any process which seeks to overturn a government by unconstitutional and undemocratic means,"

Japan's Foreign Minister Taro Aso called the coup regrettable.

"We strongly hope the situation returns to normal and democracy is restored as soon as possible," Aso said.

The coup occurred without bloodshed after months of political turmoil and sharp criticism that Thaksin had eroded Thailand's democracy.

"It's really too early to form any hardened judgments," Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill told The Associated Press in Washington. U.S. State Department said officials "are monitoring the situation with concern."

Coup Attempt In Thailand (WT/AP)

By Grant Peck, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 20, 2006

2:34 p.m.

BANGKOK -- The Thai military initiated a coup against Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra today, circling his offices with tanks, seizing control of TV stations and declaring a provisional authority pledging loyalty to the king.

An announcement on Thai television declared that a Council of Administrative Reform with King Bhumibol Adulyadej as head of state had seized power in Bangkok and nearby provinces without any resistance.

A convoy of four tanks rigged with loudspeakers and sirens rolled through a busy commercial district warning people to get off the street for their own safety.

A senior military official, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the situation, said the army´s commander in chief, Gen. Sondhi Boonyaratkalin, had used the military to take over power from the prime minister.

Mr. Thaksin has faced calls to step down amid accusations of corruption and abuse of power.

DOJ_NMG_0066256

Massive rallies earlier this year forced Mr. Thaksin to dissolve parliament and call an election in April, three years ahead of schedule. The vote was boycotted by opposition parties and later annulled by Thailand's top courts, leaving the country without a working legislature.

Mr. Thaksin's Thai Rak Thai Party twice won landslide election victories, in 2001 and 2005, and had been expected to win the next vote on Oct. 15, bolstered by its widespread support in the country's rural areas.

In 1992, demonstrators against a military strongman were gunned down before the king stepped in to end the fighting and usher in a period of stability.

Mr. Thaksin had said yesterday that he might step down as leader of the country after upcoming elections but that he would remain at the helm of his party, despite calls for him to give up the post.

Tonight, several hundred soldiers were deployed at government installations and major intersections in the capital of Bangkok.

Army-owned TV Channel 5 interrupted regular broadcasts with patriotic music and showed pictures of the king. At least some radio and television stations monitored in Bangkok suspended programming.

The cable television station of the Nation newspaper reported that tanks were parked at the Ratchadamnoen Road and royal plaza close to the royal palace and government offices.

"The prime minister, with the approval of the Cabinet, declares serious emergency law in Bangkok from now on," Mr. Thaksin said on Channel 9 from New York. He said he was ordering the transfer of the nation's army chief to work in the prime minister's office, effectively suspending him from his military duties.

Mr. Thaksin's critics want to jettison his policies promoting privatization, free-trade agreements and CEO-style administration.

Opposition to Mr. Thaksin gained momentum in January when his family announced it had sold its controlling stake in the telecommunications company Shin Corp. to Singapore's state-owned Temasek Holdings for a tax-free $1.9 billion. Critics say the sale involved insider trading and complain that a key national asset is now in foreign hands.

Thai Army Leaders Depose Prime Minister (WP)

By Ron Corben

The Washington Post, September 20, 2006

BANGKOK, Sept. 20 -- Thai army leaders deposed Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra, a longtime ally of President Bush, using tanks and soldiers to seize the capital Tuesday night without firing a shot. The coup was the first in 15 years in a country where many people believed that military seizures of power were a thing of the past.

Thaksin was in New York, attending the opening of the U.N. General Assembly, when soldiers surrounded Government House, his office, at about 10:30 p.m. He declared a state of emergency by telephone, but his announcement, carried on television, was cut off midway and had no discernible effect as army units seized key facilities in a light rain.

Thaksin canceled a planned address to the General Assembly. On Tuesday night, he remained secluded in a New York hotel, with some sources saying he would leave for an undisclosed location, probably not Thailand.

Bush has made the spread of democratic rule abroad a key theme of his administration. It remained unclear what response the U.S. government would take to the overthrow of an elected figure whom Bush called a "very capable leader" in 2003. In recent months, White House officials have been distancing themselves from Thaksin.

"We look to the Thai people to resolve their political differences in a peaceful manner and in accord with the principles of democracy and rule of law," said Fred Jones, spokesman for the National Security Council.

In Thailand, announcements on state-run television signed by the coup leader, Gen. Sonthi Boonyaratkalin, commander in chief of the army, said that martial law had been declared across Thailand and that the 1997 constitution had been revoked.

On Wednesday, in his first public appearance since seizing power, Sonthi asked for the public's support and declared the coup was necessary to end serious conflicts within Thai society that Thaksin had created, the Associated Press reported.

Delivering a television address in front of portraits of Thailand's king and queen, Sonthi said the coup leaders had no intention of retaining power. He was flanked by chiefs of the three armed services and the head of the national police.

The stock exchange was to be closed Wednesday, along with schools, banks and government offices.

Thaksin, a former senior police official who built a fortune in the telecommunications industry, has faced street protests for much of the year over allegations of corruption, abuse of power and a bungling response to a Muslim insurgency. Many military officers contended that he was trying to interfere with promotions and postings in the armed forces.

Opponents of the prime minister cheered the coup; some of them turned out in the early morning to greet soldiers sitting atop tanks parked on Bangkok streets. Thaksin is widely popular in rural Thailand, where most of the population lives, and there was little immediate response from those communities.

Sonthi and other coup leaders are close to Thailand's deeply revered King Bhumibol Adulyadej. What role, if any, the monarch played in the takeover was unknown. Some of the coup soldiers sported cloths of yellow, the royal color, and gun barrels in an attempt to signal they were acting in support of the king.

Reports said coup leaders had met with the king in his palace. In past political crises, a few words from the king, the world's longest-reigning monarch, have dramatically turned the course of events.

Panitan Wattanayagorn, a political scientist, said he had been fearful in the initial hours that troops loyal to Thaskin might fight back. Concerns of bloodshed subsided as no such opposition appeared.

Army TV gave the first sign that something was afoot when it began broadcasting patriotic songs and images of the king.

The army spokesman, Col. Akarat Chitroj, told the AP that Sonthi would serve as prime minister.

But a government spokesman denied that Thaksin was no longer head of the government. "At this moment, he is still the prime minister. I just talked to a senior party member and everyone confirms that Thaksin is still prime minister," Susasanee Nakpong told the Associated Press.

In New York, Deputy Prime Minister Surakiart Sathirathai condemned the coup. Thaksin "is constitutionally and legally elected prime minister," he told CNN. "And this is an elected government. . . . If there's going to be any change, it has to be through the democratic means, and we have upcoming elections anyway in November, so we should listen to the voice of the people."

The coup is the 18th successful or attempted military takeover in Thailand since the country became a constitutional monarchy in 1932. But in the 1990s, the military stepped back from this role as democratic institutions began to take root in the country.

As recently as this weekend, Thaksin denied that a coup was in the making. "As far as I know, there's no such movement for the time being," he told a gathering in Finland, according to the Nation newspaper.

Thaksin and his Thais Love Thais party won a resounding victory in 2005 elections, securing 374 of 500 seats in the House of Representatives. But he soon found himself in a political crisis.

Street protests that had begun with a murmur late last year found voice in January after Thaksin's family sold its shares in Shin Corp., a telecommunications and satellite company, to Singapore's Temasak Holdings for $1.9 billion, tax-free.

Thaksin sought to counter demands for his resignation by calling early elections in April, only to see them boycotted by the opposition parties. Eventually, King Bhumibol called on the courts to "clear up the mess," and the judges nullified the vote.

Sen. Kraisak Choonhavan, whose late father, Gen. Chatichai Choonhavan, was ousted as prime minister in the last successful coup in 1991, said the new takeover was "unfortunate . . . but it seems as if it was inevitable. And I think the key to understand in this event is probably Mr. Thaksin wants to take out the existing military hierarchy altogether and put his men in and have total control of Thailand."

Thaksin had been hoping that a recent military reshuffle and series of promotions would strengthen his hand, analysts said.

The military administrative council says it does not intend to hold on to power but will press ahead with general elections, possibly this year.

In an announcement on state TV, it said the army and national police had taken over Bangkok and the surrounding area to maintain peace and order. "There has been no struggle. We ask for the cooperation of the public and ask your pardon for the inconvenience," it said.

Coup Ousting Thailand's Premier Tests Democracy In Key U.S. Ally (WSJ)

By James Hookway, Patrick Barta And Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

An apparent coup in Thailand raises serious questions about the stability of a key U.S. ally in Asia that until recently had served as an anchor of democracy and investment in the region.

Amid a tropical downpour late yesterday in Bangkok, tanks moved on key government offices and television stations in the Thai capital and seized command of the city while the country's caretaker prime minister, Thaksin Shinawatra, was traveling in New York. Government-run television stations said the armed forces and the police had taken control of the country, and a statement signed by the Thai army's commander in chief imposed martial law.

The seemingly bloodless coup, the outcome of which still is unclear, underscored longstanding questions about who runs Thailand, a country of 65 million people that is a favorite of Western tourists and companies despite its opaque governance. Thailand is known as a parliamentary democracy, and early this decade Mr. Thaksin became the first civilian prime minister to complete his term.

Many analysts believe the country still relies heavily on the powers of an aging and elusive king who is repeatedly invoked as the only true source of political legitimacy there. Whether the king played any role in the attempted change in government was unclear. A return to military rule would unwind years of progress toward a stable democracy.

Mr. Thaksin cancelled a speech he was scheduled to deliver at the United Nations last night. His spokesman, Surapong Suebwonglee, who was with Mr. Thaksin in New York, said the coup leaders "cannot succeed" and was confident the coup would fail "because democracy in Thailand has developed to some...measure of maturity." But in an interview with The Wall Street Journal on Monday, just hours before the coup began, Mr. Thaksin indicated the opposite, saying Thai democracy "is very young -- the system is not mature." He seemed relaxed and unfazed by rumors of a coup that were then swirling.

"I know there are those who really support me and those who are against me," Mr. Thaksin said.

As the coup unfolded, at least a dozen tanks surrounded Government House, Mr. Thaksin's office, but later withdrew. Thai television showed a motorcade of generals traveling along rain-slick streets to brief King Bhumibol Adulyadej on their coup. Other stations followed by broadcasting only patriotic music and announcements from the coup group. Many Thais that didn't turn on their televisions remained unaware that anything had even happened when they went to sleep last night.

The outcome of the latest power struggle is of vital importance to investors and Western governments. Although Thailand no longer is among the world's fastest-growing economies -- as it was in the 1980s -- it has emerged as an important staging ground for Western companies that don't want to place all their bets on China. This includes the world's largest auto makers, including Ford Motor Co., General Motors Corp. and Japan's Toyota Motor Corp., all of which have made the country a vital production platform.

Thailand's currency, the baht, suffered its biggest one-day weakening in three years yesterday. A large devaluation of the baht helped trigger the Asian financial crisis of 1997, highlighting Thailand's importance in the region, though many analysts believe Asia's economy is far healthier now, limiting any potential economic fallout. Thailand's stock exchange was scheduled to be closed today, along with schools, banks and government offices, the Associated Press reported. (See related article3.)

Thailand also is viewed as a critical hub in the U.S.-led war on terror. The American Embassy in Bangkok remains one of the largest U.S. missions in the world. The U.S. and Thailand run a joint counter-terrorism training center on the outskirts of Bangkok, called the International Law Enforcement Agency, which has been central to the Bush administration's efforts to combat Islamic extremism in the region.

Joint Thai and U.S. operations were successful in tracing suspected terrorist Riduan Isamuddin, also known as Hambali, to the city of Ayuthaya in central Thailand, where they arrested him in 2003. Mr. Isamuddin was a central suspect in the planning of the Bali, Indonesia, bombing of 2002 that killed more than 200 people.

The Bush administration said it was concerned about the military takeover and hoped for a democratic solution. "We continue to hope that the Thai people will resolve their political differences in accord with democratic principles and the rule of law," said U.S. State Department spokeswoman Nancy Beck.

The apparent coup came after nearly a year of political unrest in which Thais took to the streets to protest a government they increasingly viewed as corrupt and ineffective.

Protesters had a number of complaints about Mr. Thaksin, including his inability to settle an armed and violent separatist movement in the country's south. They also were upset over allegations of corruption related to his family's $1.9 billion sale of a telecommunications company to Singaporean investors this year. The sale was arranged in such a way that enabled the family to avoid paying taxes on the transaction.

The sale enraged many Thais. Many already had accused Mr. Thaksin, one of Thailand's richest men, of abusing his power in government to boost his wealth and weaken democratic institutions, including the country's courts.

Mr. Thaksin dissolved the government and called a new election in April to restore his mandate. Key opposition parties boycotted the vote amid continued street protests, and the country seemed rudderless until the king questioned the validity of the April election in a public address, calling on courts to settle the issue.

Thai courts subsequently invalidated the results, in which Mr. Thaksin's Thai Rak Thai party won the majority of seats in Parliament. Mr. Thaksin subsequently took the role of caretaker prime minister pending a new election that was expected later this year. A number of analysts of Thailand believed Mr. Thaksin's party would again win the national elections, possibly explaining the timing of the Thai military's move.

Mr. Thaksin, who has served as Thailand's leader since 2001, remains extremely popular with many Thais, especially in rural areas, for a series of populist measures that included cash payouts to small villages and subsidized health care.

He also gained favor with foreign investors by promoting an economic program to boost Thailand's economy in the face of growing competition from China. This program, which many economists viewed as a template for other, similar countries dealing with the rise of China, included efforts to privatize state companies, to negotiate free-trade pacts with other countries, including the U.S. and Japan, and to authorize large investments in new infrastructure.

Many of those initiatives -- including some of the free-trade deals -- have languished this year while the government was paralyzed by political stalemate. Meanwhile, many Thais believe the king and his supporters were disenchanted with Mr. Thaksin's attempts to aggressively consolidate his power.

Political analysts say the tacit support of King Bhumibol is necessary for any individual or group that aspires to govern Thailand. The 78-year-old monarch has frequently played a political role, implicitly signing off on military coups at times, most notably in 1976, and intervening to ensure the return of civilian governments, as in 1992.

His annual birthday speeches are carefully examined in Bangkok. In 2002, he published a biography of his favorite pet dog, a stray mongrel rescued from the streets of Bangkok, that was widely interpreted as a warning that Thailand shouldn't abandon its traditional values in a quickly modernizing world.

It is considered inappropriate for Thais to speak publicly about the king's possible role in politics, and on Monday, Mr. Thaksin denied suggestions that the king was involved in any of the recent political dramas.

"One should not bring him into politics," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0066259

Nevertheless, in June Mr. Thaksin said a "charismatic person" was out to remove him from his job as prime minister. Mr. Thaksin went on to say that a mysterious figure whom he refused to name was "wielding extraconstitutional force" to push him from office.

Most Thais assumed that to mean the king or his chief lieutenant, Gen. Prem Tinsulanonda. By appearing to attack the monarch and his supporters, Mr. Thaksin escalated the economically damaging political conflict into a contest between Thailand's royal and military traditions, and a new, more modern way of governing a rapidly industrializing country.

King Bhumibol's advisers struck back with a show of force. Donning his military uniform, chief adviser Gen. Prem toured army camps around the country warning soldiers that their loyalty is to the king, not Mr. Thaksin.

Other people seen as close to the royal palace gave prominent speeches in recent weeks that were interpreted as critical of Mr. Thaksin's push to modernize the Thai economy and open it up to more foreign investment.

Seizing on that sentiment, local shopkeepers across the country have petitioned the king and the government in recent weeks to block big foreign-owned hypermarkets, such as Tesco PLC of the U.K. and Carrefour SA of France, that are sprouting up across Thailand and taking away their business.

These tensions came to a boiling point last night. An announcement on Thai television declared that a "Council of Administrative Reform" with King Bhumibol as head of state had seized power in Bangkok and nearby provinces without any resistance.

A separate announcement on national television, signed by Army Commander in Chief Gen. Sondhi Boonyaratkalin, said martial law had been declared across Thailand and the country's 1997 Constitution revoked. The general, a Muslim in the overwhelmingly Buddhist country, ordered all troops to report to their duty stations and not leave without permission from their commanders.

"The armed forces commander and the national police commander have successfully taken over Bangkok and the surrounding area in order to maintain peace and order. There has been no struggle," the announcement said.

The military coup didn't meet any initial resistance in Bangkok, although it wasn't clear whether there were any confrontations elsewhere in Thailand.

Mr. Thaksin tried to put the brakes on the coup before it took effect. He telephoned a Thai television station from New York to declare a state of emergency and ordered Gen. Sondhi to report to Mr. Thaksin's deputy, effectively stripping Gen. Sondhi of his power. After 10 minutes, Mr. Thaksin's voice cut off.

A spokesman for the coup, retired Lt. Gen. Prapart Sakuntanak said on Thai television that the power grab was temporary and that power soon would be returned to the people. Some observers said they suspected the military doesn't want to control the country, only to remove Mr. Thaksin.

"Never in Thai history have the people been so divided," Lt. Gen. Prapart said. "The majority of people had become suspicious of this administration, which is running the country through rampant corruption. Independent bodies have been interfered with so much they could not perform within the spirit of the constitution."

A U.S. official who has worked on Thai issues added that the White House would be inclined to take a relatively aggressive stance against a Thai coup, due to President Bush's stated commitment to promoting democracy in the Middle East and Asia. "We're trying to build democracy around the world, and we're just going to stand by" while there are tanks on the streets? the official said. "You could imagine the snickering in the region."

Some officials working on Thailand worry that the Bush administration, absorbed with crises in Lebanon and Iraq, didn't offer signals early enough that Washington would be opposed to a coup. Now, they say, the White House will likely have to work aggressively through the Thai monarchy to restore the democratic process, though they note that it might be too late for Mr. Thaksin's government.

Weathering Thailand's Storm (WSJ)

By Karen Richardson

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

Uncertainty over the outcome of an apparent military coup in Thailand is likely to roil Thai stocks during the next few days, though analysts said it is unlikely to spill over into other major Asian markets.

As tanks and troops surrounded government offices in the Thai capital of Bangkok last night -- part of an effort to oust Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra -- foreign investors in the Southeast Asian country said they hoped for a smooth and swift resolution to the crisis. "Unless we have a tremendous amount of clarity, that first trading session is likely to be very sloppy and very volatile," said Uri Landesman, senior portfolio manager of a $300 million fund that invests globally at ING Investment Management in New York. It wasn't clear when trading would resume, however, as the armed forces declared Wednesday a government, bank and market "holiday."

The main SET index closed 0.47% lower at 702.56 yesterday before the coup. The SET is home to Bangkok Bank and Siam Cement, mainstays of many foreign portfolios invested in Thailand.

A rout in Thai stocks is unlikely to significantly affect the portfolios of international emerging-market investors who construct their portfolios to hew closely to the Morgan Stanley Capital International Emerging Markets Index, which is widely used by emerging-market fund managers. Thailand makes up 1.65% of that index.

The country's baht currency -- the devaluation of which helped send Asia into financial turmoil in 1997 -- fell in its biggest one-day decline in three years, weighing on other Asian currencies. The baht weakened to 37.764 from 37.286 against the dollar.

Emerging-market bonds were slightly rattled by the news. Thailand's $2.1 billion in investment-grade sovereign debt makes up just 0.21% of the J.P. Morgan Emerging Markets Bond Global Diversified Index, widely used as a benchmark by professional investors. Fitch Ratings said it was reviewing the country's triple-B-plus foreign-currency debt rating for possible downgrade in light of the coup, but added Thailand has enough foreign-exchange reserves to handle "any shocks that may come."

Investors and traders didn't panic much. Credit-default swaps -- derivatives that provide insurance against the risk of bond defaults -- became more costly on news of the coup, jumping to $65,000 to protect against a default on $10 million of Thailand's sovereign bonds during the next five years from $37,000 yesterday morning. Later, the price retreated to $53,000, according to data from J.P. Morgan. "A coup is about as common there as an election is here," said Mr. Landesman of ING, who noted some 18 coups have occurred in Thailand in the past 75 years.

Aided by strong economic expansion driven by robust exports, consumer spending and foreign investment, Thai government coffers and Thai companies' balance sheets have strengthened since the Asian financial crisis. In the 1990s, Thailand and other Asian economies had large current-account deficits and exchange rates pegged to the U.S. dollar. These factors encouraged external borrowing, and led to high exposure by local companies and governments to foreign-exchange risk. When U.S. interest rates jumped, money swept out of Asian currencies, stocks and other assets, leaving their currencies devalued, stock markets in shambles and real estate near worthless.

"The last nine years have seen the emerging markets change their governance at both the corporate and government level," said Larry Smith, chief investment officer of Third Wave Global Investors LLC, which manages about $400 million in Greenwich, Conn. While Thai companies had poor financial governance and management before, now they are "in the business of making money," he said, adding that the return on equity for Thai stocks hovers at about 20% -- in the high end for emerging markets. Unlike the country's financial crisis in 1997, "I don't see the coup creating any type of contagion or systemic risk that's going to have an impact on other regions," he said.

Western investors in Thailand expect the coup to be positive for the market in the long term, particularly if it is bloodless and receives the blessing of Thailand's King Bhumibol Adulyadej. Mr. Landesman expects the Thai stock market to rally as much as 15% following a smooth transition of power.

Mr. Thaksin has come under fire by critics for cronyism and unpredictable government policies. Thailand has been run by a caretaker government since Mr. Thaksin in the first quarter dissolved Parliament for elections, which were held April 2. The results of the vote later were annulled because of irregularities. Free-trade talks with Japan and the U.S. are on hold until a new government can be elected.

Other Market Activity

European shares closed lower as long-term worries about interest rates offset short-term relief generated by tepid U.S. inflation data. Asian markets were flat ahead of today's U.S. Federal Reserve meeting.

In LONDON, the FTSE 100 index fell 58.40 points, or 1%, to 5831.80. Nuclear-power operator British Energy tumbled 8.3% after a warning about falling output.

In TOKYO, the Nikkei Stock Average edged up 7.35 points, or 0.1%,to 15874.28 following a three-day weekend. Hitachi dropped 2.3% after issuing a profit warning.

A Retrograde Coup In Thailand (NYT)

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

"Political troubles should be solved by politicians," the chief of Thailand's army wisely declared last March. "Military coups are a thing of the past." Regrettably, Gen. Sondhi Boonyaratkalin changed his mind yesterday, launching a coup against the prime minister, Thaksin Shinawatra, who was in New York, preparing to address the United Nations.

Mr. Thaksin, in power since 2001, has been a high-handed and controversial leader. Corruption charges swirl around his government and his multibillion-dollar family business empire. He has tried to muzzle press critics. And his inflammatory mishandling of a Muslim separatist campaign in the south has killed more than 1,000 civilians.

But removing him from office is a decision that belongs to Thailand's voters, not an ambitious army general. They would have had a chance to make that decision soon.

Mr. Thaksin won decisive electoral victories in 2001 and 2005. Balloting earlier this year was boycotted by the opposition and later declared invalid by the courts. Arrangements for a new vote were being worked out when the army intervened.

Military power grabs have punctuated Thailand's recent history, and none have left the country better off. The best thing General Sondhi could do now is recall his wise words of six months ago and return power to the constitutional civilian leadership.

Turmoil In Thailand (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0066261

THERE HAD BEEN 17 MILITARY COUPS in Thailand since its absolute monarchy was abolished in 1932. Number 18 occurred Tuesday, when soldiers circled the offices of Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra with tanks, seized TV stations and declared martial law. The military claimed to be acting on behalf of the popular monarch, King Bhumibol Adulyadej.

Thaksin was in New York at the time to attend a session of the United Nations, and his future as Thai leader is now seriously in doubt. The coup could also jeopardize the recent stability and economic prosperity across Southeast Asia, traditionally among the most volatile regions in the world. Thailand has been an anchor to that stability, but now the restive foes of Thaksin are taking a huge step backward. It would be in the best interest of the country if its monarch took a page from the Spanish playbook and came out against the coup — as King Juan Carlos I did in 1981 — if he is free to do so.

Thaksin, a billionaire media mogul, is very popular in the rural north but widely despised in Bangkok. The first democratically-elected Thai prime minister to serve a full four-year term, he was first elected in 2001 and easily reelected in 2005. But urban voters, dissatisfied with Thaksin's control of the media, manipulation of democratic institutions, mishandling of a Muslim insurgency and other issues, held frequent protests against his regime.

Thaksin responded by holding snap elections in April, and won once again. But the election was boycotted by the minority party, leaving 38 parliamentary seats unfilled, and Thaksin wisely decided to step down. Then, after the courts declared the April election invalid, Thaksin returned to work as "caretaker" prime minister in a country without a parliament, while new elections were scheduled for this fall.

Thaksin bears some blame for his government's downfall. Had he made it clear that he wouldn't seek the premiership after the coming elections, opposition and turmoil in Bangkok would have died down. Had he not tried to interfere with military decisions, he wouldn't have created the fury among army leaders that may have prompted them to take action.

The coup could produce deep uncertainty at best and violent uprisings at worst, and it may threaten economies throughout the region. That's a heavy price to pay for one man's refusal to cede power and a refusal by his people to accept a concept taken for granted in more mature democracies: Sometimes in free elections, your side loses.

Paulson Spends Much Of Debut On World Stage Defending The U.S. (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

HANGZHOU, China, Sept. 19 — In his debut on the international stage, Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. faced three days of criticism and concern that the United States' fiscal and current-account deficits were casting a shadow over the global economy.

The issue of "global imbalances" came up again and again in Singapore in the language of speaker after speaker, as well as in the communiqué of the Group of 7 as its members conferred at the annual meeting of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund.

Mr. Paulson, who arrived in Hangzhou on Tuesday to meet local entrepreneurs before traveling to Beijing on Wednesday, did not seem bothered by the criticism. Economic relations between countries are "never easy," he said Monday.

In office a little more than two months, Mr. Paulson gamely made the arguments in response. He said the current-account deficit — nearly 7 percent of the United States economy — was a sign of strength, not weakness, because American consumers were buying global goods and keeping the world prosperous.

While Mr. Paulson acknowledged to reporters that the United States had room to improve, he saw its deficits as part of a bigger picture and part of a problem of imbalances in other countries.

"The U.S. has for a good number of years now been growing much faster than the major developed trading partners, Europe and Japan," he said, suggesting that as a faster-growing country, the United States would import more. "We've got a low savings rate, and it is a problem in the U.S." He also said the United States could "do more on deficits."

But he said that for the imbalances to ease, Japan, China and Europe had to "get the kind of growth on the consumption side that's going to make a difference."

He refused to blame the policies of the Bush administration for the global problems. The United States is able to borrow heavily from around the world, he said, because investors regard United States debt instruments as secure and United States policies, like maintaining tax cuts, as sound.

As for the nation's budget deficit, Mr. Paulson said it was coming down, citing recent revenue figures. For the future, he promised that he would personally help the Bush administration tackle the exploding costs of Medicare, Social Security and Medicaid in the next two years.

And to those in Singapore who said the United States was saving too little, Mr. Paulson said China was saving too much.

He did not say any of these things in a combative way. He sought to parry the criticism of American policies by suggesting that all countries, not just the United States, needed to put their houses in order.

Others echoed that theme, as when Jean-Claude Trichet, president of the European Central Bank, said at a news conference that all the participants in Singapore had "homework" to do to avert threats to the world economy.

The homework that Europe needs to do, Mr. Paulson said, is structural reform, like lifting regulations, taxes and labor restrictions that will allow business to grow and import more.

DOJ_NMG_0066262

His prescription for China was similar. In addition to saving less and consuming more, Mr. Paulson said, China needs to deregulate its economy and, most important, let the value of its currency fluctuate against the dollar and the euro, so that a new balance could be struck in which Chinese exports are more expensive and China imports more.

In addition to criticism of the United States current account and budget deficits, Mr. Paulson heard complaints about American trade policies and Washington's responsibility for disputed practices at the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund.

By all accounts, Mr. Paulson, who took office in July, moved comfortably in Singapore. Many of his counterparts were friends from his years as the head of Goldman Sachs.

He also seemed to understand that when representatives of 184 countries get together, criticism of the United States is often what most of them can agree on. This time the criticism seemed especially focused, but at the same time a main worry was that the United States economy might slow, imperiling the future for everyone else.

"I am not looking for any immediate solutions or quick fixes to any particular economic issue," Mr. Paulson said in Singapore. "I'm looking to set a tone and an expectation of working through issues and making progress."

On trade, the Suntec Center in Singapore, where thousands of officials gathered, echoed with calls for leadership to revive the world trade negotiations that collapsed this summer. But most delegates aimed their appeals at the United States, over its refusal to offer more concessions to revive the talks.

Even a revolt among board members at the World Bank over the anticorruption campaign of its president, Paul D. Wolfowitz, reflected many bank officials' resentment at President Bush for choosing Mr. Wolfowitz, an architect of the Iraq war, to lead the institution.

A leader in the fight against Mr. Wolfowitz's policies, for instance, was a close associate of Gordon Brown, the British chancellor of the exchequer and a likely successor to Prime Minister Tony Blair. Bank officials said Mr. Brown seemed to be trying to show that, presumably unlike Mr. Blair, he could stand up to Washington.

But Mr. Paulson did leave with a major victory. The Singapore gathering demonstrated that the United States had successfully rallied the world's economic players around a policy of trying to expand China's influence in the institutions that oversee the world economy, like the International Monetary Fund, and in pressing China to be a more responsible player on economic issues.

Paulson Seeks To Build On Ties During China Visit (WSJ)

By Michael M. Phillips And Andrew Browne

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson's first meeting after arriving in China yesterday was with Xi Jinping, the Communist Party secretary for Zhejiang Province.

It wasn't because Mr. Xi is a national political figure, although Mr. Paulson considers him a rising star in a province that is an aggressive exporter to the U.S. It was because when the two met in New York City a few months ago, Mr. Paulson -- then chief executive of Goldman Sachs Group Inc. -- promised he'd drop by.

At Goldman, Mr. Paulson believed the key to doing business in China was building long-term relationships. At Treasury, he believes the same thing, putting his contacts to work for the U.S. government on an agenda that ranges from protecting American companies' intellectual property to trying to convince Beijing to relax its grip on the exchange value of the yuan. "These things generally take a bit of compromise, generally take patience and generally take listening as well as talking. And in the case of China it takes a process where you're talking to all of the right people," Mr. Paulson said before arriving in the garden city Hangzhou.

"I told you I would come," Mr. Paulson said as Mr. Xi greeted him at a lakeside guesthouse.

Treasury officials have long found Chinese decision-making opaque, as they struggled to figure out which bureaucrats and politicians really influence policy. They hope Mr. Paulson -- who made some 70 trips to China as an investment banker, tourist and environmental activist -- will bring Treasury something close to an insider's view.

The secretary himself drew up the list of people he wanted to see. Among them was President Hu Jintao, whom Mr. Paulson is slated to meet in Beijing this week -- something of a coup for a cabinet secretary in a protocol-conscious country. He was scheduled to meet, as well, with Finance Minister Jin Renqing and Ma Kai, head of the National Development and Reform Commission, which sets China's energy policy.

Also on his schedule is Beijing Mayor Wang Qishan, who bonded with Mr. Paulson during the 2003 SARS crisis. The previous mayor had been fired for covering up the epidemic, and Mr. Wang took the job, desperate to show Beijing was safe. He asked Mr. Paulson if he would be willing to help out -- by making a public visit to the city. Mr. Paulson immediately got on a plane to China.

Mr. Paulson has a proven record in doing business with China. He helped pull off a coup in 2004 with an innovative plan that enabled Goldman Sachs to get around strict ownership rules and establish control over a full-service Chinese brokerage firm and investment bank. No other foreign investment bank has managed to achieve that.

The argument he used to clinch the deal, according to people familiar with the situation, was that it was in China's best interests because Goldman would help raise standards in a securities industry Beijing is striving to clean up.

DOJ_NMG_0066263

That's the tack U.S. officials have taken with China for some time. They argue that by allowing more flexibility in the yuan's exchange rate, Beijing will give itself more leeway to adjust interest rates and control its own economy. The Chinese government is now struggling to rein in investment that is leading to runaway growth and threatening another boom-bust cycle.

Mr. Paulson's comments on the yuan so far have been measured.

But having barely set foot in China, Mr. Paulson was already coming under pressure to speed things along. "Secretary Paulson's repeated efforts to lowball expectations just before beginning negotiations with the Chinese represent a major tactical and strategic mistake," U.S. Business and Industry Council President Kevin L. Kearns said in a written release yesterday. "His claims that Chinese reforms 'will take time,' and his criticisms of 'quick fixes,' inevitably tell Beijing that it can keep stonewalling with impunity."

Sens. Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat, and Lindsey Graham, a Republican from South Carolina, have asked for a Senate vote on a bill that would impose 27.5% tariffs on all imports from China, in retaliation for the alleged advantage an undervalued yuan gives to Chinese businesses.

Aside from the currency, analysts predict Mr. Paulson will push the interests of international financial-services companies, which he sees as necessary for economic growth.

Mr. Paulson has made a point of pooh-poohing expectations that he will make concrete headway on specific economic issues during his four-day China trip. Rather, he has said he is trying to set the tone and build relationships for slower, more-durable gains.

The personal touch seemed to get the attention of Mr. Xi. "We treasure your friendship," he told Mr. Paulson before the two men strolled together through the lush gardens around the guesthouse, the same complex where Richard Nixon stayed during his groundbreaking visit in 1972.

"He's the kind of guy who knows how to get over the goal line," Mr. Paulson said after their meeting.

Two Chinese Warships Visit San Diego (LAT)

By Tony Perry And Mark Magnier

The Los Angeles Times, September 20, 2006

SAN DIEGO — Under a clear blue sky Monday, two Chinese warships slipped peacefully into San Diego Bay, a sign of some warming in the sometimes chilly relationship between the two countries.

The arrival of the guidedmissile cruiser Qingdao and the oiler Hongzehu marked the third visit of Chinese ships to the West Coast — but the first since the 2001 incident in which a Navy surveillance plane collided with a Chinese fighter, forcing the U.S. plane to land on China's Hainan Island and requiring 11 days of diplomatic wrangling before the plane's crew was allowed to leave.

"With this visit, China and the United States have an important opportunity to develop and build through our sailors relationships for cooperation in maintaining a peaceful and stable region," Rear Adm. Len Hering, commander of Navy Region Southwest, said as the ships docked at the 32nd Street Naval Station.

Three hundred members of the local Chinese community greeted the ships. The Navy Band was accompanied by the Chinese Navy Band.

China could have its first aircraft carrier by the end of this year, and Pentagon analysts have warned in recent years that China could present a major threat as its expanding "blue-water" navy increasingly is able to travel far from home. But the U.S. also may need Chinese cooperation in the United Nations to reign in the nuclear ambitions of Iran and North Korea.

In San Diego, the two Chinese ships are surrounded by carriers, destroyers and submarines. On Monday, a variety of U.S. warplanes screamed overhead.

When it comes to military relations with the United States, analysts said, China is more wary of exposing its weaknesses than of revealing its strengths.

"It's like a millionaire invites someone who only has a few dollars to enter into a partnership," said Ni Lexiong, a defense analyst and professor at the Shanghai Institute of Politics and Law. "The latter wouldn't accept it because he wouldn't have any real say in the partnership and might even risk what little money he does have."

The U.S., meanwhile, has every interest in fostering closer military relations in hopes that Chinese leaders will see America's overwhelming military superiority and convey their impressions back to their political leaders in Beijing — making them think twice about challenging the Pentagon, Lexiong said.

Chinese leaders have eased their reservations about improving relations with the U.S. in recent months as their confidence gradually improves, analysts say.

They also have a big interest in keeping overall bilateral relations on a good footing and don't want military issues to add strain at a time of economic friction and foreign policy differences over Iran and Sudan.

Better bilateral relations, in Beijing's view, would encourage Washington to restrain Taiwan, while military acrimony might spur conservatives in Washington to encourage Taiwan's pro-independence voices. "In a bid to improve its relations with the United States, China is now trying to actively spur these defense exchanges," said Jia Qingguo, vice dean of international studies at Peking University.

Since he assumed command last year of all U.S. forces in the Pacific, Adm. William Fallon has visited China three times, calling for greater transparency and reciprocity in the access each side receives.

DOJ_NMG_0066264

In San Diego, crew members aboard the two ships will participate in a search-and-rescue training mission with U.S. ships. But first the crew members will enjoy some free time, including a visit to the San Diego Zoo and its pandas, on loan from China.

Powering China's Juggernaut: Truckers Hauling Coal (NYT)

By Jim Yardley

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

FUGU, China — Hunched over his steering wheel, Zhu Dexiu turned the key in the ignition as the engine rumbled awake and his coal truck lurched forward. The journey lasted about 30 feet. Then Mr. Zhu switched off the engine and waited for the next flurry of driving, maybe another 20 minutes off.

It was 2 p.m. His goal was to reach the inspection station here on the eastern border of Shaanxi Province by 10 p.m. All that stood in his way were other battered trucks carrying cinderblock-size chunks of coal destined for China's east. There were maybe a thousand of them.

The line was five miles long.

"We've been waiting in this line for 24 hours," complained Mr. Zhu, a green towel draped over his head and behind his ears as if he were a beleaguered Egyptian pharaoh. "We have no choice but to be patient."

Given China's status as the workshop of the world, and given that coal, more than anything, is powering that workshop, men like Mr. Zhu could be called the coal-truck drivers of the world. They carry the coal that powers the country's restaurants, office buildings and high-rises, as well as the factories that make cheap exports for the West.

They also spend hours, sometimes days, waiting in line, a small example of the epic scale, and epic inefficiency, of China's coal economy. The grimmest barometer of that inefficiency is not measured in hours wasted but in lives lost: nearly 6,000 coal miners died in accidents last year, often in illegal mines where owners sacrificed safety in the rush for profits.

But the journey of the coal driver is a reminder that often beneath the juggernaut of the Chinese economy are three guys squeezed into the cab of a filthy truck hauling coal, a trip multiplied daily by untold thousands. In this fashion — one restaurant, one shopping mall or one factory at a time — much of China gets its energy.

First, though, the drivers must get out of coal country in the autonomous region of Inner Mongolia and neighboring Shaanxi and Shanxi provinces. On a gray, drizzly afternoon in August, Mr. Zhu was part of a small caravan of trucks carrying 90 tons of coal to a karaoke bar and bathhouse in Baoding.

Mr. Zhu had collected his load a day earlier from a small mine in Shenmu, a major coal hub in northern Shaanxi. He estimated that the 260-mile trip to Baoding would take five days, including at least two at the inspection checkpoint in Fugu before he could cross the Yellow River and head east. For a poor province like Shaanxi, the toll collected there is like a tithe for every pebble of black gold leaving its borders: the fee for a ton of coal is about $7.

Drivers see the fee as just another shakedown. On a different morning, just south of the ancient city of Togtoh, in Inner Mongolia, a different caravan of about 20 coal trucks was parked on a roadside. They had sent a scout to a nearby traffic circle to check for a police officer with a reputation for dispensing dubious tickets.

"He's got to make his quotas," said one driver, smoking a cigarette as other drivers napped on the road beneath the shaded undercarriages of their trucks. The scout's job was to notify the other drivers when the officer broke for lunch so the caravan could beat it safely through town. "Otherwise," the driver said of the $6 ticket, "we could not make any money."

The inspection station in Fugu is an unavoidable bottleneck for the trucks heading east from the mines in Shenmu. Drivers spend so much time waiting that a floating commercial district has arisen on the roadside. Hawkers on bicycles and mopeds peddle Mao amulets, military magazines, spare keys, boiled eggs, noodles and fingernail clippers.

"Corn! Corn!" shouted a woman selling food from the back of one bike.

In their idle time, drivers play cards in the cramped cabs of their trucks or read magazines. Some compare waiting-in-line stories the way other men compare fish stories.

"The longest we had to wait was two weeks," Mr. Zhu said. "People set up restaurants beside the road."

Another driver in the convoy, Li Wenshun, said he once waited in a line that stretched more than 30 miles, all the way back to the mines in Shenmu.

"Before there was a road," mused Mr. Li, "there was a line."

For the Chinese government, bottlenecks in coal transportation are a critical issue partly blamed for power shortages in cities and factory districts along the southern coast. The government has responded by rapidly expanding railroad lines dedicated to coal and upgrading port facilities to expedite sea shipments of coal to power plants and factories in the south.

Experts say those improvements have begun to help ease the bottlenecks. But the demand for coal remains so insatiable that the more informal, and chaotic, network of truckers continues to play a vital role. Coal trucks seem to be everywhere. Anyone who has driven in China knows the not-always-comforting feeling of looking in the rear-view mirror and seeing a coal truck barreling closer.

Mr. Zhu said he now made the trip from Shenmu to Baoding about six times a month, earning about $600. Many of the drivers were once farmers who could not earn $600 in a year and are looking for a way out of rural poverty. “We have no choice,” said another driver. “There is no other way out of the countryside.”

On this trip, Mr. Zhu was traveling with a backup driver and his son, an apprentice driver who hopes to have his own coal truck one day. They sat patiently inside the cab as, every hour or so, coal trains whizzed by the paralyzed truck line.

“I like the lifestyle,” said the son, Zhu Dongliang, 20. “There aren’t that many jobs out there. This is good work.”

If sometimes tedious: a few minutes later, the elder Mr. Zhu cranked up the engine and lurched forward another 30 feet. Then he turned it off.

Australia Announces Plan For Compromise In Global Trade Talks (WSJ/AP)

By Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

CAIRNS, Australia -- The 18-member Cairns Group of Pacific Rim and Asian nations launched a bid to intensify pressure on the U.S., Europe and Japan to give ground in global trade talks.

Host Australia announced a compromise it hopes will cut through the impasse on trade protection that is blocking the World Trade Organization's so-called Doha round.

But European Union Trade Commissioner Peter Mandelson, who didn't attend the Cairns meeting, already has rejected the proposal as "undoable."

The plan would require the EU to agree to better by 5% its offer to reduce farm tariffs and the U.S. to agree to cut subsidies by $5 billion, Australian Trade Minister Mark Vaile told Australian Broadcasting Corp. radio yesterday.

"We think that's a middle-ground position," Mr. Vaile said, though he conceded neither the EU nor Washington was on board with the idea.

The U.S.'s chief agricultural negotiator, Richard Crowder, told the Associated Press yesterday that Washington was "prepared to be flexible" on domestic subsidies, provided other countries made significant reductions in agricultural tariffs.

The Doha round talks were suspended in July over disagreements about agricultural subsidies and tariffs.

The Cairns Group members are Argentina, Australia, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Indonesia, Malaysia, New Zealand, Pakistan, Paraguay, the Philippines, South Africa, Thailand and Uruguay.

The group was formed in August 1986 to lobby for the removal of global farm trade barriers.

US Trade Representative Says Australian Trade Proposal "has Potential" (AP)

AP, September 20, 2006

CAIRNS, Australia U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab said Wednesday that a new proposal to break the current impasse in global trade talks "has potential."

Schwab said the proposal, under which the European Union would agree to better by 5 percent its offer to reduce farm tariffs, while the U.S. would agree to cut subsidies by US$5 billion (€3.9 billion), could help restart the stalled Doha round of World Trade Organization talks.

"I'm going to be very careful not to endorse any specific proposal, except to say that the Australian proposal, I think, is an important one," she told The Associated Press on the sidelines of a meeting of the 18-member Cairns Group of agricultural exporting nations.

Australia's Trade Minister Mark Vaile presented the proposed compromise this week, but the EU's Trade Commissioner Peter Mandelson immediately rejected it as "undoable."

While she wouldn't comment on the specific figures, Schwab said the principles underlying the proposal were acceptable to the United States.

"I think the fact that Mark Vaile and the government in Australia put forward a proposal that has both more market access and more cuts in domestic support is ultimately the right way to go," she said. "I think it has potential to move the conversation forward."

The United States and the EU have been sharply divided over how to cut tariffs and domestic subsidies on farm goods, a dispute that led to the suspension of the Doha round in July.

This week's meeting of the Cairns Group has set the revival of the Doha round — named for the Qatari capital where talks commenced in 2001 — as its top priority.

But as the meeting began Wednesday, the United States and Europe remained divided as ever.

"I think the fundamental disagreement has to do with the level of ambition in the Doha round," Schwab said. "If you are going to promote global economic growth and development and the alleviation of poverty you need an ambitious balanced agreement where market access is key and new trade flows occur."

She said the EU was willing to open its markets to the manufactured goods and the services sector, but "when it comes to agriculture, the EU's proposal is less ambitious."

Moscow Faces Global Oil Backlash (FT)

By Neil Buckley And Arkady Ostrovsky

Financial Times, September 20, 2006

Russia was facing a global backlash on Tuesday over its threat to halt work on a $20bn (£10.6bn) energy project led by Royal Dutch Shell.

Japan led the chorus of anger. Shinzo Abe, chief cabinet secretary and front-runner to be next prime minister, warned the move would damage international relations and jeopardise foreign investment. The European Union voiced concern and Britain protested to the Russian authorities.

But even as the international community was protesting against the suspension of an environmental permit for the Royal Dutch Shell-led Sakhalin-2 project, it emerged that another large foreign energy project faced a similar threat.

Russian prosecutors have threatened to suspend an exploration licence for TNK-BP, the Anglo-Russian joint venture, to develop Kovykta, the massive gas field in Eastern Siberia.

A source familiar with the situation said prosecutors in Irkutsk, capital of Eastern Siberia, demanded a local agency for natural resources suspend TNK-BP's licence on environmental grounds and for failing to fulfil its terms.

On Tuesday Russia insisted its move to cancel the environmental permit for Sakhalin-2 was not politically motivated and was prompted entirely by environmental concerns.

If the move is ratified by Russia's industrial safety agency, work on the huge gas and oil development would be halted.

Oleg Mitvol, deputy head of Russia's environmental watchdog, accused the project operators of serious breaches of environmental law, including marine and river pollution on the Pacific island of Sakhalin. He expected the natural resources ministry's decision to revoke the permit to be approved by a further technical body within days.

Ministry officials say the Shell-led consortium would be forced to suspend work on phase two of the project, which includes building the world's largest liquefied natural gas plant and pipelines linking it to offshore oil fields.

The suspension of Shell's permit has been widely seen as a tactic to secure a better stake in the project for the Russian government: a charge the authorities strongly rejected on Tuesday. The moves against Shell and TNK-BP come as the Kremlin looks to expand its influence over the energy sector. It is known to want Gazprom to take a substantial stake in Sakhalin-2. Gazprom is also seen as the front-runner to replace the private Russian partners in the TNK-BP venture.

The move was keenly felt in Japan, where Sakhalin gas and oil are crucial for strengthening energy security and reducing dependence on the Middle East. The trading companies Mitsui and Mitsubishi own 25 per cent and 20 per cent of the project, with the rest owned by Shell.

EU, Japan Object To Russia's Move On Shell Permit (WSJ)

By A Wall Street Journal News Roundup

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

Russia's move to revoke an environmental permit for a $20 billion oil-and-gas project led by Royal Dutch Shell PLC sparked protests from Europe and Japan.

Meanwhile, Russia's OAO Gazprom said talks aimed at bringing the state-controlled gas monopoly into the giant project on the Far East island of Sakhalin have made no progress since Shell announced costs would double more than a year ago.

Russia's Ministry of Natural Resources said Monday it was withdrawing its approval for the second phase of the project because of allegations Shell had violated terms of the deal. Shell denies that.

But Russia's economics minister said the government had no plans to cancel a handful of foreign-led energy projects agreed to in the 1990s, including Sakhalin II.

The move to revoke the permit follows Kremlin efforts to increase Russian control of oil and natural-gas projects and was seen as a tough negotiating tactic aimed at restructuring the agreement between Russia and the project's operator, in which Shell owns a 55% stake and Japan's Mitsui & Co. and Mitsubishi Corp. own a combined 45%.

The European Commission, the European Union's executive body, said it was taking Russia's withdrawal of the permits "very seriously" and called on Moscow to guarantee a secure and predictable investment climate.

Shinzo Abe, the expected successor to Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, said a major delay to Sakhalin could hurt diplomatic relations, and the British government said it was "deeply concerned."

Analysts said Russia needs massive amounts of investment to develop its infrastructure and exploration capacities.

Sakhalin II had been scheduled to start producing liquefied natural gas in the middle of 2008, with about 60% delivered to Japan, according to Japanese buyers.

Analysts and an industry insider said they don't expect a severe impact on liquefied-natural-gas supplies in 2008 to 2009, because Japanese buyers already had expected initial output from the project to be unstable.

But for the longer term, a possible slowdown in investments in energy projects in Russia could be a serious problem, analysts said.

DOJ_NMG_0066267

"Japanese companies may think twice about investing in resource projects in Russia," said Hirofumi Kawachi, an analyst with Mizuho Investors Securities Co.

Analysts said they suspect the Kremlin will ratchet up pressure to the point where Shell would be forced to surrender long-established production deals, negotiated when global oil prices were much lower, to give Russia a bigger slice.

Analysts said Russia also wants to help Gazprom get better terms for a stake in the project. Gazprom had planned to swap 50% in its giant Siberian Zapolyarnoye field against a 25% stake in Sakhalin II. But the plan ran into trouble after Shell announced cost overruns. A Gazprom spokesman denied that the government's move had influenced Gazprom's talks with Shell.

Jonathan Stern, a gas specialist at the Oxford Institute for Energy Studies, said companies would continue to invest in Russia because alternatives such as Iran, Venezuela and Nigeria were just as risky, if not more so.

"They will all say they're going to be discouraged," he said of Western energy companies. "The question is...'Where are you going to go?' If you look at the places which are open for investment...it seems to me that you don't see Russia as more difficult than anywhere else."

Steven Beharrell, a senior counsel at law firm LeBoeuf, Lamb, Greene & MacRae, said this may prove to be a watershed, with assets coming under much closer Kremlin control.

"I think this is an indication and a warning to anyone wishing to invest in Russian infrastructure that you will do it on national terms and not on any others," he told a London conference.

Annan Calls For Unity In Emotional Adieu (AP-Y)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, September 19, 2006

In an emotional farewell, Secretary-General Kofi Annan appealed for nations and peoples to unite to combat widespread contempt for human rights, religious divisions, brutal conflicts and an unjust world economy.

Annan's opening address to the 61st annual U.N. General Assembly hit many issues on the ambitious agenda that leaders of the 192 member nations confront — reviving a stalled Mideast peace process, curbing Iran's nuclear ambitions, getting U.N. peacekeepers into conflict-wracked Darfur and promoting democracy.

But it was overshadowed by a bloodless coup in Thailand in which the military overthrew popularly elected Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra as he was in New York for the ministerial meeting. Thaksin initially switched speaking slots so he could make his speech on Tuesday evening, a day earlier than planned, but later canceled the address.

Trying to build bridges with people in the Middle East angry with the United States over Iraq and Lebanon, President Bush assured skeptical Muslims he is not waging war with Islam and urged support for the people trying to transform the region and bring Mideast peace.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad — who was scheduled to speak to the body later Tuesday — was not in the hall during Bush's address and skipped a lunch hosted by Annan attended by the U.S. leader.

Bush opened his speech saying the call he made immediately after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks five years ago to all nations to defend civilization and build a better future "is still the greatest challenge of our time; it is the calling of our generation."

"At the start of the 21st century, it is clear that the world is engaged in a great ideological struggle, between extremists who use terror as a weapon to create fear, and moderate people who work for peace," he said.

Pakistan's President Gen. Pervez Musharraf, a staunch U.S. ally who spoke shortly after Bush, also urged the world to confront the plague of terrorism head-on and end ending conflicts in the Islamic world to eliminate the "desperation and injustice" that breed extremism.

"Unless we end foreign occupation and suppression of Muslim peoples," he said, "terrorism and extremism will continue to find recruits among alienated Muslims in various parts of the world," he said, and the top priority should be ending "the tragedy of Palestine."

Annan, meanwhile, warned that "as long as the Palestinians live under occupation, exposed to daily frustration and humiliation, and as long as Israelis are blown up in buses or in dance halls, so long will passions everywhere be inflamed."

Failure to resolve the Palestinian-Israeli conflict and Israel's 40-year occupation will continue to hurt the U.N.'s reputation and raise questions about its impartiality, he said. It also will stymie the U.N.'s best efforts to resolve other conflicts, "including those in Iraq and Afghanistan, whose peoples need our help just as badly, and are entitled to it," he warned.

On a positive note, Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni met Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas late Monday for the first time in months. Ministers from the Quartet that drafted the stalled road map to Mideast peace — the U.S., the U.N., the European Union and Russia — will meet Wednesday, and the Security Council was to hold a ministerial meeting Thursday that Arab leaders hope will help revive the Mideast peace process.

Annan, whose second five-year term ends on Dec. 31, said the past decade had seen progress in development, security and the rule of law — the three great challenges he said humanity faced in his first address to the General Assembly in 1997.

But the secretary-general said too many people are still exposed to "brutal conflict" and the fear of terrorism has increased the risk of a clash of civilizations and religions. Terrorism is being used as a pretext to limit or abolish human rights, and globalization risks driving richer and poorer peoples apart, he said.

"As a result, we face a world whose divisions threaten the very notion of an international community, upon which this institution stands," Annan said.

"The only answer to this divided world must be a truly United Nations," he said.

He also decried the continuing conflict in Sudan's western Darfur region, "where the continued spectacle of men, women and children driven from their homes by murder, rape and the burning of their villages makes a mockery of our claim, as an international community, to shield people from the worst abuses."

Sudan's President Omar al-Bashir denied that there was a major humanitarian crisis, accusing volunteer organizations working in Darfur of exaggerating the crisis in order to "solicit more assistance and more aid."

Al-Bashir reiterated his government's rejection of Security Council demands that the United Nations take control of a Darfur peacekeeping force now run by the African Union. Still, he said, he did not oppose the current force being strengthened and stressed that AU troops should remain there until a lasting peace is put into place.

Liberian President Ellen Johnson Sirleaf said the U.N.'s obligation to protect the helpless and innocent must remain paramount. She called on the Security Council to act under Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter, which allows military intervention, "to restore peace, security and stability to Darfur."

The African Union's Peace and Security Council is scheduled to meet here Wednesday to discuss breaking the deadlock over Darfur.

Annan's voice rose with emotion as he described his "difficult and challenging but at times also thrillingly rewarding" job.

"Together we have pushed some big rocks to the top of the mountain, even if others have slipped from our grasp and rolled back," the secretary-general said. "I yield my place to others with an obstinate feeling — a real obstinate feeling — of hope for our common future."

The presidents, prime ministers, foreign ministers, ambassadors and other diplomats in the General Assembly chamber burst into loud applause and rose to give their departing leader a sustained standing ovation.

In Last Report, Annan Cites 'Challenges' (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, September 20, 2006

NEW YORK -- In his final address to an opening session of the U.N. General Assembly as secretary-general, Kofi Annan yesterday warned that the Israeli-Arab conflict has so inflamed tensions that it is constantly refueling "a climate of fear and suspicion" around the world.

Speaking with unusual candor, Mr. Annan also used his last appearance before the high-powered audience to demand economic opportunities for Africa, peace for the Middle East, and human rights for all.

"The events of the last 10 years have not resolved, but sharpened, the three great challenges ... an unjust world economy, world disorder and widespread contempt for human rights and the rule of law," he told the assembled world leaders, ministers and diplomats attending this year's general debate, including President Bush.

"As a result, we face a world whose divisions threaten the very notion of an international community, upon which this institution stands."

Mr. Annan will leave the United Nations in December after a decade of global and sometimes personal turbulence.

World leaders paid tribute to the outgoing secretary-general, and congratulations poured in during the annual luncheon.

President Bush praised his compassion, desire for peace and work ethic.

"We need to toast the fact that he is a decent, honorable man," Mr. Bush said during the luncheon. "We need to raise our glasses to 10 years of extraordinary service and be thankful that a man such as Kofi Annan was willing to stand up and serve the cause of justice and peace."

Mr. Annan, who last month visited 11 countries in two weeks to try to quell the Israeli-Hezbollah conflict in Lebanon, spoke passionately about the region.

"We might like to think of the Arab-Israeli conflict as just one regional conflict among many," Mr. Annan said. "But it is not. No other conflict carries such a powerful symbolic and emotional charge among people far removed from the battlefield."

"As long as the Security Council is unable to end this conflict, and the now nearly 40-year-old occupation, by bringing both sides to accept and implement its resolutions, so long will respect for the United Nations continue to decline," he warned.

The organization's impartiality will be questioned, and people will resist the U.N. efforts to resolve other conflicts, he said, citing Iraq and Afghanistan in particular.

The 61st session of the General Assembly opened amid acute security precautions. Throughout Midtown Manhattan, traffic was halted for passing motorcades, and streets surrounding luxury hotels are being barricaded through the weekend.

Mr. Annan offered a bittersweet assessment of his own tenure.

"This is the last time I shall have the honor of presenting my annual report to this assembly. Let me conclude by thanking you all for allowing me to serve as secretary-general during this remarkable decade," Mr. Annan said yesterday.

"Together, we have pushed some big rocks to the top of the mountain, even if others have slipped from our grasp and rolled back. But this mountain with its bracing winds and global views is the best place on earth to be."

Sudan: Won't Accept U.N. Peacekeepers (AP)

By Nick Wadhams

AP, September 20, 2006

Sudan will not allow the United Nations to take control of peacekeepers in Darfur under any circumstance, the president said Tuesday, claiming that rights groups have exaggerated the crisis there in a bid for more cash.

Omar al-Bashir did say that the African Union, which now runs the peacekeeping mission in Darfur, should be allowed to augment its forces with more logistics, advisers and other support.

"The picture that volunteer organizations try to give in order to solicit more assistance and more aid, have given a negative result," al-Bashir told a news conference.

Speaking on the sidelines of the annual U.N. General Assembly debate, al-Bashir claimed that Zionist groups wanted to weaken Sudan and that Jewish organizations were behind dozens of recent rallies there. He said Israel was spreading a lie that Sudanese Arabs are killing Sudanese Africans.

"We refuse to normalize with Israel, we refuse to deal with Israel," he said.

The fighting in Darfur has largely pitted Muslims against Muslims, though some identify themselves as African and others as Arab. The janjaweed, the Arab tribal militias unleashed by the government, are accused of some of the worst atrocities.

The United Nations and many rights groups claim that fighting between rebels and government-backed militias in Darfur has killed more than 200,000 people and displaced 2.5 million since 2003.

The underfunded AU force has been largely unable to stop the violence, leading AU leaders and the U.N. Security Council to demand a takeover by the United Nations, with its deeper pockets and better resources.

Speaking on the sidelines of the General Assembly meeting, al-Bashir reiterated his stance that the demands to put peacekeeping in Darfur under U.N. control are part of efforts to protect Israel, carve up Sudan and get access to its oil reserves.

While he ruled out U.N. peacekeepers at any cost, he said he had no objection to the African Union force receiving logistical, military and communications support, as well as materials and advisers.

In what could be an encouraging sign, he said the African Union forces should be allowed to remain in Sudan until the region sees peace at last.

"We want the African Union to remain in Darfur until peace is re-established in Sudan," al-Bashir said.

Those comments suggest that the African Union will not face any resistance in renewing the peacekeeping force's mandate, which expires on Sept. 30.

Last month, the Security Council passed a resolution that would put the peacekeepers under U.N. control, but required Sudan's consent.

In his speech to the U.N. General Assembly earlier Tuesday, President Bush repeated Washington's belief that the Darfur tragedy is a genocide, and said the AU force is "not strong enough" to protect the people of Darfur. He called for the force to be strengthened and demanded the U.N. take control.

"If the Sudanese government does not approve this peacekeeping force quickly, the United Nations must act," Bush said. "Your lives and the credibility of the United Nations is at stake."

In that speech, Bush announced that he was naming Andrew Natsios, the former director of the U.S. Agency for International Development, as his special envoy for Sudan.

The United States and its allies are now weighing whether there are other options for confronting al-Bashir's government, including the possibility of military intervention despite his objections.

In her speech to the General Assembly, Liberian President Ellen Johnson Sirleaf said the stalemate over whether a U.N. or AU force should be deployed "demonstrates a lack of international will to address the sufferings and yearnings of the citizens and residents of Darfur."

Saying the U.N.'s obligation to protect the helpless and innocent must remain paramount, she called on the Security Council to act under Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter, which allows military intervention, "to restore peace, security and stability to Darfur."

Darfur Can't Wait (USAT)

USA Today, September 20, 2006

Last week, actor George Clooney described a recent trip to the crisis-torn region of Darfur in Sudan. A little girl pulled his finger, he said, and asked when he would be back. When he replied “soon,” she giggled and told him: “That's what you always say.”

DOJ_NMG_0066270

Out of the mouth of babes, the saying goes, often comes the truth.

On Tuesday, speaking to the opening of the United Nations General Assembly in New York, President Bush announced he was appointing a high-level envoy, Andrew Natsios, to lead a new push to end more than three years of slaughter and mass displacements in Darfur. The little girl set the only meaningful test: Will it be yet another hollow gesture?

The portents aren't good.

At the U.N., Bush rightly took credit for the fact that the United States, two years ago, first called what was happening in Darfur "genocide" as others pussyfooted around the definition. Bush also outlined what it would take to stop the slaughter: sending in a muscular U.N. force of about 20,000 — preferably with NATO logistical backing and air power. The Security Council, with U.S. prodding, recently authorized such a force.

The problem is that the Sudanese government, led by President Omar el-Bashir, won't accept the U.N. force. Sudan also plans to eject a poorly equipped African Union force of 7,000 when its mandate expires at the end of the month. Bashir plans to replace them with Sudanese forces.

That's a recipe for new slaughter: It is government-backed Arab militias, known as Janjaweed, that have been carrying out the massacres of tribes associated with rebel groups. So far, about 2 million people have been displaced and hundreds of thousands killed.

Clearly, the Sudanese government is betting on getting away with murder. It's a good bet. The world is distracted by crises elsewhere, and finding troops for the U.N. force would be hard. Rustling them up for Lebanon and Afghanistan has already proved difficult.

The odds can be changed — with political will. Appointing a high-level envoy is a start. A strong U.S. and European diplomatic offensive would have to follow. Even more helpful would be for China and Russia, which have significant economic ties with Sudan, to use their leverage rather than holding back, as both did when they abstained in the Security Council vote for the U.N. force.

After genocide in Rwanda in the 1990s, the world said "never again." But when the little girl implied that she did not believe Clooney's promise, she spoke from experience — and, all too likely, with prescience.

Gyurcsány Resists Calls for Resignation, Stands by Overhaul

BUDAPEST -- Several thousand protesters gathered outside the Hungarian parliament yesterday for a third night of protests after Hungarian Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcsány rejected demands that he resign after he admitted lying about the condition of the economy before April's elections.

"I do not want to step down," the Socialist prime minister said. "There's only one policy, that of change, reforms and clear speech. This is my policy, there is no plan B."

Hungarian financial markets remained on edge after the protests turned violent Monday night. The BUX index of the Budapest Stock Exchange fell 1.2%.

Socialist members of Parliament continued to voice their support for Mr. Gyurcsány and his economic overhauls, while economists and analysts said the premier's resignation would cause more harm than good.

"The prime minister's resignation would have serious market consequences as it would mean the failure of the reform package," said György Barcza, chief economist at ING Bank in Budapest. Mr. Barcza didn't expect the prime minister to resign, saying that would be a major mistake because it would be perceived as a break with overhaul policies.

Hungary's budget deficit -- forecast by the government at 10.1% of gross domestic product this year -- is the biggest in the European Union. To rein in the budget shortfall, Mr. Gyurcsány has launched extensive austerity measures, mainly consisting of higher taxes and utility prices. Hundreds of public workers have been laid off, universities now charge tuition and residents must pay certain health-care costs, including fees to visit a doctor.

Rating service Standard & Poor's said yesterday that a change in government could weaken effectiveness of overhauls, which could eventually lead to the ratings being lowered.

"Collapse of the government seems unlikely anytime soon, but the scandal clearly undermines the position of the prime minister," said Merrill Lynch economist Radoslaw Bodys. "And any defeat of the ruling Socialists in the Oct. 1 local elections may put further pressure on Gyurcsány, and consequently his proposed fiscal consolidation package."

Mr. Gyurcsány is key for fiscal overhauls, said economist Juliet Sampson at HSBC. Hungarian asset value is based overwhelmingly on the credibility of the government's overhaul program, and this, to a great extent, is tied to Mr. Gyurcsány, she said. "If he goes, any successor would have an even greater challenge in establishing and maintaining credibility," Ms. Sampson said.

Monday night, between 2,000 and 3,000 protesters stormed the headquarters of state television, demanding a live broadcast to proclaim their demands, throwing rocks at police and setting fire to several cars. About 150 people were injured, including 102 police officers, officials said. A more peaceful crowd of about 200 protesters remained outside the Parliament building yesterday.

The protests were in response to a recording of a speech by Mr. Gyurcsány leaked to the state radio station, on which the prime minister admitted to Socialist Party officials that he covered up serious problems in the Hungarian economy. The opposition center-right party, Fidesz, has been calling for the premier's resignation ever since the leak. The source of the leak isn't known. But the premier acknowledged the authenticity of the tape and published a transcript on his blog.

"I almost died when for a year and a half we had to pretend we were governing," the premier says on the recording. "Instead, we lied morning, evening and night." The premier also said on the recording that abundant global liquidity and budget accounting tricks have saved Hungary's international standing among investors.

Hungary's PM Defies Calls To Quit (FT)

By Christopher Condon

Financial Times, September 20, 2006

Ferenc Gyurcsany, Hungary's prime minister, on Tuesday defied calls for his resignation and vowed to press ahead with public-sector reforms after the worst street violence in the Hungarian capital since the fall of communism.

The Socialist premier condemned rioters enraged over his extraordinary admission that he had lied about the state of the economy to win re-election.

Demonstrators had stormed the headquarters of Hungarian public television in Budapest shortly after midnight on Tuesday morning. More than 150 people were injured in clashes with police.

"I put my political life at stake for this. Either there will be a new Hungary or I shall not continue," he said.

The events in Hungary fuel concerns that the European Union's newest members are facing growing political instability and resistance to reforms required for their economic integration.

Last night, a crowd of about 1,000 protesters gathered in front of parliament under a steady rain. They were accompanied by hundreds of riot police.

Fidesz urged the prime minister to go in what it called a "moral crisis".

Monday's protest was triggered by an audio recording, leaked to the press at the weekend, in which Mr Gyurcsany admitted that his Socialist government had lied repeatedly to voters about state finances.

He was trying to galvanise his party to end the deceit and push ahead with real reforms.

Hungary's budget deficit is expected to top 10 per cent of gross domestic product this year. Both the Socialists and Fidesz waged election campaigns in the spring that ignored the rising deficit and featured competing spending promises. The Socialists won the contest and Mr Gyurcsany quickly followed with a budget austerity programme and plans for public sector reforms. Fidesz leaders have since attacked Mr Gyurcsany for concealing the extent of Hungary's budget deficit during the campaign and denying plans for austerity measures.

The Hungarian forint and bonds dropped by the most in a month. Against the euro, the forint fell as much as 1.5 per cent, trading at 272.83 late on Tuesday.

Riots Test Hungary's Young Democracy (CSM)

By Michael Logan

The Christian Science Monitor, September 20, 2006

BUDAPEST, HUNGARY

More than 100 policemen and 50 anti-government protesters were injured late Monday night and into the early morning Tuesday in Budapest after the protesters set fire to cars and stormed the state-run Hungarian Television building in the worst violence Hungary has seen since the fall of communism.

Tension had been mounting since Sunday, when a radio station aired a leaked recording of Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcsany admitting his party had lied before April's general elections.

Hungarians were already angry at the ruling Socialist-Liberal coalition for introducing unannounced tax and energy price increases after being re-elected, and thousands of anti-government, right-wing, protesters took to the streets after the tape was aired.

The country has been divided between right and left since the changeover to democracy in 1990, and divisions have in the past spilled over into bitter campaigns. While the Monday's violence has shocked Hungarians, few see long-term damage to the country's young democracy.

Mr. Gyurcsany, a former Communist youth leader, has resisted opposition calls to resign, and some feel the riots could work in his favor. While the right-wing opposition party Fidesz, founded by dissidents who protested against Soviet rule in the 1980s, did not direct the violence, several analysts feel charged language used in campaigning for the upcoming local elections contributed to the blow up.

"Viktor Orban [the Fidesz leader] has been using words like 'uprising' and 'radicalism'," says Krisztian Szabados, the director of the independent Political Capital Institute. "These words incited people." How the protests began

The riots began after several hundred right-wing extremists broke off from a peaceful crowd of around ten thousand demanding Gyurcsany's resignation late Monday evening. The breakaway group laid siege to the television building on Freedom Square in an effort to have their demands read out.

The mob, supported by several thousand onlookers, set fire to cars, threw cobblestones at police and damaged an unpopular monument to the Soviet troops that liberated Hungary from the Nazis in 1945. The police attempted to control the crowd with water cannons and tear gas but were forced to retreat, allowing the protestors to briefly occupy the building before dispersing.

According to Mr. Szabados, prominent right-wingers helped pump up the protestors by comparing the demonstrations to the 1956 uprising, in which ordinary Hungarians rose up against Communist rule only to be brutally crushed. The 50th anniversary of the uprising falls in October.

Maria Wittner, a Fidesz MP who as a young woman fought in the uprising, gave a speech Monday in which she said: "This is already a revolution." Who's to blame?

Szabados finds this rhetoric irresponsible. "Last night was a breach of the peace, not a revolution. To compare it to 1956 was ridiculous and those who did so are legally responsible."

However, Fidesz laid the blame squarely at the feet of the prime minister.

"Ferenc Gyurcsany alone is responsible for what happened last night," Fidesz spokesman Peter Sziijarto said in a statement.

Opposition parties are increasing their calls for Gyurcsany to resign, who made it clear he would stand firm and vowed to crack down on further demonstrations. He called for calm, branded the riots "Hungary's longest, darkest night" since the fall of communism and said that he had asked the police to do whatever it took to quell further illegal demonstrations.

Local elections are scheduled for Oct. 1, and several large rallies are planned before then, creating the possibility of further incident. However, most analysts believe that the violence has shocked the general populace and there will be no escalation.

The demonstrations first began on Sunday, when Hungarian Radio aired a speech Gyurcsany made at a meeting of his Hungarian Socialist Party (MSZP) in May.

"Obviously we have lied. It is clear that what we were saying was not true," Gyurcsany said in the speech. "We haven't done anything for the last four years. I can't mention a single political step we can be proud of ...."

In the speech sprinkled with expletives, Gyurcsany admitted his party had "screwed up" the economy and had hidden the scale of a planned austerity package, which has since been introduced. Hungary has been under pressure from the European Commission and international investors for some time over its economy, and the austerity package is aimed at reducing the huge budget deficit and joining the euro zone, thus completing the long transition from a state-driven to a stable market economy.

The demonstrations could backfire on the opposition, say analysts. "Last night I said that until the first stone is thrown, Fidesz would be better off, but that as soon as the demonstrations turn violent, Fidesz will lose," Szabados says. "Now the average Hungarian is shocked. What we can say at the moment is that these events will cause a political crisis within Fidesz."

Budapest Police Clash With Demonstrators (AP)

By George Jahn, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 20, 2006

Mounted police charged bottle-hurling protesters outside Socialist party headquarters early Wednesday, another night of violence touched off by the prime minister's leaked admission that his government had repeatedly lied to the public about the economy.

Up to 50 people were reported injured, including one policeman. The state MTI news agency said the officer was seriously hurt in the clashes, which — like on the previous day — involved splinter groups separate from a larger demonstration massing about 10,000 people.

MTI said total police at the scene numbered around 1,000. It reported several police cars burning and said demonstrators were also were tearing chunks of plaster from nearby buildings to throw at police.

The latest violence came just a day after hundreds of demonstrators stormed and vandalized part of the state television building, in clashes that left more than 100 people hurt. Wednesday's confrontation erupted after the demonstrators apparently threatened to move in on the party building and ignored police orders shouted through bullhorns to disperse.

Police succeeded in scattering the protesters, then scuffled with small groups in side streets. Wailing sirens signaled the approach of police reinforcements, who then blocked access to the area to media. An ambulance crew was seen attending to an injured officer while other police hustled away individual demonstrators.

The protesters then regrouped, blocking a main thoroughfare with garbage containers and park benches. A bus, its windshield broken, was caught in the swirling mass of police and protesters. As the confrontation neared its third hour, police split the demonstrators into three groups and deployed water cannons to push them into different directions in a new attempt to disperse them.

MTI, quoting police, said about 50 people had been detained by the time the clashes ended in the early hours Wednesday.

The confrontation demonstrated continued high potential for violence amid radical opponents of Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcsany — (Feh-RENZ DJUHR-chanj) — whose taped comments set off the country's worst violence since its failed anti-Soviet revolution 50 years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0066273

The violent group had split away from the estimated 10,000 people gathered in Kossuth Square, the vast plaza abutting the neo-Gothic parliament building. Dozens in the square waved Hungarian flags, and some of the demonstrators set up small tents, signaling they intended to stay at least overnight.

Some insisted they would remain until the resignation of Gyurcsany.

"I hope we can accomplish our goal," said Tamas Szep, 48, a paint supplies wholesaler. "Not only the prime minister, but all of his sidekicks have to go."

Protesters accused the governing coalition of lying to win the April elections, but people also were upset over tax boosts and other economic austerity measures that Gyurcsany has ordered over the last three months.

A 22-year-old student who identified herself only as Mariann compared Gyurcsany to a child caught telling untruths and suggested the Socialist Party leader, who is friends with Russian President Vladimir Putin, be banished to Siberia.

"My mother used to stand me in the corner for lying," she said. "Gyurcsany should stand in the corner of Siberia for lying to the whole country."

Opposition leader Viktor Orban, whose center-right FIDESZ party lost in the elections, also demanded the prime minister's resignation, describing him as "a sick, lying dilettante."

Gyurcsany — whose taped comments admitting his government had "lied morning, evening and night" about the economy provoked the fury — said he intended to weather the storm.

"I'm staying and I'm doing my job. I'm extremely committed to fulfilling my program, fiscal adjustments and reforms," he told The Associated Press. "I know it's very difficult for the people, but it's the only direction for Hungary."

Police were caught off guard the previous night by the fury of a few thousand people who broke away from the main demonstration and stormed the state TV building. Pushing past officers with protective helmets, clubs and shields, about 400 got inside, breaking glass and causing other damage.

The violence shook a country that for much of its last two decades had been held up as a model of progress following the collapse of communism in eastern Europe.

About 150 people were injured, including 102 police officers, one of whom suffered serious head injuries. Gyurcsany called it Hungary's "longest and darkest night" since the end of communist rule in 1989.

As the crowd grew again on Kossuth Square, hundreds of police from around the country arrived to reinforce officers guarding government buildings in the downtown Pest area. Gyurcsany ordered police commanders to use all means to prevent violence while respecting the democratic right to freedom of expression.

The public was stunned by the blunt admissions of government ineptitude during its first term and the cynicism contained in a 25-minute tape that was widely aired and published by news media over the weekend.

"We did nothing for four years. Nothing," Gyurcsany said on the tape, made during a private talk with Socialist parliament members that was larded with crude expressions. Later he said: "We screwed up. Not a little, a lot.

"No European country has done something as boneheaded as we have ... Plainly, we lied throughout the last year and a half, two years," the prime minister said.

The outpouring of rage was fueled by austerity measures implemented by Gyurcsany's Socialist-led coalition seeking to rein in a government budget deficit expected to surpass 10 percent of Hungary's gross domestic product this year — the largest in the European Union.

The government has raised taxes and announced plans to lay off dozens of employees and to introduce direct fees in the health sector and tuition for most university students.

Until the scandal broke Sunday, the 45-year-old Gyurcsany had been the Socialist Party's golden boy — a youthful, charismatic leader promising to lead his nation to prosperity as a full EU member.

Along with Putin, he counts among his friends Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain and President Bush, whom he presented with a handmade pair of riding boots during the U.S. leader's visit in June.

In the April ballot, his coalition with the Alliance of Free Democrats became the first Hungarian government to win consecutive elections since the return to democracy in 1990.

The origin of the leaked tape remained murky.

When confronted with initial excerpts of the 25-minute recording that state radio put up on its Web site Sunday afternoon, Gyurcsany not only confirmed the tape's authenticity but seemed relieved his comments had been made public.

That led some people to speculate the tape might have been released by Gyurcsany's own office, arguing he might hope a scandal could work in his favor by revealing the full extent of Hungary's economic malaise and casting him in the role of its savior.

The prime minister denied any involvement with the tape becoming public.

Abe Wins Vote For Japan Party Presidency (WP/AP)

By Joseph Coleman, The Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0066274

The Washington Post, September 20, 2006

TOKYO -- Nationalist Shinzo Abe became head of Japan's ruling party by a landslide Wednesday, a victory expected to lead to his election as prime minister next week.

Abe won 464 of the 702 votes counted, a majority of 66 percent. Foreign Minister Taro Aso came in a distant second with 136 votes and Finance Minister Sadakazu Tanigaki garnered 102 votes.

By winning the three-year term as Liberal Democratic Party president, Abe, a proponent of a hard line against North Korea, and a more militarily assertive Japan, all but guarantees his election as premier in the vote in parliament on Sept. 26.

"From now on, I would like to join everyone in helping Mr. Abe win the public trust," Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, Abe's mentor, said minutes after the vote. Abe stood up and quietly bowed in all directions when the results were read.

Abe, 51, would be Japan's youngest postwar prime minister and the first born after World War II. He is relatively inexperienced, having joined the parliament in 1993 and assumed his first Cabinet position only a year ago.

The son of a foreign minister and grandson of a prime minister, Abe has campaigned on forging a more confident Japan. He is expected to seek to revise the pacifist constitution to give the military more freedom of action and bolster the security alliance with Japan's top ally, the United States.

Despite his inexperience, Abe came to the vote with key essentials for victory: high support ratings inside and outside the party and the blessing of Koizumi, who remains widely popular after five years in office.

Because Abe's victory appeared certain, the competition has been lackluster. Challengers such as Tanigaki and Aso never came close to rivaling him in popularity or a vision for Japan's future.

The lack of competition, however, has led to a lack of clarity about Abe's policies.

One looming question for Japan's neighbors is how far Abe will push his vision of a country freed from the restraining legacy of World War II, in which Tokyo's attempt at regional hegemony left Japan and much of Asia in ruins.

Abe, for instance, supports revisionist history textbooks that teach students to take pride in their nation rather than focus on the dark accounts of Japanese atrocities and aggression. He is also a proponent of the Yasukuni war shrine, which honors war criminals among the country's war dead.

He has compounded this conservative image by questioning whether every prime minister must repeat Japan's standard apology for its wartime actions. When North Korea tested several missiles in July, Abe suggested a look into whether the constitution would allow Japan to conduct a pre-emptive military strike.

It was unclear how that approach would affect Japan's troubled relations with China and South Korea, two victims of Japanese aggression who have refused to meet with Koizumi because of his visits to the Tokyo war shrine.

If he ultimately becomes prime minister, Abe will take the helm of a Japan in transition.

After five years under Koizumi, reforms have made Japan a more competitive market, powering the economy out of a decade-long slowdown but also widening an increasingly troubling gap between rich and poor.

Japan already has started shedding its postwar pacifism. Koizumi pushed for _ and won _ the power to dispatch the military in unprecedented non-combat roles to help U.S.-led missions in Afghanistan and Iraq, despite domestic opposition.

Mexico Pledges To Extradite Drug Lords (AP)

By Marjorie Olster

AP, September 19, 2006

President Vicente Fox said Tuesday that Mexico is willing to extradite any drug lord in its custody wanted by the United States.

Fox said Mexico currently has 16 "big leaders" of drug gangs in jail along with 75,000 lower level members of various cartels.

"We are fighting hard and attaining very important results," Fox said of Mexico's fight against drug dealers. He was speaking at a news conference in New York where he was attending the United Nations General Assembly.

The U.S. is believed to have requested the extradition of at least three suspected drug kingpins: Benjamin Arellano Felix of the Arellano Felix smuggling syndicate; Osiel Cardenas, reputed head of the Gulf Cartel; and Hector "El Guero" Palma, a reputed leader of the Sinaloa drug cartel.

"We will extradite all of those who have pending matters with U.S. justice," Fox said.

It was the first time Mexico's president had made such a sweeping commitment to send wanted drug lords to face charges in the U.S.

Mexico extradited its first major drug lord — accused kingpin Francisco Rafael Arellano Felix — to the United States over the weekend. Before that, Mexico had often balked at sending drug kingpins, arguing they should face justice in Mexico and refusing to send anyone to the U.S. who would face the death penalty.

Mexico's extradition of the man who once ran the Arellano Felix drug clan was a victory for U.S. officials who have been pushing Mexico to send them more drug lords.

DOJ_NMG_0066275

After serving a 10-year sentence in Mexico, Arellano Felix was loaded into a helicopter to the Mexican border town of Matamoros, then flown across and handed over to Texas officials in Brownsville. He will be taken to California to face trial on charges stemming from a 1980 case in which he allegedly sold cocaine to an undercover police officer in the United States.

U.S. authorities requested Arellano Felix's extradition on June 2, 2003. A federal judge approved that request in 2004, but it took two years for the Foreign Relations Department approve the extradition.

Mexico has fought many extraditions in the past, arguing that suspects must face justice here first. It also has refused to extradite suspects who face the death penalty in other countries.

Capital punishment is illegal here, and a 1978 extradition treaty with the United States allows Mexico to deny extradition if a person faces the death penalty in another country.

In November, Mexico's Supreme Court removed an obstacle that had prevented many of the country's most notorious criminals from facing U.S. justice when it overturned a 4-year ban on the extradition of suspects facing life in prison.

Mexico last year extradited 41 suspected criminals to the United States, up from 34 in 2004; 31 in 2003; 25 in 2002; 17 in 2001; and 12 in 2000, according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

Liberia Sees Green In Reform Of 'Blood Timber' (CSM)

By Matthew Clark

The Christian Science Monitor, September 20, 2006

MONROVIA, LIBERIA

A lucrative industry long steeped in corruption and used to fuel a brutal civil war, timber may now hold the key to rebuilding the devastated West African nation of Liberia.

Ten months after the country elected Africa's first female head of state, Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf, Liberia is poised for rebirth. And reopening the timber business, which could emerge permanently from under UN sanctions this week, is crucial to boosting its broken economy.

Timber is projected to bring in some $100 million annually, of which Ms. Johnson-Sirleaf's government would get between $7 million and $8 million.

The government estimates that the industry could eventually account for 25 percent of GDP - and create 5,000-7,000 jobs in a country with more than 80 percent unemployment.

The pressure to move quickly is considerable. Violent crime has spiked recently, fueled by large numbers of young, jobless, and restless ex-fighters. The government wants to boost its coffers for much-needed schools, roads and sewers, legal development, and security.

But Liberian and international advocates warn that hasty efforts to reform the industry - which farms teak, mahogany, and walnut, among other varieties - could have disastrous results, shortchanging the land and property rights of forest communities and prompting further unrest.

"We understand the [economic] pressure, but we have to do the right thing," says Alfred Brownell, a Liberian lawyer and cofounder of the Green Advocates rights group. If forest communities feel they are cheated by future logging arrangements, he warns, the country could slide back into conflict, leading Liberia "back to the [former dictator Charles] Taylor's days ... back to Square 1."

Joseph Sesay, a Liberian civil affairs officer for the United Nations Mission in Liberia (UNMIL), says he is keenly aware of the need to ensure local residents benefit enough as loggers operate in their areas. But, he adds, Liberia can't afford to wait. "It's a very tough balancing game," he says.

Ms. Johnson-Sirleaf has moved swiftly to get the timber industry into position. She cancelled all timber concessions shortly after her inauguration this year - a move designed to target corruption and bring loggers under the government's eye. In June, she asked the UN to lift sanctions it slapped on Liberian timber in 2003 in response to Mr. Taylor's takeover of the industry using militias stocked with child soldiers. That helped cut off a key source for Taylor's brutal 14-year war against rebels - and, in turn, end the war. Taylor is now in The Hague awaiting trial on war crimes.

The UN provisionally lifted its sanctions early this summer. If it permanently lifts the bans, the government could choose to revoke its own ban shortly thereafter.

Still, rights advocates warn that the country needs to do more to avoid falling prey to timber-funded militias.

"Ex-generals will have a ready [export] market" in neighboring countries, says Silas Siakor, director of the Liberian group Sustainable Development Institute, and an internationally recognized activist (see story, below). He says the government doesn't have the capacity to regulate the industry, and that the ban on exports should remain in place for now. A law that targets corruption

Last month, the government passed a timber-reform law - a move that will factor strongly in the UN's ultimate decision. But while the law takes stronger measures against corruption and in favor of conservation, critics say it focuses on commercial rights to the exclusion of other concerns.

"There is a school of thought that feels community rights are left out," says Mr. Sesay. But, he says, if the government waited to put every interest group's specific clauses in the bill, it would never have passed. "It's like a Christmas tree. Everyone wants to hang his ornament.

"The law cannot be comprehensive about everything, but can serve as a prelude," he adds, explaining that how the community and government agree to share the resources is an issue with too many complexities to be detailed in the law at this stage.

John Woods, the head of the Liberian government's Forestry Development Authority, says that there is a firm commitment from the government to work with civil-society critics to ensure community rights are more adequately implemented in the near future. "The journey of 1,000 miles starts with one step," he says. Damage by small-scale logging

Meanwhile, advocacy groups point out that despite the UN sanctions, illegal logging - mostly small-scale pit sawing by individuals - continues to deplete the forests.

Brownell, whose group monitors illegal logging, says the practice is extensive and "extremely organized." A drive through parts of the southeast reveals long stretches of road lined with freshly felled trees, piles of plank wood, and large timber trucks.

Reports of such small-scale illegal logging have been downplayed by UNMIL, which insists that none of the timber is being exported. "Pit sawing is widespread. You can't stop it. UNMIL doesn't have the personnel." And, he adds, timber from pit sawing "is the only resource for reconstruction."

The Sustainable Development Initiatives group says it has recent evidence, however, of at least one larger-scale illegal logging company moving heavy machinery across Liberia's eastern border from neighboring Ivory Coast, and operating within Liberia.

During an ad hoc monitoring mission headed by the government and UNMIL in an area of concern - which journalists and civil-society advocates joined - they found no evidence of large-scale illegal logging by timber companies. Mr. Siakor's group, however, says these monitoring trips happen too infrequently to adequately address the situation.

The "government hasn't fully come to terms with the fact that they have serious responsibilities," Siakor says.

Beyond the potential for profits, timber reform is expected to set a standard for how the nation can avoid further conflict and lift itself out of dire poverty.

"Timber will serve as a model for extractive industry reform," including the nation's diamond, rubber, and iron ore mining industries, says Sesay. Liberia is still under UN sanctions on its diamond trade. But on timber, he says, "indications so far are positive." One Liberian who found he could make a difference

Small in stature, soft-spoken, a guy who wears jeans and sneakers to the office - Silas Siakor seems an unlikely hero for his war-torn country.

He'd never use that word to describe himself. But the modest thirtysomething will concede that his efforts to document the plunder of Liberia's vast tropical forests have played an important role not only in helping to end 14 years of war, but also in rebuilding the devastated West African nation in ways that may ensure that the fragile peace will not slip.

Evidence of former leader Charles Taylor's abuse of so-called "blood timber" - collected at great personal risk by a small team headed by Mr. Siakor - was key in prompting UN sanctions on Liberian timber exports in 2003. Those sanctions, in turn, helped end the war. Since then, Siakor has continued to monitor the industry and press for its reform.

Siakor began documenting abuses of Liberia's timber in the late 1990s by using monitors around the country and informers working for corrupt timber companies. "What drives us," he says, "is trying to secure better use of Liberia's natural resources for local people. It's not about the greenery - it's about making people's lives better."

But, he adds, "you can't separate the two."

Collecting the data was risky business, Siakor explains calmly, as he tells of vigorous debates within his small group about whether to go public with the information, for fear of their lives.

Soon after they published a damaging report in 2002, he immediately faced pressure and threats from Mr. Taylor's government. In 2003, Siakor decided to leave his family in Liberia while laying low in neighboring countries until 2004.

Today, Siakor says, his efforts were worth the risk. "If we hadn't acted, no other group would have," he argues. "Up to now, people have been scared."

Last spring, Siakor won one of six prestigious Goldman Environmental Prizes - the world's largest award honoring grassroots environmental activists - for his efforts, and he says it's only now that he has gained international credibility and recognition that he realizes just how hard it is to make lasting changes to government policy from the outside.

"Sometimes I think: 'Is this really worth it?' " he muses. "But then I think of what it would be like if groups like us weren't around, and it motivates me."

Siakor says that he tries to keep colleagues inspired by telling them to take stock of the "little things," the small gains they have made and are making day by day.

"Change will only continue if ordinary people remain actively engaged," he says. "Without that, it will be business as usual."

One of eight children, Siakor says that his father, a hospital worker and strict Baptist preacher, used to tell him to "leave the people thing alone," meaning "don't get involved in the government's business."

DOJ_NMG_0066277

But, now, he says, "the paradigm is changing," and people are more willing to play an active role in how they are ruled. "War made people realize that bad governance affects us all."

On India's Farms, A Plague Of Suicide (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

BHADUMARI, India — Here in the center of India, on a gray Wednesday morning, a cotton farmer swallowed a bottle of pesticide and fell dead at the threshold of his small mud house.

The farmer, Anil Kondba Shende, 31, left behind a wife and two small sons, debts that his family knew about only vaguely and a soggy, ruined 3.5-acre patch of cotton plants that had been his only source of income.

Whether it was debt, shame or some other privation that drove Mr. Shende to kill himself rests with him alone. But his death was by no means an isolated one, and in it lay an alarming reminder of the crisis facing the Indian farmer.

Across the country in desperate pockets like this one, 17,107 farmers committed suicide in 2003, the most recent year for which government figures are available. Anecdotal reports suggest that the high rates are continuing.

Though the crisis has been building for years, it presents an increasingly thorny political challenge for Prime Minister Manmohan Singh. High suicide rates and rural despair helped topple the previous government two years ago and put Mr. Singh in power.

Changes brought on by 15 years of economic reforms have opened Indian farmers to global competition and given them access to expensive and promising biotechnology, but not necessarily opened the way to higher prices, bank loans, irrigation or insurance against pests and rain.

Mr. Singh's government, which has otherwise emerged as a strong ally of America, has become one of the loudest critics in the developing world of Washington's $18 billion a year in subsidies to its own farmers, which have helped drive down the price of cotton for farmers like Mr. Shende.

At the same time, frustration is building in India with American multinational companies peddling costly, genetically modified seeds. They have made deep inroads in rural India — a vast and alluring market — bringing new opportunities but also new risks as Indian farmers pile up debt.

In this central Indian cotton-growing area, known as Vidarbha, the unofficial death toll from suicides, compiled by a local advocacy group and impossible to verify, was 767 in a 14-month period that ended in late August.

"The suicides are an extreme manifestation of some deep-seated problems which are now plaguing our agriculture," said M. S. Swaminathan, the geneticist who was the scientific leader of India's Green Revolution 40 years ago and is now chairman of the National Commission on Farmers. "They are climatic. They are economic. They are social."

India's economy may be soaring, but agriculture remains its Achilles' heel, the source of livelihood for hundreds of millions of people but a fraction of the nation's total economy and a symbol of its abiding difficulties.

In what some see as an ominous trend, food production, once India's great pride, has failed to keep pace with the nation's population growth in the last decade.

The cries of Indian farmers — or what Prime Minister Singh recently described as their "acute distress" — can hardly be neglected by the leaders of a country where two-thirds of people still live in the countryside.

Mr. Singh's government has responded to the current crisis by promptly expanding rural credit and promising investments in rural infrastructure. It has also offered several quick fixes, including a $156 million package to rescue "suicide prone" districts across the country and a promise to expand rural credit, waive interest on existing bank loans and curb usurious informal moneylenders.

But pressure is building to do more. Many, including Mr. Swaminathan, the agricultural scientist, would like to see the government help farmers survive during crop failures or years of low world prices.

Subsidies, once a linchpin of Indian economic policy, have dried up for virtually everyone but the producers of staple food grains. Indian farmers now must compete or go under. To compete, many have turned to high-cost seeds, fertilizers and pesticides, which now line the shelves of even the tiniest village shops.

Monsanto, for instance, invented the genetically modified seeds that Mr. Shende planted, known as Bt cotton, which are resistant to bollworm infestation, the cotton farmer's prime enemy. It says the seeds can reduce the use of pesticides by 25 percent.

The company has more than doubled its sales of Bt cotton here in the last year, but the expansion has been contentious. This year, a legal challenge from the government of the state of Andhra Pradesh forced Monsanto to slash the royalty it collected from the sale of its patented seeds in India. The company has appealed to the Indian Supreme Court.

The modified seeds can cost nearly twice as much as ordinary ones, and they have nudged many farmers toward taking on ever larger loans, often from moneylenders charging exorbitant interest rates.

Virtually every cotton farmer in these parts, for instance, needs the assistance of someone like Chandrakant Agarwal, a veteran moneylender who charges 5 percent interest a month.

He collects his dues at harvest time, but exacts an extra premium, compelling farmers to sell their cotton to him at a price lower than it fetches on the market, pocketing the profit.

DOJ_NMG_0066278

His collateral policy is nothing if not inventive. The borrower signs a blank official document that gives Mr. Agarwal the right to collect the farmer's property at any time.

Business has boomed with the arrival of high-cost seeds and pesticides. "Many moneylenders have made a whole lot of money," Mr. Agarwal said. "Farmers, many of them, are ruined."

Indeed, one or two crop failures, an unexpected health expense or the marriage of a daughter have become that much more perilous in a livelihood where the risks are already high.

A government survey released last year found that 40 percent of farmers said they would abandon agriculture if they could. The study also found that farming represented less than half the income of farmer households.

Barely 4 percent of all farmers insure their crops. Nearly 60 percent of Indian agriculture still depends entirely on the rains, as in Mr. Shende's case.

This year, waiting for a tardy monsoon, Mr. Shende sowed his fields three times with the genetically modified seeds made by Monsanto. Two batches of seed went to waste because the monsoon was late. When the rains finally arrived, they came down so hard that they flooded Mr. Shende's low-lying field and destroyed his third and final batch.

Mr. Shende shouldered at least four debts at the time of his death: one from a bank, two procured on his behalf by his sisters and one from a local moneylender. The night before his suicide, he borrowed one last time. From a fellow villager, he took the equivalent of $9, roughly the cost of a one-liter bottle of pesticide, which he used to take his life.

Those like him with small holdings are particularly vulnerable. A study by Srijit Mishra, a professor at the Mumbai-based Indira Gandhi Institute of Development Research, found that more than half of the suicides in this part of the country were among farmers with less than five acres of land.

But even those who are prosperous by local standards are not immune. Manoj Chandurkar, 36, has 72 acres of cotton with genetically modified seeds and sorghum in a neighboring village called Waifad. Every year is a gamble, he said.

Each time, he takes out a loan, then another and then prays that the bollworms will stay away and the rains will be good. On his shoulders today sit three loans, bringing his total debt to $10,000, a vast sum here.

The study by Mr. Mishra found that 86.5 percent of farmers who took their own lives were indebted — their average debt was about $835 — and 40 percent had suffered a crop failure.

The news of Mr. Shende's death brought his wife, Vandana, back home to Bhadumari. Relatives said she had gone to tend to her sick brother in a nearby village. By the time she arrived, her husband's body was covered by a thin checkered cloth.

A policeman had recorded the death — the eighth in six months for the officer.

Ms. Shende, squatting in the narrow village lane, shrouded her face in her cheap blue sari and wailed at the top of her lungs. "Your father is dead," she screamed at her small son, who stood before her, dazed.

Blair's Indelible Mark Is A More Open Britain (NYT)

By Roger Cohen, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, September 20, 2006

LONDON Last month, Tony Blair said this: "Though Left and Right still matter in politics, the increasing divide today is between open and closed." He went on to say, "Without hesitation, I am on the open side of the argument."

The British prime minister will be gone within a year, probably soon after the 10th anniversary in May of his arrival in power, so it's natural that his legacy is being discussed. With those few words, he pointed to a central element of his achievement and got to the heart of the matter.

Beyond Havana and Pyongyang, nobody - or at least nobody outside the French labor movement - talks seriously today about the creation of socialist societies. Even Chinese communists are Starbucks-loving capitalists.

Rather, debate and conflict center on the globalization of commerce, mores and ideas and the various reactions against this inexorable tide of American-led opening.

Whether it's the fanatical absolutists of Al Qaeda with their desire to turn back the clock to the caliphate, or the bizarre Castro-Chávez- Ahmadinejad troika with its Cuban- Venezuelan-Iranian diatribes against the West, or, more innocuously, the world's various anti-globalization cabals, the same issue returns: Is an open world a better world?

Blair's consistent answer has been yes. On issues including trade, immigration, financial markets and competitiveness, he has favored the removal of barriers. "See competition as a threat and we are already on the way to losing," he has said. Jacques Chirac, take note.

One result is that the British economy has grown by 28 percent since Labour took office in 1997, averaging close to 3 percent growth a year, with low inflation and almost full employment. Another is that the London Stock Exchange attracts far more international companies to its markets these days than the New York Stock Exchange and Nasdaq.

A less tangible consequence of Blair's stand is perhaps even more important. It is the necessarily imperfect but still palpable sense exuded by many British cities today of energy, optimism and a comfortable mingling of a many-faceted humanity.

Russian oligarchs, Polish au pairs, Indian entrepreneurs, Kenyan accountants and jobless French youths may not all love Marmite, but they have found a way to make a buck and to get along with each other and with the lads in Blair's Britain.

Which is not, of course, to say that extreme racial or religious tension has vanished - witness the Leeds suicide bombers - or that wide income disparity and substantial poverty have not persisted despite Labour's faltering efforts to spur social mobility and jump-start education.

British bleakness has not ended with Blair. If the housing market goes south - and it is already going sideways - the bleakness could spread. The British have acquired an American taste for personal debt and consumption, using their homes as collateral for skiing breaks in Chamonix and the like.

But the prime minister has never had a "little England" response to the difficulties. He has never retreated into the rich, mawkish lexicon of defeatism or the equally extensive lexicon of British bigotry.

In the place of a managed decline - the theme of the postwar decades until Margaret Thatcher's revolution - he has posited the view that Britain, even as a medium-sized power, can make a difference in the world.

If, that is, the country works alongside the United States, the open society par excellence.

Blair has always been more comfortable with a unipolar world than other European leaders. He has favored European action, but not at the expense of relations with Washington. He has had little time for the European counterweight argument trumpeted from Brussels to Madrid. His commitment to the trans-Atlantic alliance has been unbending.

This position, of course, has ushered Blair into his greatest difficulties: the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, and the unpopular support for President George W. Bush that has accompanied those struggles.

But it is worth noting that had Blair opted to side with France and Germany, rather than with Washington, over Iraq, we might be talking about the trans-Atlantic alliance in the past tense. That would almost certainly mean a more unstable world.

Blair's choices over Iraq were stark. He knew that, with or without Britain, the United States was going in. His decision, like America's, proved to be based on false arguments. That was grave. But it's possible to get into the right war for the wrong reasons, and Blair has developed a deep conviction over Iraq.

As he put it in the same speech last month in Los Angeles, "In almost pristine form, the battles in Iraq or Afghanistan became battles between the majority of Muslims in either country who wanted democracy and the minority who realize that this rings the death-knell of their ideology."

That ideology - which Blair describes as "a specifically Muslim version" of "religious extremism" - aims "not to fight for the coming into being of a Palestinian state, but for the going out of being of an Israeli state." It seeks to prevent democracy taking any hold in Iraq or Afghanistan. It fights for "a retreat into governance by a semi-feudal religious oligarchy." It forms "an arc of extremism" across the Middle East.

Blair is more honest than Bush. He makes no claims of victory or progress. "Why are we not succeeding?" he asks. "Because we are not being bold enough, consistent enough, thorough enough, in fighting for the values we believe in." The greatest problem, he suggests, has been the failure to "bend every sinew" to bring Israel and Palestine closer.

That's a not-so-oblique criticism of Bush, who has been asleep at the wheel on that front. You can be sure that, out of office, Blair will still exercise all his own sinews in favor of a two-state solution. A moralist, he believes passionately in the possibility of reconciliation through the values of open societies: freedom, democracy, the rule of law.

By being on "the open side of the argument," Blair has made an indelible mark on Britain and helped preserve the alliance on which Europe's security still depends.

IMF Consultants Inc. (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 20, 2006

"The biggest reform to the governance of the International Monetary Fund for 60 years."

So said British Chancellor of the Exchequer Gordon Brown of IMF voting reforms announced at the World Bank-IMF meetings, which close today in Singapore. If he's right, the Fund is in more trouble than we thought. Here's the big news: On Monday the IMF voted to give emerging-market countries more say in how money is distributed. South Korea's voting share, for instance, will grow to 1.3%, from 0.8%; China's will rise to around 3.7%.

Rebalancing the voting to reflect economic progress is probably overdue. But in this case it's also like rearranging flowers before a funeral. Since the collapse of Bretton Woods in 1971, the IMF has been searching for a mission. Before the days of global capital markets, it financed bankrupt governments. Later, in the 1990s, it bailed out private-sector investors who had made bankrupt bets on governments. Lately, with the world economy humming, the IMF has been scrambling for a new purpose.

The Fund's top brass seem to be steering the institution toward the role of global economic consultancy. "It's not resources that are the problem in developing countries," the IMF's director of economic research, Raghuram Rajan, told a breakfast meeting in Singapore on Friday. "What is missing is the ability to use that capital" -- implying that the IMF can help with those choices. "Policy makers need to be ready to adapt to a more difficult environment," Managing Director Rodrigo de Rato told delegates the next day.

Good advice certainly would be welcomed in developing countries, which would benefit from cleaner government and more openness to trade and foreign investment. But is the IMF the institution to provide this kind of counsel? Indonesia is still suffering from the fallout from the Fund's advice during the 1997-98 Asian currency crisis; South Korea and Thailand have only recently recovered. Argentina isn't exactly a poster child for IMF smarts (see above).

This week, too, the Fund focused on all of the wrong problems. Its meetings were peppered with talk of looming global imbalances, unstable exchange-rate regimes and the buildup of central bank reserves. These conditions have persisted for years without damage to the global economy.

Perhaps the Fund would do its 184 members a better service by focusing on strengthening economies so foreign-exchange fluctuations, for instance, wouldn't have such a large effect. It's ironic that the Fund met in Singapore, which boasts one of the most business-friendly environments in Asia, and somehow missed this point. We didn't hear one serious discussion of how low taxes, simple and clear regulatory regimes, and protection of property rights boost economic growth.

The Fund could also revert to a closer reading of its original mission, part of which was "to promote exchange stability, to maintain orderly exchange arrangements among members, and to avoid competitive exchange depreciation." Talking up the Japanese yen, just as the world's second-largest economy gets back on its feet, isn't the way forward. Nor is pressuring China to appreciate the yuan.

The IMF's fundamental mission is to be a lender of last resort. That's less needed these days, with capital freely available in most corners of the world. Many emerging-market nations whose voting rights were just boosted -- China foremost among them -- already serve as bigger lenders to the developing world than the IMF itself. That's not to say that the IMF may never be needed again. But if the IMF wants to go into the consulting business, it had better improve the quality of its advice.

TERRORISM NEWS:

White House Offers Compromise On Detainee Issue. The New York Times (9/20, Zernike, 1.21M) reports, "Seeking a deal with Senate Republicans on the rules governing the interrogation of terrorism suspects, the White House has dropped its insistence on redefining the obligations of the United States under the Geneva Conventions, members of Congress and aides said Tuesday." The "new White House position, sent to Capitol Hill on Monday night, set off intensified negotiations between administration officials and a small group of Republican senators." The "two sides were said to be exchanging proposals and counterproposals late Tuesday in a showdown that could have substantial ramifications for national security policy and the political climate heading toward Election Day." The developments "suggested that the White House had blinked first in its standoff with" Sens. John Warner and John McCain.

McClatchy Newspapers (9/20, Talev) reports the White House "appeared…to be offering dissident Republican senators a compromise on detainee legislation that would leave the language of the Geneva Conventions untouched if lawmakers preserve the CIA's terrorist-interrogation program." Sen. John Cornyn, "an administration ally, described the proposal in broad terms, saying, 'that's essentially what it does,' but stressed that 'this is still a negotiation in flux.'" Cornyn said "any deal could hinge on whether the Justice Department can provide the CIA with a legal opinion 'that, yes, what you're doing is clearly within bounds and will not expose you to liability.'" McClatchy adds that in another "sign of the administration's compromise terms, George P. Shultz, secretary of state under President Reagan and well-connected to current policy-makers, released a statement saying, 'I believe that there is a compromise that leaves the Geneva Convention alone and achieves the specificity that the administration wants.'" McClatchy adds "such terms would mark a significant concession by Bush."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/19, Blitzer) reported, "The Bush White House is trying to get rid of a big headache right now. It's disagreement with maverick Republicans about harsher interrogations of terror suspects." Senators "are working to try to craft a compromise after deciding a new Administration offer is serious, but still falls short." CNN (Koppel) added, "No one is using the word breakthrough. In fact, one Republican staffer who is close to these negotiations told me that there is only really a 50/50 chance, they believe, of any kind of a break in the impasse between now and the end of the month when Congress goes on recess. Nevertheless it does appear that both sides are taking these talks seriously."

Fox News' Special Report (9/19, Angle) reported, "Senator John Warner called discussions constructive, saying they offer a ray of optimism. Another source says the White House offered interesting ideas. Bill Frist did not reveal any new language, but saw progress in the making."

Frist Warns Dissident Republicans' Bill May Face Filibuster. The Washington Post (9/20, A4, Babington, Weisman, 748K) reports Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist "signaled… that he and other White House allies will filibuster a bill dealing with the interrogation and prosecution of detainees if they cannot persuade a rival group of Republicans to rewrite key provisions opposed by President Bush." Frist chief of staff Eric M. Ueland "called the dissidents' bill 'dead.'" The Post adds that with Congress "scheduled to adjourn in nine days, delaying tactics such as a filibuster could kill the drive to enact detainee legislation before the Nov. 7 elections, a White House priority."

Cheney Meets With Hill Republicans On Detainee Bill. CNN's The Situation Room (9/19, Koppel) reported, "Vice President Cheney came to Capitol Hill to meet privately with Senate Republicans. But on a day when others seemed eager to lower the rhetoric, the Senate Majority Leader, who also supports the president, came out swinging." Majority Leader Bill Frist: "We have several fundamental issues where there's not agreement. And the Warner, McCain, Graham approach does not meet the bottom line criteria, which, I think, is important to the safety and security of the American people."

Four House GOP Moderates Back Warner-McCain-Graham Bill. USA Today (9/20, Kiely, 2.27M) reports House Republican leaders "postponed a vote on President Bush's plan for interrogations and trials of terrorism suspects Tuesday as an intraparty revolt against the proposal widened." Four senior House Republicans "released a letter endorsing a rival bill authored by Senate Armed Services Chairman John Warner of Virginia and two GOP colleagues, Sens. John McCain of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina." The letter "was signed by Reps. Mike Castle of Delaware, Jim Leach of Iowa, Christopher Shays of Connecticut and Jim Walsh of New York, all Republican centrists."

Congress Wants Info On CIA Interrogation Tactics. The Christian Science Monitor (9/20, Chaddock, 58K) reports members of Congress "are looking for answers to very concrete questions on how the Central Intelligence Agency questions terror suspects. Is it ever appropriate, for example, to put a naked detainee in a cold cell and douse him with water? If so, for how long? Should interrogators be able to lead people to think they are drowning (a practice known as waterboarding)?" Lawmakers "thought they had settled some of these questions last December, when they passed an antitorture amendment by broad majorities in Congress. But in his signing statement, President Bush claimed executive powers to exempt members of his administration from the amendment, should circumstances warrant." Ever since, Sen. John McCain "and others have sought clarification on what, exactly, the Bush administration had ruled inbounds for detainee treatment."

Frist Voices Opposition To Warner-McCain-Graham Bill. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (9/19) if he is supports Sens. John Warner, John McCain and Lindsey Graham, who oppose the Administration's legislation on the interrogation of terrorism detainees. Frist said, "I and the overwhelming majority of Republicans are with the President of the United States. And it's really pretty clear why. And that is because a very important program that has been lifesaving, that had been used to stop terrorist attack, goes away, goes away under the Warner-McCain-Graham approach. Second issue is on the use of classified information. But, fundamentally, until we meet the criteria of being able to continue that very important program, which is lifesaving, and we don't give classified information to terrorists, I don't think that the Warner-McCain and Graham approach is going to be very much here in the United States Senate, at least among Republicans."

Frist was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (9/19) who is right on the issue, the President or McCain. Frist said, "The President," adding that "it's as simple as that because right now we have a program that is on halt, on a pause right now, because we have not been able to delivery a clear-cut definition as to what Common Article 3 means. The ambiguity there means that interrogations do not continue. It means we cannot have military tribunals, and if we have two criteria -- number one, do not give classified information to terrorists which they can use against us, and the second criteria being that we are able to continue a program that has been life-saving -- until those criteria are met and are not met by the Warner, McCain, Graham approach, until those criteria are met, we are not doing the nation's business."

Wickham Says McCain Has Right Perspective On Torture Debate. In his USA Today column (9/20), Dewayne Wickham says, "What President Bush wants from Congress is not clarity on the limits to which CIA interrogators might go in trying to get terrorism suspects to talk. He wants Congress to grant them absolution." Sen. John McCain, "a war hero who spent 5½ years as a prisoner of war, has led a bipartisan group of senators in opposing Bush's effort to have Congress legislate a U.S. interpretation of Article 3. Wisely, in rejecting Bush's proposal last week, a majority of the members of the Senate Armed Services Committee sided with the Arizona senator." On "one level, siding with these men and against Bush and Cheney, who both ducked active duty military service during the Vietnam War, is an easy call for me. But on an even more thoughtful level, McCain's opposition to Bush's legislation makes sense. It's hard enough to get warring nations to adhere to the Geneva Conventions without creating a precedent that would make it possible for other countries to conjure up their own interpretations of them to escape being branded as war criminals."

Wilson Offers Substitute Warrantless Wiretapping Bill. The AP (9/20, Kellman) reports President Bush's "stalled anti-terrorism agenda edged forward Tuesday, with a rebellious House member rewriting her bill on wiretaps more to his liking and maverick Senate Republicans reopening talks over how to handle detainees." Rep. Heather Wilson "offered to substitute her original bill on giving legal status to Bush's warrantless surveillance program with a bill that would grant a key administration request: allow wiretapping on Americans in the event of an 'imminent' terrorist attack." In exchange, "the administration would be required to share with Congress more details of the nature of the threat, presumably with the House and Senate Intelligence committees and some congressional leaders." Wilson's substitute measure, "to be considered Wednesday by the House Intelligence Committee, represents a possible breakthrough in a bitter, election-season rift between the White House and GOP leaders on one side and Republican lawmakers concerned about Bush's use of executive authority in his war on terror."

Judiciary Committee Revolt Threatens Fate Of Wilson Bill. The Hill (9/20, Sheffield) reports, "Unrest among GOP members of the House Judiciary Committee threatens to overthrow a bill co-sponsored by Chairman James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.) aimed at altering policies governing federal intelligence-gathering programs." Citing "concerns over civil liberties and program stability, GOP committee members last week forced Sensenbrenner to cancel a markup of the bill that would allow President Bush's warrantless surveillance program to continue with limited congressional oversight." Republican members say "they have enough votes to replace what they see as an unsavory bill, introduced by Rep. Heather Wilson (R-N.M.) and co-sponsored by Sensenbrenner, with a more palatable one during a scheduled markup this morning." Several GOP and Democratic committee members "are concerned that Wilson's bill would separate oversight of Bush's Terrorist Surveillance Program (TSP) from congressional oversight under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA)."

WPost Says Wilson, Specter NSA Bills Both Should Be Rejected. The Washington Post (9/20, A24, 748K) says in an editorial, "Before wrapping up business and sending members home for the fall campaign, both houses of Congress are likely to take up measures to authorize the National Security Agency's program of warrantless surveillance. The two main bills under consideration would both be disasters; they should not pass in anything like their present form." The main bill "in the Senate, by Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), was originally designed to place the NSA's program before the courts for review. Judicial review of this program could indeed be helpful, but Mr. Specter's bill, which yesterday seemed to be running into trouble in the Senate, would achieve it at an unacceptable price." In the House, Rep. Wilson's proposal "has acquired an undeserved reputation for moderation. Under her bill, all aliens who are not permanent residents would become subject to warrantless surveillance for up to a year if they are 'reasonably expected to transmit or receive foreign intelligence information' -- even if there is no suspicion of wrongdoing on their part."

Red Cross To Visit Guantanamo, Meet With High Value Detainees. The New York Times (9/20, Lewis, 1.21M) reports Red Cross officials "plan to begin a series of face-to-face visits in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, on Monday with the 14 prisoners who until this month had spent as much as four years in secret Central Intelligence Agency custody." The visits "by a team from the International Committee of the Red Cross are believed to be the first time that the detainees, who include senior operatives of Al Qaeda like Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, will get to talk with anyone outside of the world of their captors since they were taken into custody." Simon Schorno, "an official with the International Red Cross in Washington, said on Tuesday that about 10 experienced officials, including translators, will assemble this weekend in Guantánamo and begin their interviews on Monday." Schorno said, "We expect to to be able to speak in private with any detainee of our choosing." The Times adds Schorno said the priority "will be to interview the 14 recently transferred prisoners, assess their conditions and 'give them the means to communicate with their families through Red Cross messages.'" But "any information or assertions as to how they were treated under C.I.A. custody is not likely to emerge publicly anytime soon. Under the standard arrangement that allows its officials access to war-related prisoners, the Red Cross has agreed that it will not speak publicly about what it learns."

McClatchy Newspapers (9/20) reports the "12-member delegation from the International Committee of the Red Cross would be the first people not affiliated with the detentions and questioning to meet with the terrorist suspects since their arrests as long as five years ago. Afterwards, the prisoners will be allowed to fill out Red Cross message forms that will be passed to their families in what would be their first communications since their captures."

The Washington Post (9/20, A5, White, 748K) reports the meetings "will be part of a routine Red Cross visit to the U.S. military detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, said Simon Schorno, a Red Cross spokesman in Washington. About 12 officials, including interpreters, will spend about two weeks at the camp, he said." Schorno said the Red Cross "has been hoping to speak to anyone who was held in a CIA-run prison." The Red Cross "will officially register the men, one of whom is alleged Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Sheik Mohammed, and will then offer to speak to them privately, Schorno said. The meetings involve only a Red Cross delegate, an interpreter and in some cases a doctor." It is "possible that, in such discussions, the Red Cross will become the first organization outside of the Bush administration to learn about the practices in the CIA-run facilities, including the interrogation techniques used."

Gonzales Says Canadian Terrorism Suspect Was Deported, Not "Rendered." Both ABC and CBS last night picked up the story of Maher Arar, the Canadian computer scientist who was "rendered" to Syria after 9/11 and was allegedly tortured. A Canadian government report cleared Arar and his wife of terrorism suspicions and was critical of the Canadian and US intelligence agencies. However, Attorney General Gonzales said Arar was deported from the US, and that the US does not knowingly send suspects to countries where they will be tortured.

ABC World News (9/19, story 5, 2:20, Gibson) reported Arar "was wrongly accused of having any ties to terrorism." ABC (Harris) added Arar "says after four years of hell, he feels his reputation is finally clear." The Canadian government's "822-page report says Arar has no links to terrorism. And blames Canadian and US law enforcement for landing Arar in a prison." Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "says the US never sends suspects anywhere without a promise they won't be tortured." Attorney General Gonzales: "We seek to satisfy ourselves that they will not be -- they will not be tortured. We do that in every case." Harris: "But human rights activists say such promises are often meaningless. And they say the Arar might help change things."

The CBS Evening News (9/19, story 5, 2:25, Keteyian, 7.66M) reported, "Despite Arar's experience, this former counterterrorism official says rendition does have its place." John Brennan, terrorism analyst: "I think it allows us to have the option to move a person who is involved in terrorism or terrorism-related activities to a country where they can be effectively questioned or prosecuted." Keteyian: "For his part, Arar has sued both the US and Canada for damages but what he really wants is an apology." Arar: "And I think that will mean a lot to me." Ketayian: "Today Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez said Arar's case was not a rendition but a deportation adding 'I'm not aware that he was tortured.'"

FNC's Special Report (9/19, 6:16 p.m.) reported, "A Canadian judicial report has found that American authorities transferred an innocent Canadian citizen to Syria where he was tortured, this after Canadian intelligence officials gave Americans bad information -- that the man was an Islamic extremist and should be put on the Al Qaeda watch list. Maher Arar a Muslim of Syrian descent was detained for questioning in 2002 and transferred to Syria where he was beaten, he says, and made to make false confessions. They say the agents were improperly trained and did not anticipate the consequences of naming the man without sufficient evidence. He is demanding an apology from the U.S., but Alberto Gonzales says he was not aware that the Arar was tortured."

The Attorney General's defense of terrorist renditions was covered by at least three local newscasts. Usually, he was said to be defending the Administration's position. WEWS-TV Cleveland, (9/19, 6:40 p.m.) reported, "Today, attorney general Alberto Gonzales, says the U.S. never sends suspects anywhere, without a promise they won't be tortured."

WCFT-TV Birmingham, (9/19, 5:09 p.m.) reported, "Attorney general Alberto Gonzales is backing the president's strategy for interrogating terror suspects. Gonzales says CIA interrogators lack guidance on how to comply with the Geneva conventions. He says the provisions banning humiliating and degrading treatment and outrages upon personal dignity are too vague."

WRGB-TV Albany, (9/19, 5:32 p.m.) reported, "Attorney general Alberto Gonzales is continuing the Administration's push for its version of anti-terror laws. Gonzales says the Geneva conventions are too vague, and CIA interrogators need guidance, so they can observe the rule of law."

Other Commentary. In a USA Today op-ed (9/20), Andrew C. McCarthy, a senior fellow at the Foundation for the Defense of Democracies, says, "The case of Maher Arar, a Canadian Muslim allegedly tortured in Syria after being taken there by the CIA, warrants scrutiny. So, indeed, does the whole practice of rendition, a favorite of the Clinton administration long before the Sept. 11 attacks." But with "the lives of 300 million Americans at stake, the United States cannot make national security policy based on individual anecdotes about government roguishness."

In his Washington Post column (9/20, A25), Harold Meyerson says, "Why rely just on the Syrians? At the same time, as the president acknowledged this month, we ourselves (that is, CIA employees) had embarked on our own round of torture of al-Qaeda suspects, some of them the genuine article, some not. As the president asserted during his news conference Friday, that doesn't mean that we've become our enemy, that we're in any sense the moral equivalent of al-Qaeda. But it most certainly means we've abandoned our own moral and legal norms, as the administration's determination to create a loophole in the Geneva Conventions makes unmistakably clear."

USA Today (9/20, 2.27M) says in an editorial that Arar's case "is a textbook example of what can go wrong, and why Americans should be leery of embracing the harsh tactics President Bush wants applied to terror suspects." Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "said Tuesday that the hand-over of Arar to the Syrians was a deportation, not a 'rendition' — a controversial practice in which U.S. authorities turn over suspected terrorists to other countries. In this case, that seems to be a distinction without a difference."

The Washington Post (9/20, A24, 748K) says in an editorial that Arar's case "vividly illustrates a couple of the points that veteran military and diplomatic leaders have been trying to impress on Mr. Bush about the dangers of the CIA program, for which the president is demanding congressional approval." Bush "claims that the renditions, secret detentions and harsh U.S. techniques -- which most of the world regards as torture -- have yielded important intelligence. But as the military commanders who oppose such methods have insistently and courageously pointed out, it is well known that the information they produce is unreliable. Many detainees, as Mr. Arar did, will falsely incriminate themselves or others to avoid abuse."

The New York Times (9/20, 1.21M) editorializes that the Arar case and the case of AP photographer Bilal Hussein, who has been held for five months in Iraq, "illustrate vividly why Congress needs to pass an effective law on the handling of prisoners that not only provides for legal military tribunals to try dangerous men like Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, who is believed to have organized the 9/11 attacks, but also deals with the other men, perhaps hundreds, wrongly imprisoned at Guantánamo Bay, and sets rules for the future. The bills now before Congress don't meet the test. The White House's measure endorses the practice of picking up any foreign citizens the United States wants, abusing and even torturing them, and then trying them on the basis of secret evidence. It effectively repudiates the Geneva Conventions, putting American soldiers at risk."

Vermont Officials To Continue Probing Phone Records Case. The AP (9/20) reports that Vermont state regulators "plan to continue exploring whether telephone records were improperly released to the federal government even though the Justice Department has warned such an inquiry could run afoul of federal law. … 'We have jurisdiction under state law to proceed in this matter and it has not been shown that federal law pre-empts that jurisdiction,' the Public Service Board said." The AP continues, "Verizon and AT&T both operate in Vermont and news reports have suggested they might have turned over records of customer calls to the National Security Agency. Those companies' customers, Gov. Jim Douglas and the Vermont chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union urged the Public Service Board to determine whether Verizon and AT&T violated state statutes by cooperating with the NSA." The AP adds, "Verizon has said in the board's proceedings that it could not say whether it had cooperated with NSA, even if it wanted to, because federal law bars it. … But the Public Service Board said the privilege against answering the state's inquiry 'belongs to the government and must be asserted by it. It can neither be claimed nor waived by a private party.' … The federal government has declined to participate in the case before the Public Service Board and the Justice Department has said in a letter that it should be dropped. But the board says it concluded that no federal laws prevented it from pursuing the docket."

Maine Rights Group Seeks To Intervene In Phone Records Suit. The Magic City (ME) Morning Star (9/20) reports, "The MCLU went to court today to protect the privacy rights of Maine telephone customers. In a motion filed in U.S. District Court, the MCLU seeks an opportunity to have the consumers' voice heard in the Bush administration's lawsuit against the Maine Public Utilities Commission. The MCLU asked that the Verizon customers who initiated the privacy investigation at the Maine Public Utilities Commission be added to US. v. Kurt Adams et al as intervenor-defendants. … 'The Justice Department is making up the law as it goes. It's a blatant attempt to intimidate Maine's Public Utilities Commission, but it won't work,' said John Paterson, an MCLU cooperating attorney with Bernstein Shur. 'Mainers deserve to know if their privacy rights were violated.'" The Star adds, "The MCLU asserts that the DOJ has no legal basis for suing the State of Maine. The Maine Public Utilities Commission has merely asked Verizon to confirm the truthfulness of statements it had already made publicly in press releases. … 'Verizon's refusal to respond to our questions and now the Justice Department's lawsuit makes it look like Verizon has cooperated in Maine with the National Security Agency and that they are guilty of violating Mainers' privacy rights and possibly breaking the law,' said James Cowie, lead intervenor-defendant, 'The United States of America is not a place where citizens should have to expect that the government is eavesdropping on our private telephone conversations.'" The Star notes, "Today's filings follow on the heels of Attorney General Steve Rowe's vigorous defense of Maine's right to conduct an investigation. Congressmen Mike Michaud and Tom Allen have called on U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to withdraw the lawsuit. Fifteen Maine state senators and twenty-seven Maine state representatives signed a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales noting that state has both the authority and the responsibility to protect Mainers. … Maine was the third state to be sued by the federal government is this matter. The government has also sued the states of New Jersey and Missouri, and on September 6, the Department of Justice sued a fourth state, Connecticut, in an effort to prevent the state from determining whether the telephone companies or the federal government broke the law."

Albany Terror Probe Informant Testifies He Was Truthful With FBI Agent. The AP (9/20, Virtanen) reports, "An FBI informant testified Tuesday that he did whatever an FBI agent told him, even if that meant misrepresenting himself as a big import-export businessman, Islamic radical and part-time arms dealer in the FBI sting that led to terrorism charges against" Yassin Aref and Mohammed Hossain. "Shahed Hussain acknowledged cooperating with the FBI in hopes of reducing his sentence after his 2001 arrest for helping immigrants fraudulently obtain state drivers' licenses in Albany. He maintained he has been truthful since, especially with FBI case agent Timothy Coll." The AP notes,

"The credibility of the Pakistani emigre is a central issue in the case, with defense attorneys saying Hussain not only lied to their clients, but in his past business dealings as a translator at the state Department of Motor Vehicles and to the FBI concerning their clients." The AP adds, "Hussain also testified he showed the shoulder-fired missile launcher to Hossain at a videotaped meeting in November 2003, and the money transactions began in January 2004. He acknowledged that he never showed the weapon to Aref, though he did show both defendants the trigger mechanism, but only briefly while Aref was counting money."

Cheney Says "Civilized World" Depends On US In War On Terror. The AP (9/20, Raum) reports Vice President Dick Cheney "cast the global war on terror on Tuesday as a 'war of nerves,' borrowing a phrase Harry Truman used to describe the Cold War. Cheney asserted that the hopes of the civilized world depend on a U.S. victory." Speaking to the National Automobile Dealers Association, Cheney said, "We are not going to let down our guard." He said President Bush "will not relent in the effort to track the enemies of the United States with every legitimate tool at his command." Cheney "defended the administration's warrantless wiretapping and detainee programs, both subject to criticism from Democrats and some members of his own Republican party."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Study Warns Of Rising Islamic Extremism In US Prisons. The AP (9/20, Jordan) reports, "Jailed Islamic extremists with violent interpretations of the Quran are taking advantage of scarce religious monitoring programs to breed terrorists in U.S. prisons, a study released Tuesday shows. State and local prison officials struggle to track radicalized behavior by inmates or religious counselors, the joint study by George Washington University and the University of Virginia found. … 'Radicalized prisoners are a potential pool of recruits by terrorist groups,' concluded the study, released at a Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee hearing on 'homegrown' terrorists." The AP adds, "Daveed Gartenstein-Ross, a counterterrorism consultant, told senators that 'chilling' interpretations of the Quran were given to prison inmates when he worked for the al-Haramain Islamic Foundation, an international charity that served as a major al-Qaida financier."

The Christian Science Monitor (9/20, Marks, 58K) adds that the report "says it's essential for local, state, and federal correctional officials to work closely with one another as well as the FBI. Then, they say, extremists within the prison system, and those on the outside who want to exploit it, can be identified and tracked. But they acknowledge it will be a challenge, particularly since most American prisons are overcrowded, and many are understaffed. 'The really critical thing here is information,' says Jeffrey Raynor of the Institute of Law, Psychiatry and Public Policy at the University of Virginia, who co-wrote the report."

The Washington Times (9/20, Seper, 88K) reports Sen. Joseph Lieberman "said homegrown terrorism is a 'grave enough concern' that Congress needs to consider whether to focus more attention and resources on it." He noted "that although more than 80 percent of religious conversions in prison are to some form of Islam, only 10 of the 200 chaplains in the federal system are devoted to Islam."

FBI Searches Muslim Leader's Home, Islamic Charity Office. The AP (9/20, Zagier) reports from Columbia, Mo., "FBI agents searched the home of a prominent Islamic community leader and Iraq war critic, a bureau spokesman said, declining to reveal any reasons for the search. A dozen agents searched the home of Shakir Abdul-Kaf Hamoodi and his wife on Monday, FBI spokesman Jeff Lanza said. … Federal agents on Monday also raided the offices of a Southfield, Mich., Muslim charity organization, Life for Relief and Development, where Hamoodi has worked. In that raid, the warrants were based on a criminal assertion, but the affidavits were sealed, William Kowalski, an assistant special agent in the FBI's Detroit office, told the Detroit Free Press." The AP notes that the search of Hamoodi's house "came three days after bureau officials met with Muslims at a local mosque to try to improve community relations."

FBI Searched Homes Of Pilot Suspected Of Link To Wales Murder. The Seattle Times (9/20, Miletich, 217K) reports, "FBI agents conducted searches last month in the slaying of Seattle federal prosecutor Thomas Wales, combing two houses owned by an airline pilot long under investigation in the 2001 killing. Agents looked for evidence to tie the pilot to an anonymous letter sent to the Seattle FBI office in January, said a law-enforcement official, speaking on condition of anonymity because the investigation is continuing." The Times notes, "The searches represent the most visible activity in the investigation since top FBI officials stripped the case from the Seattle FBI office in June and put it under the direction of the Portland office. The move came after the head of the Seattle office tried to reduce the number of investigators on the case, sparking an outcry from law-enforcement officials in Seattle. … The investigation is a top priority of the FBI, with a $1 million reward."

New Book Says FBI, CIA Still Fall Short On Terror Counter-Intelligence. The Washington Times (9/20, A1, 88K) runs another excerpts from reporter Bill Gertz's new book "Enemies: How America's Foes Steal Our Vital Secrets -- And How We Let It Happen." Gertz writes, "The FBI, the CIA and other intelligence agencies continue to struggle to plant agents in, or recruit them from, deadly Islamist terror organizations here and abroad. The FBI, for example, did not have under way a single active investigation this past spring of al Qaeda or any Islamist group anywhere in the United States. … President Bush expects the FBI to help counter such terror threats through its new National Security Branch (NSB), a major reform he announced over internal opposition in summer 2005." Gertz adds, "Left largely unsaid in this year's debate about the president's authorizing the National Security Agency to intercept suspected terrorists' communications: The administration might not have needed to rely on the program so heavily, and risk infringing on civil liberties, were American counterintelligence not so weak."

Scientists Attempt To Design Hijack-Proof Airliner. The Washington Times (9/20, Webb, 88K) reports, "Five years after the September 11 terrorist attacks, a hijack-proof airliner still seems the impossible dream, but the next best thing to it could begin guarding the world's airways within two to four years." A "consortium of European scientists is working on a $46 million project to thwart terrorists bent on capturing and destroying an aircraft in flight after they have managed to sneak through airport security." More than "100 aviation specialists from 31 companies are involved in the project, part of a plan known as Security of Aircraft in the Future European Environment (SAFEE), to create a so-called 'last barrier to attack' by hijackers." Scientists at "one of the companies, defense giant BAE Systems in Bristol, England, say that at the heart of their work is development of a computer system that could automatically seize control of a threatened airliner and prevent a hijacker from steering it into a mountain or tall building."

8th Circuit Panel Rules Muslim Pilot Not Fired Over Religion. The AP (9/20, Salter) reports, "A Muslim pilot fired a week after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks was let go because he was seen in a bar in uniform, not because of religious bigotry, a three-judge federal appeals court panel ruled Tuesday. The panel of the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed a district court judge's ruling that Trans States Airlines did not violate discrimination laws in firing Mohammed Shanif Hussein," and "EEOC attorney Robert Johnson said the agency was still considering whether to seek a hearing before the full 8th Circuit." The AP notes a bar patron claimed Hussein raised a beer in toast to the WTC attacks, prompting an investigation. "Court documents indicate Hussein told an FBI agent that he was drinking in the bar, but did not do anything to show support for the terrorists. He said he was seen smiling not because of the attacks, but because he had just learned his wife was pregnant."

Study Says Airports Face Crisis In Baggage Screening. USA Today (9/20, Frank, 2.27M) reports the nation's airports "face a looming crisis in their ability to screen checked luggage for bombs that will require billions of dollars to avert, a new report ordered by Congress says." The study says "many airports have too few screeners and use slow, labor-intensive bomb detectors that are being overwhelmed by increasing passenger traffic." The report "criticizes how bomb detectors were installed in airports after 9/11. Because of a tight deadline, 'many if not most of the implementations were suboptimal,' it says."

Health Problems Plague Federal Air Marshal Program. The Washington Times (9/20, Hudson, 88K) reports the "size of the federal air marshal force has been cut in half by on-the-job injuries that have sidelined nearly 2,100 marshals, while squabbling prevents health and safety policies from being implemented, government officials say." Marshals say "medical staffers are quitting the Federal Air Marshal Service (FAMS) out of frustration as hundreds develop illnesses related to their heavy flying schedules such as barotrauma, decompression sickness that causes ruptured eardrums and sinus conditions often requiring surgery." They are also "developing deep vein thrombosis, a disease attributed to long periods of sitting that causes blood clots, usually in the legs, that could lead to cardiac arrest." Policies to "prevent such injuries or to determine sick leave and light duty for injured marshals are being held up by fights over wording and punctuation, said one air marshal. Others say they were fired for their disability then denied workers' compensation."

Boeing Said To Have Won SBInet Contract. The Washington Post (9/20, A1, Witte, 748K) reports on its front page that "congressional sources" said Tuesday that Boeing Co. has won a Department of Homeland Security contract to secure the nation's borders, relying "heavily on a network of 1,800 towers, most of which would need to be erected along the borders with Mexico and Canada. Each tower would be equipped with a variety of sensors, including cameras and heat and motion detectors." The company "sold its plan" for the contract, known as SBInet, "as less risky and less expensive than competing proposals that would have relied heavily on drones for routine surveillance work. … The public announcement of the award is planned for tomorrow."

The New York Times (9/20, Lipton, 1.21M) reports, "The contract will at least initially be much more limited than some industry officials had expected, valued at $80 million instead of the $2 billion estimate given for the six-year deal, the officials said." Wayne Esser, who led the Boeing bid, said it was "not a Department of Defense type of procurement. Customs and Border Protection just doesn't have that kind of a budget." The Times adds, "Members of Congress have expressed some skepticism about whether the department will be able to succeed in this border effort because of the failure of previous ones."

The Wall Street Journal (9/20, A17, Block, 2.03M) reports, "According to defense-industry officials and congressional staffers the various plans of how to make SBInet were varied, in part because the Department of Homeland Security left it up to the various companies to decide how to best protect the border, giving them unusually wide sway over a critical national security issue. Michael Jackson, deputy secretary of the Homeland Security Department, told the competing firms this year he wanted them 'to come back and tell us how to do our business.'"

Government, New York Overpaying For Freedom Tower Space. The Wall Street Journal (9/20, Frangos, 2.03M) reports the Federal Government "and New York state may be overpaying to move into the Freedom Tower, some commercial-property experts say." The Federal Government's "real-estate arm, the General Services Administration, said this week it has tentatively agreed to pay $59 a square foot for 16 floors in the yet-to-be-built skyscraper at the World Trade Center site when it opens in 2012. New York state government would pay the same rate for 11 floors." But a "look at prices for comparable space shows the government is paying more than tenants in other Lower Manhattan buildings, even factoring in possible rent inflation over the five years it will take to build the Freedom Tower."

Islamic Society of North America Elects First Female President. The New York Times (9/20, MacFarquhar, 1.21M) reports Hartford Seminary professor and Muslim convert Ingrid Mattson "this month…was elected president of the Islamic Society of North America…making her a prominent voice for a faith ever more under assault by critics who paint it as the main font of terrorism. She is both the first woman and, as a Canadian, the first nonimmigrant to hold the post. To her supporters, Professor Mattson's selection comes as a significant breakthrough, a chance for North American Muslims to show that they are a diverse, enlightened community with real roots here — and not alien, sexist extremists bent on the destruction of Western civilization. Some naysayers grumble that a woman should not head any Muslim organization because the faith bars women from leading men in congregational prayers, but they are a distinct minority."

FEMA Gives Trailer Park Residents Grace Period. The Miami Herald (9/20, Spangler) reports, "People living in government trailer parks that opened after the 2004 hurricane season have another 35 days before they have to move out, the Federal Emergency Management Agency announced Tuesday." The Herald continues, "FEMA extended a Sept. 26 deadline -- itself the six-month extension of a prior deadline -- to Oct. 31 to give trailer tenants more time to find permanent housing. Though they have said it before, FEMA officials say this new deadline is the absolute last. … 'That's what I've been told. Thirty five days and that's it,' said FEMA spokeswoman Mildred Acevedo." The Herald adds, "The last of more than 17,000 people left homeless after four back-to-back hurricanes in the summer and fall of 2004 still live in 1,161 FEMA trailers all over the state. … In places like Charlotte County, site of FEMA City -- once home to 1,500 people in 551 trailers -- extensions were needed because there was nowhere else to live. Much of that county's affordable housing was destroyed by the hurricanes, and housing costs soared. The latest extension gives 'the people who are in these units more time,' said Acevedo. 'It gives them more time to work on their paperwork, if they're purchasing their units, and more time to work on a housing plan.'" The Herald notes, "Bob Hebert, Charlotte County's director of emergency recovery, suggested another reason for the extension: Federal marshals weren't ready to evict families from the trailers. 'The property fell under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice, and the department was not ready to act on termination of leases yet,' Hebert said."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Will Meet Musharraf, Karzai. The AP (9/20) reports in a brief article, "President Bush, already scheduled to meet separately in the coming days with the leaders of Afghanistan and Pakistan, has now added joint White House talks where all three leaders can discuss regional security." Relations between the two neighbors hae been "strained" at times over the presence of terrorist hideouts along the border. Afghan officials have alleged "that Pakistan hasn't done enough to go after the remnants of the ousted Taliban regime, which Afghani leaders say have established hideouts in Pakistan along the mountainous border."

General Abizaid Says US Forces In Iraq "Unlikely" To Shrink Soon. Remarks by Centcom commander Gen. John Abizaid attracted pessimistic coverage of Iraq. All three networks covered his press conference. ABC World News (9/19, story 3, 1:55, Gibson) reported, "Turning to Iraq, there has been speculation for months about when US troops might start coming home. Military leaders had indicated a drawdown, as it's called, to begin by the end of the year. But that is not going to happen. There are 147,000 American troops today in Iraq. The top commander in the Middle East, General John Abizaid said, this level will probably will have to be sustained until next spring. Then, we'll re-evaluate." ABC (Karl) added, "More than anything, this is a recognition of reality. What you've had here for more than a year now, generals, top commanders in Iraq, have said that as conditions improve, as more Iraqi troops are trained, that Americans would begin to come home. But Abizaid made it very clear now that that has not happened. Conditions have not improved. Sectarian violence is as bad as it's ever been. That means those war plans that were drawn up to bring Americans home, will have to stay on the shelf. In fact, he said you may see an increase in American troop levels in Iraq."

The CBS Evening News (9/19, story 6, 0:20, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Thousands of American servicemen and women will not be coming home for the holidays after all, and that tops our CBS News briefing tonight. The military had hoped to cut US troop strength in Iraq to 100,000 by the end of the year, but with no letup in the violence, the head of central command, General John Abizaid said today a force of more than 140,000 will remain in Iraq at least until spring."

NBC Nightly News (9/19, story 4, , Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There's been a major admission tonight from the top US Commander in the Middle East. It's about how many American troops will be on duty in Iraq and for just how long." NBC (Miklaszewski) added, "The admission came from General John Abizaid, who predicted today that there would be no significant reduction in the number of American troops in Iraq until at least the middle of next year. There are now 147,000 American forces on the ground in Iraq and it's expected to remain at about that level through next spring. In fact, today there are 20,000 more American troops on the ground than there were only two months ago. They're there to combat the recent spike in sectarian violence and because the Iraqi security forces are still not up to the job. It's a far cry from earlier predictions when military leaders thought they could actually reduce the number of American troops in Iraq this year. But nobody around here at the Pentagon is talking about that now."

The Washington Post (9/20, Tyson, 748K) reports in a front page article, "The U.S. military is unlikely to reduce forces in Iraq before next spring because the current contingent of more than 140,000 troops is battling sectarian violence that could prove 'fatal' to the country if not arrested, the top American commander for the Middle East said yesterday." Abizaid gave a "sober assessment" and when asked "point-blank" whether the US was winning replied, "Given unlimited time and unlimited support, we're winning the war." His words "effectively ended hopes for a big troop withdrawal" this year.

The AP (9/19, Baldor) calls Abizaid's statement "one of the gloomiest assessments yet of when troops may come home." Until the recent upsurge in violence, the administration had hoped to bring back some troops from "what has become a widely unpopular war." He, "Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace are expected to meet with members of Congress later this week."

The New York Times (9/20, Cloud, 1.21M) reports that "no cutback [is] likely" before spring and calls Abizaid's comments "the first indication that senior commanders believed reductions were very unlikely until well into next year." Plans to trim US forces have been "repeatedly frustrated" by violence and the Iraqi government's "shortcomings." After the increase in forces in Baghdad, the capital has become "slightly better," but "a couple months" are needed for real improvement, he stated.

The Financial Times (9/20, Daniel) reports that Gen. Abizaid "said because of worsening sectarian violence, current US troop levels of more than 140,000 would be 'sustained through the spring and then we'll re-evaluate.'" The McClatchy Newspapers (9/20, Brown) reports that Abizaid "said it probably wouldn't be known until December whether the crackdown would have any lasting effect." He argued that having "too many" American troops in Iraq "would only 'feed extremism' and prevent Iraqis from taking responsibility for their own security."

Max Boot Calls Bush "Stubbornly Hopeful," Questions Troop Levels. In his column for the Los Angeles Times (9/20, 918K), Max Boot writes, "His steadfastness in the face of adversity is admirable. ... But there is a certain fatalism that can come from focusing so much on the long term. ... In the case of Iraq, in particular, even those of us who support the war effort question whether Bush has done enough to win. A strong case can be made that there have never been enough troops to enforce even a modicum of law and order."

Misgivings Grow About Iraqi Premier's Strength. The New York Times (9/20, Wong, 1.21M) reports, "Senior Iraqi and American officials are beginning to question whether Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki has the political muscle and decisiveness to hold Iraq together as it hovers on the edge of a full civil war." The prime minister "has failed to take aggressive steps to end the country's sectarian strife because they would alienate fundamentalist Shiite leaders inside his fractious government who have large followings and private armies, senior Iraqi politicians and Western officials say. He is also constrained by the need to woo militant Sunni Arabs connected to the insurgency." His security plan for Baghdad "intentionally avoids direct confrontation with [Moqtada al-Sadr's] militia, despite Iraqi Army generals' apparent willingness to attack the militia and despite growing violence by rogue militia elements." Unnamed "departed officials" say that President Bush's top advisers are "far more pessimistic" in private about Maliki because "he never makes any decisions."

Panel Leader Says Iraqi Premier Must "Act Now" On Security. The AP (9/20, Jelinek) reports, "U.S. experts studying what to do next in Iraq said Tuesday that the next three months are critical and Baghdad's government must make more progress toward controlling the violence and rebuilding the nation." Iraqi Study Group co-chair Lee Hamilton said that the Iraqi government had to show that it was "deserving of continued support." He and co-chair James Baker "said Baghdad's government needs to secure a capital reeling in sectarian violence, make progress on national reconciliation, and provide electricity, water, and other services that Iraqis need." Hamilton stated that Prime Minister Maliki's government "has been complete since June. The people of Iraq are looking to him urgently for leadership."

The Financial Times (9/20, Daniel) reports that the presence of Bush insider James Baker "has created hopes that the commission could chart an exit strategy from Iraq that offered a politically convenient way for the administration to change direction." In a reflection of the "poor security" in Baghdad, on a recent commission trip to Iraq, "only one member" left the Green Zone.

Iraqi Lawmakers Rap "Relentless Violence." The AP (9/20, Quinn) reports, "Lawmakers angered by relentless violence in Iraq demanded Tuesday that the defense and interior ministers explain what they are doing to put an end to the death squads that have killed hundreds of Iraqis." The angered legislators were "both Sunni and Shiite." One Shiite lawmaker "proposed special security teams to investigate the killings."

Baker's 1995 Justification For Not Ousting Saddam Is Cited. The New York Times (9/20, Pear, 1.21M) quotes two paragraphs of Hamilton's statement, including, "No one can expect miracles, but the people of Iraq have the right to expect immediate action. ... The next three months are critical." The Times also quotes from co-chair James Baker's 1995 memoir, in which he explained that he opposed ousting Saddam Hussein in 1991 "because he feared that such action might lead to an Iraqi civil war, to 'criticism from many of our allies' and to an eventual loss of American support for an occupation."

At Least 24 Killed In Iraq. USA Today/AP (9/20) reports, "At least two dozen people were killed in Iraq on Tuesday — the latest victims of a cycle of violence that the top U.S. military commander said could force the U.S. military to maintain or increase troop levels in Iraq through spring." The violence "has grown despite a security crackdown in Baghdad that began Aug. 7, when 12,000 more Iraqi and U.S. troops were brought into the city." Another AP (9/20) article reports, "Separate bombings near an army base and a police building killed at least 28 people and wounded at least 56."

US Forces Face "Hurdles" In Restoring Order. The McClatchy Newspapers (9/20, Brunswick) reports on the frustrations faced by 1st Lt. Jake Hughes and "his platoon from Apache Company of the 1-23rd Infantry." The article reports how a raid on a mosque was apparently spoiled by a tip to the targeted individuals and how another raid was based on pro-Shiite information and "appeared to focus exclusively on the homes of Sunni families." Hughes "can't wait to turn over the operation to the Iraqis." However, some progress occurs; the battalion commander remarks "that even the Iraqi police, often the wild card in the operations, showed up to provide protection along the perimeters of the search, the first time that all elements of the Iraqi security forces had participated."

Life Of Fear In Baghdad Is Described. In a human interest story, the Los Angeles Times (9/20, 918K) describes through an anonymous Iraqi employee's eyes life in Baghdad. He sees a wounded man lying in the street, whom nobody dares to help: "Then, a white Volkswagen pulled up. A passenger stepped out with a gun, walked steadily to the wounded man and shot him three times." The Iraqi states, "Fear dictates everything we do. ... Things are going from bad to worse, and I can't see any light at the end of the tunnel."

Senators Seek Declassification Of Prewar Reports. The AP (9/19, Hananel) reports, "Senators on an intelligence panel are seeking to declassify more information from two Senate reports on prewar intelligence on Iraq, saying too much was kept secret." The "bipartisan" group's letter is the "first time lawmakers have appealed to the Public Interest Declassification Board since it was established in 2004." About half of the Senate Intelligence Committee signed the letter: "[Missouri Republican Kit] Bond; [Oregon Democrat Ron] Wyden; Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif.; Mike DeWine, R-Ohio; Russ Feingold, D-Wis.; Orrin Hatch, R-Utah; and Jay Rockefeller, D-W.Va."

Judge In Saddam Hussein's Trial Replaced. Abdullah al-Amiri, the judge overseeing the second phase of Saddam Hussein's trial, was fired Tuesday amid concerns that he was showing bias toward the deposed dictator. The New York Times (9/20, Oppel, 1.21M) reports that aides Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki "said pressure had been building from Kurds and others to oust the judge after he told Mr. Hussein in court that he was not a dictator." The Times adds, "The firing was condemned by human rights advocates as improper political interference by Mr. Maliki's government, which is dominated by Shiites and Kurds persecuted during Mr. Hussein's rule. Human Rights Watch said the firing 'sends a chilling message to all judges: toe the line or risk removal.'"

The Washington Post (9/20, A18, Paley, 748K) reports that the Iraqi cabinet voted to remove al-Amiri "because it felt he was no longer impartial and his conduct had 'injured the feelings of the victims in the case,' government spokesman Ali al-Dabbagh said. 'The government wants to maintain the independence of the court without interfering with their daily work and their decisions,' Dabbagh said. 'But at the same time, they want the court to keep neutral.'"

The AP (9/20, Yacoub, Halaby) reports, "Abdullah al-Amiri was replaced on the five-member panel by his deputy in the trial, Mohammed al-Uraibiy, a court official said. The new chief judge is a Shiite Arab, as is al-Amiri." The AP adds, "An attorney defending senior officials in Saddam's former regime decried the change as purely political. 'This was a coup that succeeded. There was no legal reason for removing him (al-Amiri),' defense lawyer Badee Izzat Aref told The Associated Press. 'They (court officials) felt that he would not respond to their demands.'"

British Soldier Enters Guilty Plea To War Crime. A British soldier has pleaded guilty to inhumanely treating civilians detained in Iraq. The New York Times (9/20, Cowell, 1.21M) reports, "The plea came at the opening of a court martial of seven soldiers on war crimes charges, the first trial of British soldiers under laws binding this country to the International Criminal Court. … Three of the seven soldiers faced war crimes charges; only one, Corporal Donald Payne, 35, pleaded guilty. But he denied charges of manslaughter and perverting the court of justice. Three officers among the seven accused soldiers denied charges of 'negligently performing a duty,' meaning that they failed to control personnel under their command."

Farmers Seek To Rejuvenate Iraq's Date Industry. The Washington Post (9/20, A18, Raghavan, 748K) reports that farmers across Iraq are "trying to restore the glory days when Iraq produced about 30 percent of the world's supply of dates. … In the calculus of preventing Iraq's slide toward civil war, reconstructing Iraq's economy is a top priority. And dates are Iraq's second-biggest export, after oil. Revitalizing the industry could help reduce sectarian tensions by creating thousands of jobs while generating revenue to rebuild Iraq, improve security and lessen the country's dependence on US reconstruction dollars." The Post adds that Iraq's date industry "is showing signs of recovery, partly through US efforts. Farmers are being introduced to market-oriented capitalism after years of depending on state subsidies under the government of Saddam Hussein." The Los Angeles Times (9/19, Moore, 918K) also reports on the success of Iraq farmers.

Reconstruction Project Symbolizes Shift In US Afghanistan Strategy. The opening of a bridge over the Pech River in Afghanistan Monday is what the Christian Science Monitor (9/20, Peterson, 58K) calls an "early step in a shifting US strategy: Clear Taliban strongholds, stay on the ground long enough to reestablish government rule, deploy Afghan forces, and show fruit of reconstruction. But the stakes are high in a region that - already five years after US-led forces toppled the Taliban and their Al Qaeda allies - the American military has visited again and again, only to watch the Taliban filter back." The Monitor adds, "A similar fight-and-build strategy is being pursued by NATO troops in southern provinces."

Author Says Afghanistan's Local Police Must Be Strengthened To Fight Drugs. Author Joel Hafvenstein writes in the New York Times (9/20, 1.21M) that Afghanistan's "drug dependency is back in the headlines. … This deplorable new record will not be reversed by more belligerent counternarcotics measures. Instead, America, NATO and the Afghan government must reform a vital but neglected institution: the local police. … To reduce Afghanistan's poppy cultivation, Western governments must keep their focus on improving security. … Local police forces are the weakest link in Afghanistan's security net." Hafvenstein adds, "The poppy boom won't be solved by police reform alone, of course. The Afghan government must purge drug kingpins from the federal and provincial governments, and continue disarming militias (friendly as well as hostile)."

Group Greets Troops Headed To Persian Gulf War. The New York Times (9/20, Zezima, 1.21M) reports on a group called Maine Troop Greeters, which "was founded in 1991 to greet troops headed to the Persian Gulf war. Since May 2003, shortly after the start of the Iraq war, the group has welcomed every military transport flight that has arrived" at Bangor International Airport. The group "came about, in part, because this is the country's easternmost airport and it has one of the longest runways in the nation, making it a favored military refueling and transfer location." Maine Troop Greeters "has about 100 volunteers who operate out of the small room, which is lined with American flags, signed military T-shirts and maps of Iraq. They arrive about three hours before a flight to set out cookies donated by a local Sam's Club, pies baked by volunteers, and candy and donuts. They also make sure free cellphones donated by local providers are available for troops to use."

Three Brothers Headed To Iraq War In Same Unit. USA Today/AP (9/20, Carlton) reports on Michael, Allen and Reginald Mouton who will "ship out for the Middle East next month. It's an extremely rare instance of three brothers being sent to the same base in a combat zone." The AP adds, "Reginald is a medic who runs a battalion aid station for about 1,000 troops. Allen, 40, a first sergeant, leads about 100 soldiers in a combat group. Michael, 42, also a first sergeant, does the same in a logistical support group." The Moutons "say they take comfort in knowing they'll be together in the 3,800-member Ironhorse Brigade — the 1st Brigade of the 1st Cavalry Division — although Allen says that for the family, it amounts to 'putting all your eggs in one basket.' They are their mother's only offspring. She also has a stepson."

Old-Guard Conservatives Discuss 15th Century Venice's Lessons For US. David Ignatius writes in the Washington Post (9/20, A25, 748K) that the struggles of 15th century Venice have "a lot" to do with the US' troubles in Iraq, in the view of "a group of old-guard Washington conservatives who sponsored a conference last week to discuss the lessons for today of La Serenissima , as the 'serene republic' of Venice was known. … Now, who might be inquiring into the contemporary lessons of an empire that died more than 200 years ago? The answer is as intriguing as the conference itself. The sponsor was a little-known group called the Committee for the Republic, which was formed back in 2003 by a group of establishment Washingtonians -- paleoconservatives, one might call them -- who were concerned about neoconservative enthusiasm for foreign interventions. … A leading member is C. Boyden Gray, former White House counsel in the Bush 41 administration and a longtime amateur historian of Venice." Ignatius adds, "The quirky Venice conference is important less for any precise parallels it may offer for contemporary America than as an example of the debate that's growing among both liberals and conservatives in the wake of the Iraq war about the limits of American power."

Keane Wins IT Contract For COPS Grants. Washington Technology (9/20, Welsh) reports, "Keane Inc. won a contract from the Justice Department to deliver IT support services for a key grant program, under a contract worth $14 million over five years." WashTech continues, "Keane of Boston will supply program management and application maintenance to support help desk and network operations for the Community Oriented Policing Services Office's management system. … Keane's Public Sector practice will run the project. Teamed with Keane are Turner Consulting Group of Washington and Apptis Inc. of Chantilly, Va." WashTech adds, "The Community Oriented Policing Services Office gives grants to local governments to enhance neighborhood policing. These grants have resulted in the hiring of 118,000 police officers and the purchase of numerous technical resources since 1995. … 'CMS will allow the Department of Justice users to more effectively manage the lifecycle of the grants process: from issuance to search, to approvals in a data protected environment,' Glenn Giles, vice president and general manager of Keane's Public Sector Practice, said in a statement announcing the award."

Federal Computer Week (9/20, Hubler) reports, "According to a statement from Keane, the $14 million task order covers one base year plus four, one-year options. … During that time, the Boston-based integrator will provide a full-range of IT services -- including IT program management and application maintenance, help-desk support, and network operations -- for the COPS Management System (CMS), which oversees the agency's grant-making process and other business services." FCW adds, "Since 1995, COPS has invested $11.9 billion to advance community policing, providing nearly 36,000 state and local grants to hire more than 118,000 police officers and provide numerous technical assistance resources. … The CMS work will be performed by Keane's Public Sector practice. Turner Consulting Group and Apptis are partnering with Keane. … 'Law enforcement has found community policing to be a critical component in responding to crime, gang activity, and homeland security,' said Carl Peed, director of COPS at Justice, in a statement."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Chairman, GC Played Primary Roles In HP Leak Probe. The Wall Street Journal (9/20, A3, Waldman) reports, "As early as summer 2005, Hewlett-Packard Co. Chairman Patricia Dunn and General Counsel Ann Baskins helped direct the company's board-leak investigation, as part of the planning and execution of many steps of the probe, internal H-P emails suggest." The Journal continues, "H-P has disclosed only that Ms. Dunn and an 'internal group' inside the Palo Alto, Calif., company, working with outside investigators, conducted the leak probes in 2005 and 2006. Ms. Dunn has said in interviews that she couldn't supervise the investigation because, as one of the H-P directors being investigated for leaking information to the media, she was a potential target of the probe. Instead, Ms. Dunn has said, she turned to H-P's security department to handle it. … However, H-P emails reviewed by The Wall Street Journal suggest that Ms. Dunn and Ms. Baskins were closely involved in helping direct the course of the investigation. The emails indicate that the two were kept well informed of the investigation's tactics and progress by the H-P security officials who ran the probe, as well as by some of the private investigators H-P hired to assist the computer company."

The Washington Post (9/20, D1, Nakashima, Noguchi, 748K) reports that a consultant's report prepared for HP says the spying effort "was wide-ranging and included physical surveillance, photographs and spyware sent via e-mail, and it also targeted wives and other relatives of HP board members and reporters, according to a consultant's report prepared for the company. The Feb. 10 report, obtained by The Washington Post, summarized in eight pages how investigators, to identify an internal leak of confidential HP information, surreptitiously followed HP board member George A. Keyworth II while he was giving a lecture at the University of Colorado. They watched his home in Piedmont, Calif. They used photographs of a reporter to see if the reporter met with him. And they tried to recover a laptop computer stolen from him in Italy so they could analyze its contents." The Post adds, "The report, prepared by a consulting firm in Needham, Mass., hired to investigate leaks to the media, was sent to four HP executives, including HP's ethics director. That suggests that senior HP employees were aware of the spying tactics used as early as February."

HP Executives To Testify Before Congress. HP Chairman Patricia Dunn and HP General Counsel Ann Baskins will testiofy on Capitol Hill about their involvement in a boardroom spying scandal. The Financial Times (9/20, Allison, Kirchgaessner) reports that the two HP executives "will appear before the House Committee on Energy and Commerce on September 28 and are expected to testify, according to a committee spokesperson. Larry Sonsini, a veteran Silicon Valley lawyer and HP's outside counsel, has also agreed to testify. Lawmakers on the committee are expected to vote on Wednesday on a measure that would give committee chairman Joe Barton and John Dingell, the highest ranking Democrat on the committee, the power to fast-track subpoenas for information from HP."

The San Francisco Chronicle (9/20, C - 1) reports, "Hewlett Packard Co. Chairwoman Patricia Dunn has agreed to answer questions from a congressional panel investigating the company's controversial probe of internal leaks to the media, the Palo Alto giant said Tuesday." The Chronicle continues, "Also planning to testify Sept. 28 before the House Energy and Commerce Committee will be HP's in-house counsel Ann Baskins and outside counsel Larry Sonsini, chairman of Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, a prominent Silicon Valley law firm." The Chronicle adds, "Their decision suggests that, while the HP probe turned into an embarrassing scandal, Dunn, Baskins and Sonsini are confident they did not do anything wrong and have nothing to hide from lawmakers who are expected to ask them tough questions, analysts say. … But the hearings in Washington, D.C., will likely shed more light on HP's use of false identities and other questionable tactics to obtain personal information on directors, employees and journalists. … The three could have refused the invitation, although legal experts say that could have prompted the panel to issue subpoenas in order to compel them to testify."

The AP (9/20, Gordon) reports, "With federal and California prosecutors conducting criminal investigations of HP's use of deceptive tactics to find a boardroom leaker, some experts say the executives' testimony to Congress could be fraught with legal peril. … On the other hand, the risks of invoking their Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination - as a parade of corporate executives have done on Capitol Hill in recent years - could be even greater, according to others." The AP adds, "In appearing before the panel, the two executives of Silicon Valley's largest and oldest technology company will be stepping into the highly charged and well-choreographed theater that is a congressional hearing. Enduring hours of questioning, business executives often sit at witness tables as they are vilified by lawmakers before television cameras."

Bloomberg (9/20, Stern, Guglielmo) reports, "Outside investigator Ronald DeLia, who was also asked to appear, told the House committee he is likely to cite his Fifth Amendment right not to incriminate himself during the Sept. 28 hearing, said the aide, who asked not to be identified." Bloomberg adds, "The Energy and Commerce Committee made a second round of requests today for testimony at a hearing on Hewlett-Packard's probe. The company's global security manager, Anthony Gentilucci, and private investigator Joe Depante, owner of Action Research Group in Melbourne, Florida, were asked to testify, the panel said in a statement. Hewlett-Packard's outside lawyer, Larry Sonsini, was also called. … The committee asked for information about Hewlett-Packard's probe on Sept. 11, after the Palo Alto, California-based company acknowledged investigators used fake identities to collect the private phone records of two employees, some directors and nine journalists to uncover the source of news leaks. The House is investigating the practice, called 'pretexting.'"

Florida Man Asked To Testify. Florida Today (9/20, Blake, Balancia) reports, "A congressional subcommittee has asked a (Florida) private investigator to testify as part of the panel's probe of the corporate-spying scandal at computer giant Hewlett-Packard Co." Florida Today continues, 'The House of Representatives' Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigation sent a letter to Joseph DePante, owner of Brevard County-based Action Research Group, asking him to testify and answer questions on the 'Hewlett-Packard Pretexting Scandal' during a Sept. 28 hearing in Washington. … Terry Lane, a spokesman for the House Committee on Energy and Commerce, which oversees the subcommittee probing the case, did not specify what DePante's connection was to the Hewlett-Packard case, but said investigators want to know what DePante might know. … 'Our investigators have been looking into this for a few days, and to send him a letter, it's an indication that he has some knowledge of what Hewlett-Packard did,' Lane said. 'We went through the effort to send him a letter, so, obviously, we feel he has information that will be helpful to the investigation.' … Lane said the letter sent to DePante 'is not a subpoena. It's an option to appear. You can decline or you can appear.'"

Investigators Examine Omaha Detective's Role In HP Scandal. The New York Times (9/20, Richtel, 1.21M) reports, "Investigators are exploring the role of a man in the Omaha area who may have obtained private phone records in the Hewlett-Packard spying case, according to people briefed on the company's review of the operation. The man, Brian Wagoner, has spent several years working for Action Research Group, a Florida detective agency that is among the investigative firms linked to the Hewlett-Packard operation, according to a relative of Mr. Wagoner's." The Times adds, "The identification of Mr. Wagoner as a possible participant provides a potentially critical link in a chain that has stretched from Hewlett-Packard's sprawling Silicon Valley headquarters to detective agencies in Boston and Florida hired to" identify company directors who leaked information to journalists.

Attorneys For HP Hire Lawyers. The California Recorder (9/20, Scheck) reports, "The combined weight of investigations by state prosecutors, federal regulators and the Department of Justice has forced lawyers in Hewlett-Packard's boardroom mess to get their own attorneys." The Recorder continues, "Ann Baskins, the HP general counsel, has hired Berkeley, Calif., white-collar specialist Cristina Arguedas. Kevin Hunsaker, the HP senior counsel and ethics director -- who the New York Times has reported was in charge of the boardroom leak investigation -- has hired San Diego solo Michael Pancer, who also specializes in white-collar criminal cases." The Recorder adds, "In addition to the in-house lawyers, the Wall Street Journal's online edition reported Tuesday that top Silicon Valley lawyer Larry Sonsini, who advises HP's board, has hired Michael Madigan, a Washington, D.C.-based partner at Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, to represent him in connection with an upcoming congressional subcommittee hearing on the matter. … Arguedas, a partner at Arguedas, Cassman & Headley, has represented a string of clients caught up in high-profile investigations -- most recently Nancy Heinen, the former general counsel of Apple Computer, a company now under scrutiny for its stock options practices."

NYTimes Says HP Scandal Should Be An Example To Other Institutions. An editorial in the New York Times (9/20, 1.21M) says the battle at HP "offers up two useful lessons. It should remind those of us watching from the sidelines just how porous our privacy is in an era of databases and hackers and sophisticated snoops, and how much we need greater legal safeguards and protections to keep pace with the technological advances. Institutions should take a very different lesson away: That their reputations are only as good as the people they hire." The Times adds, "As head of the board, it was Ms. Dunn's responsibility to ensure that the company's standards were met in any investigation, no matter who was tasked with the job. We hope that Hewlett-Packard's mistakes provide an instructive example to the ethically impaired."

Prudential Deal Sparks Debate Over Definition Of "Nonprosecution Agreement."

Corporate Counsel (9/20, Reisinger) reports, "As if the nuances of corporate governance aren't tough enough to fathom, now the government is playing word games. On Aug. 28, Prudential Financial, Inc., signed what it thought was a nonprosecution agreement with Michael Sullivan, the U.S. Attorney in Boston. But once the deal was done, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty called a press conference in Washington, D.C., to trumpet the 'deferred prosecution agreement.'" Corporate Counsel continues, "McNulty's comment has led some corporate advocates to question the government's credibility. The question of what to call the Prudential pact isn't just a matter of semantics -- a deferred prosecution deal carries more of a stigma than a nonprosecution agreement." Corporate Counsel adds, "Everyone involved in the Prudential case at least agrees that the settlement ends the government's three-year criminal probe of one of the company's subsidiaries. Boston-based Prudential Equity Group admitted that some of its brokers illegally timed mutual fund trades to benefit big hedge fund clients. But there's a split on whether to call the deal a deferred or a nonprosecution agreement. … In an NPA, no charge is filed in court, but the government can still file and prosecute a charge later if the company violates the terms of the deal. In a DPA, the government files the criminal charge in court but doesn't prosecute the claim. If the company abides by the terms of the DPA, the government dismisses the charge when the agreement expires. If not, the government can prosecute the already-filed charge. … A spokesman for the Justice Department in Washington stands by McNulty's characterization of the Prudential deal as a DPA. 'This is a deferred prosecution agreement [because] it provides for the filing of charges in the event of a breach,' the spokesman says. Prudential spokesman Bob DeFillippo disagrees, saying, 'I don't know why people call it what they call it, but it is a nonprosecution agreement.'"

Options Scandal Expands To Monster, Broadcom. The Wall Street Journal (9/20, Forelle, Bandler) reports, "Monster Worldwide Inc. suspended its general counsel and Broadcom Corp.'s finance chief retired ahead of schedule, as the fallout from the options-manipulation scandal continued to spread." The Journal continues, 'Both Monster and Broadcom have disclosed problems with their stock-options accounting. Earlier this month, Broadcom, a chip maker based in Irvine, Calif., doubled its estimate of the hit to its books, suggesting it will make a restatement to increase its past expenses by more than $1.5 billion. That would be the largest restatement so far in the present crop of options cases." The Journal adds, "Monster, for its part, has said it may restate a number of years' financial results. Yesterday, the New York company, which is the parent of job-search site Monster.com, said such a restatement was 'very likely.' … In a short statement, Monster said longtime general counsel Myron Olesnyckyj was suspended 'effective immediately,' though it didn't say precisely why. Broadcom said William J. Ruehle, who had served as chief financial officer since 1997, 'decided to accelerate his retirement as a result of' its internal options review."

Bloomberg (9/20, Brennan) reports, "The (Broadcom) departure follows Broadcom's announcement on Sept. 8 that costs related to the irregularities doubled, the most for any company in the widening scandal over stock options. At least 130 companies are conducting internal reviews of their stock-option grants or face federal investigations into whether they manipulated grant dates to enrich executives. … A board committee is still reviewing the options and hasn't reached any conclusions, Broadcom said. The company, whose chips are used in a variety of consumer electronics products including networking equipment and wireless headsets, first said it would restate results on July 14, estimating option-related costs of $750 million at the time."

The Los Angeles Times (9/20, Granelli, Chmielewski) reports, "As companies complete their reviews, they want to say that no current executives or directors were involved in questionable transactions, said Michael D. Cohen, research director at Pacific American Securities in San Diego. 'Part of the reason for the damage control is not only to give shareholders confidence but also to deflect further scrutiny from regulators.'" The Times adds, "Tech companies are under scrutiny for manipulating the timing of option awards to maximize the potential upside. For instance, companies could grant options on days when the stock is depressed by bad news. In some cases, companies engaged in so-called backdating, or changing the date of an option grant retroactively to match dips in the share price. … In many cases, experts believe, nothing illegal was done, but the Justice Department is examining more than 45 companies. Two former executives of Brocade Communications Systems Inc. in San Jose have been charged with securities fraud."

SEC Accountant Issues Options Guidelines. The Wall Street Journal (9/20, Reilly) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission's chief accountant issued guidance on how companies should account for employee stock options in light of regulators' probes into 'backdating' of this type of compensation. … But chief accountant Conrad Hewitt made clear that in considering problems related to options accounting the commission would distinguish between honest mistakes, such as paperwork errors, and those that showed a company was trying to game accounting rules. Mr. Hewitt's tone echoed previous comments made by SEC Chairman Christopher Cox that indicated the commission would look closely at a company's intent when investigating possible backdating practices." The Journal continues, "Mr. Hewitt's letter laid out examples where questions have arisen over whether a company should have taken an expense for options under the old accounting rules. In cases where companies picked an exercise price over a 30-day period, for example, they generally should have recorded an expense for the options, the letter said. However, so-called springloading of options, where companies grant options ahead of good news, doesn't result in an accounting issue, the letter said."

Cox Defends Sarbanes-Oxley. SEC Chairman Chris Cox yesterday issued a defense of the Sarbanes-Oxley law saying that many of its elements had been adopted by other regulators overseas. The Financial Times (9/20, Grant) reports that Cox's comments "came at a hearing where US lawmakers will grill the heads of the two regulatory agencies responsible for overseeing implementation of the controversial Sarbanes-Oxley auditing and compliance law. … Mr Cox said, 'As we consider the effect of Sarbanes-Oxley on US competitiveness, it is important to keep in mind how broadly many of its tenets have been taken up over seas.'"

CRIMINAL LAW:

Gonzales Urges Internet Data Retention To Combat Child Pornography. CNET News (9/20, McCullagh, Broache) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Tuesday stepped up his efforts to lobby for federal laws requiring Internet providers to keep track of what their customers do online." CNET continues, "Gonzales asked senators to adopt 'data retention' legislation that would likely force Internet providers to keep customer logs for at least a year or two. Those logs, often routinely discarded after a few months, are intended to be used by police investigating crimes. … 'This is a national problem that requires federal legislation,' Gonzales said during a Senate Banking Committee hearing. 'We need to figure out a way to have ISPs retain data for a sufficient period of time that would allow us to go back and retrieve it.'" CNET notes, "As the November election approaches, politicians have been devoting an unprecedented amount of attention to the topic of children, pornography and the Internet: At least three committees are holding hearings on the subject this week alone. … It's unclear what the prospects are for mandatory data retention in Congress this year, or whether politicians will delay action until 2007. One senior House Republican drafted a bill but then backed away from it, and a Democratic proposal has not been voted on. … But with the Bush administration firmly behind the concept, and with state and local law enforcement lending a hand in the lobbying efforts and saying such mandates would help protect children, industry groups and privacy advocates may be hard-pressed to head off new regulations."

The AP (9/20, Yen) reports that Gonzales "called the government's lack of access to customer data the biggest obstacle to deterring child porn. … 'We have to find a way for Internet service providers to retain information for a period of time so we can go back with a legal process to get them,' he said." The AP adds, "Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller have met with several Internet service providers, including Time Warner Inc.'s AOL, Comcast Corp., Google Inc., Microsoft Corp. and Verizon Communications Inc. .. . The law enforcement officials have indicated to the companies they must retain customer records, possibly for two years. The companies have discussed strengthening their retention periods — which currently run the gamut from a few days to about a year — to help avoid legislation." The AP notes, "At Tuesday's hearing, Gonzales said he agreed with the sentiment of 49 state attorneys general who in a June letter to Congress expressed support for a federal law that would require longer retention of customer records. … 'We respect civil liberties but we have to harmonize this so we can get more information,' he said." USA Today (9/20, 5A, 2.27M) reports Gonzales and Mueller "want providers to retain customer records for up to two years. … Gonzales testified to a Senate panel that law enforcement's needs trump concerns that legislation might be overly intrusive and encroach on customers' privacy rights." Gonzales said, "This is a problem that requires federal legislation. We need information. I nformation helps us make cases. … We respect civil liberties, but we have to harmonize this so we can get more information."

ABC News (9/20, Ryan) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Ernie Allen, the head of the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children (NCMEC), said today that they hoped to eliminate child pornography from commercial Web sites entirely by 2008. … Their plan: Close down the financial networks that peddle images showing children and even infants being sexually abused." ABC continues, "Appearing before the Senate Banking Committee, Gonzales said, 'These are shocking images that cry out for the strongest law enforcement response possible. … This is an important fight for the future of our country.'" ABC adds, "Since the late 1990s, the scourge of child pornography has spread internationally as pedophiles have found individuals with the same thinking around the world in just a few keystrokes on the Internet. … Online child porn is now a billion-dollar-a-year underground industry, and one of the fastest-growing businesses on the Internet. … 'While the Internet is undoubtedly one of the greatest inventions of our generations, it has also greatly facilitated the exploitation of children,' Gonzales said."

FNC's Big Story (9/19, 5:26 p.m.) reported, "Well, child pornography is the issue as attorney general Alberto Gonzalez testifies on Capitol Hill. He has been telling senators that Congress should require internet service providers to preserve customer records. Gonzalez says prosecutors need them to fight on line child predators. He acknowledged concerns over privacy rights but said the growing threat posed to children on the internet is just too great."

Local Television. Attorney general Alberto Gonzales's testimony on Capitol Hill on child pornography received moderate coverage by local television newscasts; scores of stories on it were run by scores of local stations. In general, the problem was characterized as rapidly growing and a serious problem the government is dealing with. Some examples: WFMZ-TV Philadelphia, (9/19, 5:09 p.m.) reported, "Senators are getting a lesson on how the Justice Department is targeting child pornographers and their finances. Attorney general Alberto Gonzales testified today before a Senate committee about his 'project safe childhood.' It's a program that tracks pornographers' financial records and the internet traces they leave behind."

KXAS-TV Dallas, (9/19, 4:34 p.m.) reported, "U.S. attorney general Alberto Gonzales today Congress that child pornography is exploding on the internet, but he says law enforcement at all levels is working to smash this multi-billion dollar global industry within two years."

WVIT-TV Hartford, (9/19, 5:42 p.m.) reported, "U-S attorney general Alberto Gonzales today told Congress that child pornography is exploding on the internet. Even so, the Attorney General said law enforcement at every level is working to disrupt the business."

KGO-TV San Francisco, (9/19, 11:12 a.m.) reported, "Today U.S. attorney general Alberto Gonzales testified about the need for measures to fight child pornography over the internet. … He did acknowledge customers civil liberties but the online threat is too great."

WDJT-TV Milwaukee, (9/19, 10:22 p.m.) reported, "Attorney general Alberto Gonzales says federal legislation is needed in order to do that. He says state and federal prosecutors say they can't get to some of the violators with the current laws. Gonzales also told some skeptical senators that any changes must respect civil liberties and privacy rights."

ID Theft Task Force Issues Recommendations. The AP (9/20, Yen) reports, "Federal agencies should restrict their use of Social Security numbers to guard against identity theft, a presidential commission said Tuesday." The AP continues, "The Identity Theft Task Force, which was created in May, also urges greater penalties against identity thieves and creation of a 'universal police report' to help police and victims track complaints. … 'When we look at the problem of identity theft, we are reminded that the same technological advances that have improved our lives have also given new and broad opportunities to criminals,' Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said at a briefing announcing the proposals. … The recommendations, Gonzales said, are a first step to creating practical solutions." The AP adds, "Under the plan, the task force urges the government to review the uses of Social Security numbers as employee identification and determine ways in which it can conceal or eliminate their use in agency systems and paper and electronic forms. … It calls on Congress to amend criminal laws so that identity-theft victims can recover for their hours lost disputing fraudulent accounts with creditors or correcting credit reports." USA Today (9/20, 5A, 2.27M) notes, "The initial recommendations come as the government has struggled with high-profile data breaches. At least 10 agencies in recent months have reported such incidents, which included the loss of a laptop and external drive containing information for 26.5 million veterans and active-duty troops. That equipment was later recovered."

InformationWeek (9/20, Claburn) reports, "Victims of identity theft should be allowed to seek restitution from defendants for time spent undoing damage from the offense, according to interim recommendations issued Tuesday by a federal task force on ID theft. … 'As with any crime, victims of identity theft suffer feelings of violation and stress, but in these cases, victims have the added burden of cleaning up the mess that the identity thieves leave behind,' said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales in a statement. 'The President created the Identity Theft Task Force to oversee the implementation of real and practical solutions at the federal level to defeat this ongoing intrusion into the lives of law-abiding Americans. Today's recommendations move that process forward.'" IW adds, 'The Task Force issued seven recommendations These include 1) directing the Office of Management and Budget to issue guidance to federal agencies on how to handle data breaches; 2) strengthening data security in the government; 3) accelerating and broadening the review of where social security numbers are used by agencies; 4) establishing a new 'routine use' by which agencies would be allowed to share information otherwise restricted by the Privacy Act to facilitate responding to a data breach; 5) holding workshops for academics and businesses to develop better methods to authenticate identities; 6) amending criminal statutes to allow identity theft victims to seek restitution from defendants for time spent undoing damage from the offense; and 7) developing a universal police report to make it easier to report identity theft and enter it into existing systems."

InfoWorld (9/20, Gross) reports, "The President's Identity Theft Task Force, which met Tuesday, also recommended that U.S. agencies examine whether their use of Social Security numbers is necessary and called on an interagency working group on ID theft to develop best practices for data security in government. … The U.S. government needs to lead by example in protecting consumers from ID theft, Deborah Platt Majoras, chairwoman of the U.S. Federal Trade Commission (FTC), said. … 'Identity theft truly is a direct assault on our citizens and attacks the very foundation of the information economy,' Majoras said in a joint press conference with U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales." InfoWorld adds, "About 4 percent of U.S. residents are ID theft victims every year, Gonzales said. Bush established the task force because of 'the prevalence of this crime, combined with the lingering burdens and effects on victims,' Gonzales said."

AP Analysis Of FBI Data Ranks NYC Safest Large US City. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (9/20) reports, "New York was the safest of the nation's 10 largest cities in 2005, with about one crime reported for every 37 residents, according to an Associated Press analysis of FBI statistics. … The large city with the highest crime rate was Dallas." Los Angeles "ranked third safest," and "San Jose took the No. 2 spot, while San Diego ranked fourth. … The AP's calculation ranked cities by the total number of crimes reported per resident and did not distinguish between violent crimes and property crimes. The FBI said in its report that it makes a point not to rank cities, saying 'they provide no insight into the many variables that mold the crime in a particular town, city, county, state, or region.'"

San Jose Disputes NYC Claim Of Safest Big City. Bay City News Wires (9/20) reports, "New York City is proclaiming itself the 'Safest Big City in America'' based on new FBI statistics released this week but a spokesman for San Jose Mayor Ron Gonzales today disputed the Big Apple's claim." Gonzales spokesman David Vossbrink "said San Jose's claim might still be accurate. 'We've always based our claim on (an independent) analysis of the FBI stats that comes out each year around Thanksgiving,' Vossbrink said. New York City's analysis of the FBI's 2005 Crime in the United States annual report does not take into account how some crimes, especially violent crimes, may have more impact on a community's feeling of safety than other crimes." BCN notes, "The FBI does not rank cities by crime rate in its annual report."

Philadelphia Violent Crime Rate Worst Among Large Cities. The Philadelphia Inquirer (9/20, Boyer, Mucha, 399K) reports, "When it comes to violent crime among America's largest cities, Philadelphia is the worst, the FBI reported this week. However, when overall crime, which includes nonviolent offenses such as burglary and theft, is considered, the city drops to No. 5, while Dallas tops the list." The Inquirer adds, "At least one local crime expert and several law enforcement officials -- reviewing national numbers yesterday -- said violence in Philadelphia is not as bad as it appears based on the FBI numbers, which they say can be deceiving." Penn criminologist Lawrence Sherman said that "if Philadelphia, with a population of 1.47 million, is compared with cities closer to 100,000 in population, not just those with about one million or more, the city is nearer to the middle of the list in violent crime."

Conrad Burns' tough re-election campaign, said late Tuesday the senator is not the target of a federal corruption investigation centered on disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff." The Gazette continues, "Iverson said Burns' personal criminal defense attorney, Ralph Caccia, spoke with Justice Department employees Tuesday afternoon. The employees said Burns is not the target of the investigation. … Iverson was responding to statements made by Montana Democratic Party Executive Director Jim Farrell to television reporters regarding Burns' involvement in the scandal. 'The comments made yesterday by Jim Farrell are patently false and without merit,' Iverson said." The Gazette adds, 'Iverson said Caccia himself would not speak to reporters. He also said he didn't know if any former Burns staff members may be part of the investigation. Farrell said the campaign should make Caccia available for questions. He also released a long list of news articles that have reported that Burns is part of the investigation. … 'We need to hear directly from Senator Burns' criminal defense attorney himself, who must positively confirm to the media and to the people of Montana that he spoke with representatives of the U.S. Department Justice on this matter,' Farrell said. … The Justice Department has steadfastly refused to comment on the ongoing investigation.

Washington State Mayor Indicted On Bribery Charges. The Spokane Spokesman-Review (9/20, Morlin) reports, "The former mayor of Airway Heights and the former operator of Spokane Raceway Park both are named in a federal grand jury indictment accusing them of multiple counts of public corruption. The charges against Dale R. Perry stem from his financial involvement with Orville Moe, the embattled former operator of Spokane Raceway Park." The Spokesman-Review notes, "The investigation by agents of the FBI and the Washington State Gambling Commission culminated with the four-count indictment returned Tuesday," which alleges "Perry 'corruptly solicited' money from Moe after earlier similar unsuccessful attempts to secretly get money from Paul Sandifur, the president of Metropolitan Mortgage and Summit Properties, and Northern Quest Casino officials Tom Lien and Marianne Guenther."

The AP (9/20) reports, "The indictment alleges Moe…loaned Perry $18,000 in October 2002 and another $109,000 in October 2004. The government alleges the loans were actually bribes in return for Perry's refraining from voting on an admissions tax on Spokane Raceway Park, an auto racing complex, and his later vote to repeal the tax enacted in November 2003, Rice said." The AP notes, "Agents with the FBI and the state Gambling Commission raided Perry's home and office in April 2005."

The AP continues, "Rita St. George, a psychologist at the medium security prison in Moose Lake, Minn., also testified Monday that she was worried Rodriguez might commit more crimes after his release. A follow-up interview with him in February eased some of those fears, she said, but she wished she had raised more questions with her superiors about Rodriguez's release." The AP adds, 'In January 2003, she said, Rodriguez told her he was 'very frightened.' A month later, she said, he was doing better and 'he had no thoughts of hurting himself or others.'" The AP notes, "St. George was among the last witnesses to be called by attorneys for Rodriguez, 53, of Crookston, Minn., as his trial enters its final stage. Jurors may begin deliberating later this week over whether he should be sentenced to death or life in prison for the killing of University of North Dakota student Dru Sjodin. … The verdict by the federal court jury of seven women and five men must be unanimous for Rodriguez to be sentenced to death. He was convicted late last month of kidnapping resulting in Sjodin's death."

Mobster Probed For Plotting To Kill Judge. The New York Times (9/20, Rashbaum) reports, "Vincent Basciano, a fastidious and mercurial mob figure who could face the death penalty at his federal trial on charges that include conspiring to kill a prosecutor, is now under investigation for plotting to kill the judge who is to preside over his case, according to court papers made public yesterday." The Times continues, "The investigation, by the F.B.I. and federal prosecutors in Brooklyn and Manhattan, centers on a list that Mr. Basciano wrote in jail that names the judge, Nicholas G. Garaufis, of United States District Court in Brooklyn and four other people who prosecutors say he sought to have killed, the court papers and several people with knowledge of the inquiry said." The Times adds, "Besides Judge Garaufis, the people named on the list include three Mafia turncoats who testified against Mr. Basciano at another trial this year and the prosecutor he is accused of plotting to kill, according to an Aug. 28 letter that prosecutors wrote to defense lawyers. The letter was initially sealed, but was publicly filed yesterday after a reporter made inquiries about the case. … While an F.B.I. handwriting analysis concluded that Mr. Basciano wrote the list, and he has acknowledged doing so, he denies that he was plotting to kill anyone on the list, according to those with knowledge of the inquiry. .. . Instead, he maintains that he compiled the names as part of a plan to use Santeria, a religion in the Caribbean region, to lift the evil spells that he contends were placed on him by the judge, the turncoats and the prosecutor — far from a conventional tactic by traditional Mafia standards, the people said."

The New York Daily News (9/20, Marzulli, 729K) reports that Basciano gave the list "to another inmate at the Metropolitan Correctional Center in lower Manhattan, according to a letter unsealed by prosecutors yesterday. … The unidentified inmate turned the list over to the government in August, which responded by throwing Basciano into solitary confinement with no visitors. 'Forensic analysis by the FBI laboratory has confirmed that the handwriting on the note is a positive match to Basciano,' prosecutor Winston Chan said." The Daily News adds, "Adding to Basciano's woes, the feds made public a letter the married gangster wrote to a girlfriend from jail, which was used to confirm his handwriting." The New York Post (9/20, Haberman, 608K) notes, "Atop the list was Assistant U.S. Attorney Greg Andres. It's the second time Basciano has conspired to kill him, the feds said. … The mob big hates Andres, who has decimated the crime family through numerous convictions, the feds said. … Two of three rats Basciano put on his hit list testified at the trial: one-time protégé Dominick Cicale and lawyer Thomas Lee, who was busted passing jailhouse notes between Basciano and Bonanno ex-godfather Joe Massino."

He asked for a sentence of up to three years. … 'It is our view that he has cooperated honestly, openly and thoroughly,' Smiley's attorney, Richard Reeve, wrote." The New York Times (9/20, Cowan, 1.21M) adds "Reeve argued that the 'consequences of the case could be highly beneficial' to the institutions if 'the hard lessons' it taught led them to enhance security and update their inventories."

Assistant U.S. Atty. Kevin Lally told a Los Angeles federal jury that Joann Wiggan 'brazenly committed perjury by telling lie after lie' about her contact with Ray Turner, another onetime SBC employee accused of aiding Pellicano's alleged criminal enterprise." The Times notes, "The alleged contact between Wiggan and Turner is considered significant to authorities because two other former SBC employees have admitted that they improperly provided confidential information about SBC customers to Turner. Wiggan's trial is expected to last a week and is the first resulting from the investigation of Pellicano and others by the FBI and U.S. attorney's office."

The Journal continues, "Super Micro, a San Jose, Calif., producer of servers, motherboards, and power supplies, agreed to pay a $150,000 fine. … Super Micro pleaded guilty to selling 300 motherboards to a company in Dubai knowing the items were to be shipped to Iran, the Justice Department said. At the time, it was illegal to export the motherboards to Iran without a license, prosecutors said. The products are no longer subject to such restrictions, the Justice Department said." The Journal adds, "In a plea agreement, the government noted Super Micro became aware of the investigation in February 2004 and took remedial action that involved setting up an export-control program that year. … Because of the program, prosecutors agreed it wasn't necessary to put Super Micro on probation as part of the settlement. The government said it has been monitoring the company's exports and hasn't found any further violations."
